REPORT.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE JOHN BURNS, M.P., PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD.

SIR,

1. In accordance with the Minute of the 11th July, 1904, appointing us as a Departmental Committee, we have inquired into the Law relating to Vagrancy and its administration. For this purpose we have regarded the vagrant as a wayfarer, as an inmate of casual wards, common lodging-houses or shelters, as an occasional worker, as an offender against the law, and as an inmate of prisons, and we have considered the law affecting him in each instance and the manner in which it is administered.

2. In the course of our Inquiry we have held thirty-six meetings and have examined fifty-six witnesses. These witnesses have supplied us with information from all sides of the question. We have heard representatives of the Local Government Board, the Home Office, and the Prison Commissioners; magistrates, county councillors, guardians of the poor, clerks to the guardians, workhouse masters, medical officers of health, prison officers, chief constables and other police officers; representatives of philanthropic and religious societies; and private individuals interested in the subject; and we have taken evidence from witnesses with regard to vagrancy in Scotland. We have also obtained information by means of returns or otherwise from boards of guardians, police authorities, and others, and have been furnished with statements and statistics prepared by the Local Government Board and the Home Office. We have also received a memorandum from the Local Government Board for Ireland as to vagrancy in that country.

3. In addition, we have thought it necessary to inspect many institutions where persons of the vagrant class are received, or where treatment is afforded which might be of assistance to us in arriving at a decision on the questions submitted for inquiry. Thus, we have visited casual wards, workhouses, and prisons, as well as common lodging-houses, shelters, and other institutions in different parts of the country; we have inspected the Belgian labour colonies, as well as the farm colonies that have been established in this country; and by these means we have obtained a considerable amount of information and numerous expressions of opinion, besides what is represented by the printed Minutes of Evidence and the statements in the Appendix. Throughout the Inquiry we have received the greatest assistance not only from those whom we have called as witnesses but from officials and others whom we have consulted.

4. Thirty years ago an acute observer complained that for vagrants "who will not have households of their own, who have but one object in all their wicked and perverse lives—to exist without work at the expense of their industrious neighbours—we are taxed to provide board and lodging," and expressed his belief that in all the army of tramps "there is no appreciable element of honest poverty or of penniless industry seeking work."* This complaint might be repeated with considerable justice at the present day. The army of vagrants has increased in numbers of late years, and there is reason to fear that it will continue to increase if things are left as they are. It is mainly composed of those who deliberately avoid any work and depend for their existence on almsgiving and the casual wards; and for their benefit the industrious portion of the community is heavily taxed. We are convinced that the present system neither deters the vagrant nor affords any means of reclaiming him, and we are unanimously of opinion that a thorough reform is necessary. Briefly, the object of the scheme which we propose is to place the vagrant more under the control of the police, to help the bona fide wayfarer, and to provide a means of detaining the habitual vagrant under reformatory influences.

* The Original. By Thomas Walker (ed. 1875).

5. The first part of our Report contains a historical survey of the law and the practice concerning vagrancy, and a reference to statistics bearing on the subject. We then describe certain classes of vagrants and the conditions under which they live, and finally we make certain recommendations for the amendment of the existing law or its administration. At the end of our Report will be found a summary of our recommendations.

6. The question of unemployment is, of course, beyond the scope of our Inquiry, but we think it right to call attention to the opinions expressed by certain witnesses to the effect that if the habitual vagrant and loafer were removed, the difficulties of dealing with the unemployed would be greatly lessened.

CHAPTER I.

HISTORICAL SUMMARY.

Legislation up to 1824.

7. The existing law against vagrancy is the outcome of more than three centuries' legislation, and cannot be fully understood without reference to this previous legislation and the circumstances which gave rise to it. A chronological list of the statutes relating to vagrancy which have been passed up to the present time, with a note of their effect, is printed in the Appendix.* Appendix I. Some account of the statutes dealing with vagrancy as a criminal offence is given in the third volume of Stephen's History of the Criminal Law. He remarks: "In the times when serfdom was breaking down and when the statutes of labourers provided what might be regarded as a kind of substitute for it, provisions as to vagrancy were practically punishments for desertion. The labourer's wages were fixed, his place of residence was fixed; he must work where he happened to be. If he went elsewhere, he must be taken and sent back. By degrees the order of ideas which this view of the subject represented died away. The vagrant† came to be regarded rather as a probable criminal than as a runaway slave."

8. The modern history of the subject begins with an Act of 1495 (11 Hen. VII., ch. 2). The expressed purpose of this was to moderate the provisions of 7 Richard II., ch. 5 — one of the latest statutes of labourers — and to save the cost of taking vagabonds to gaol and keeping them there, "wherby by likele-hede many of theym shuld lose their lives." Local authorities were accordingly bidden to search for all "vagaboundes, idell and suspecte persones lyvyng suspiciously" to put them in the stocks for three days giving them bread and water only, and then to turn them out of the town or township. An offender failing to depart was to be put in the stocks for another six days. This was accompanied by provisions requiring beggars unable to work to abide in the hundreds in which they were settled, and other provisions for the regulating of ale-houses and the suppression of dicing, cards, bowls, tennis and other unlawful games. A further statute couched in similar terms was passed in 1503 (19 Hen. VII., ch. 12) with more stringent provisions for compelling local authorities (sheriffs, mayors, high constables, petty constables and others) to carry it into effect.

9. In 1530 came the Act 22 Hen. VIII., ch. 12, which is stated in the preamble to be due to the increase of vagrancy and the consequent increase of crime and disorder; whipping was allowed as an alternative to the stocks, and besides vagrants begging under various pretences, persons professing to tell fortunes by means of "physyke, physnamye, palmestrye or other craftye scyence" were also brought within the purview of the Act. A second offence by one of the latter class might entail a whipping on two successive days, three hours in the pillory and the loss of one ear. The provisions for the execution of the penal part of the statute and also for the grant of licences to beg to impotent

* A fuller account of the statutes will be found in Ribton-Turner's History of Vagrants and Vagrancy [London, 1887], a work which contains an immense amount of information on the subject.

† The word "vagrant" appears for the first time in any statute in 1547 (1 Ed. VI., ch. 3) where it is used as synonymous with 'vagabond' or 'loiterer.' Blackstone quotes 'ancient statutes' as defining vagrants to be "such as wake on the night and sleep on the day and haunt customable taverns and alehouses and routs about; and no man wot from whence they come ne whither they go." (Commentaries Bk. IV. ch. 13). The Act of 1572 (14 Eliz., ch. 5) defines "rogues, vagabonds and sturdy beggars" to include, among others, "every person being whole and mighty in body and able to labour, having not land or master, nor using any lawful merchandise craft or mystery, whereby he or she might get his or her living" and also "all common labourers being persons able in body using loitering and refusing to work for such reasonable wages as is taxed and commonly given in such parts where such persons do or shall happen to dwell." Under the Vagrancy Act of 1824 (5 Geo. IV., ch. 83) and the amending Acts a vagrant only becomes an "idle and disorderly person," or a "rogue and vagabond" or an "incorrigible rogue" upon conviction as such by a court of summary jurisdiction. The vagrant as now known to the Poor Law is termed a "casual pauper" which is defined in the Pauper Inmates Discharge and Regulation Act, 1871, as "any destitute wayfarer or wanderer applying for or receiving relief" in the casual wards.

persons and others are exceedingly elaborate. Further provision for the able-bodied as well as the infirm poor was made in 1535 by 27 Hen. VIII., ch. 25, coupled with severer punishment for the ruffler, sturdy vagabond or valiant beggar, who on being brought a second time before a justice of the peace might be marked by having the upper part of his right ear cut off, and after this, on conviction at quarter sessions of "wandring, loitring and idelnes," might be adjudged a felon and suffer death accordingly. Jurisdiction was expressly given to the knight marshall over all such sturdy vagabonds and valiant beggars as might haunt the Court at any place where the King's Highness might chance to be. In this Act, too, there are indications of the need for special measures to compel local authorities to enforce the law.

10. The need of this is explicitly mentioned as one of the chief reasons for the next statute on the subject, namely, 1 Edw. VI., ch. 3, the preamble of which declares that previous legislation "hath not had that successe which hath byn wisshed, but partelie by folishe pitie and mercie of them which shoulde have seen the said godlie lawes executed, partelie by the perverse nature and longe accustomed idelnes of the parsons given to loytringe." Under this statute all those who would not work nor "offer themself to labour with anny that will take them according to their facultie, and yf no man otherwise will take them doo not offer themself to worke for meate and drynck," or who after accepting employment ran away from it, might be taken as vagabonds before two justices who, if the charge were proved, were to order the offender to be branded forthwith on the breast with a V and "adjudge the said parsons living so idelye to such presentour to be his slave" for two years. If the slave ran away during the two years, he was liable on re-capture to be branded on the forehead or cheek with an S and adjudged a slave for ever. To run away a second time was felony punishable with death. If no private person took action justices were to proceed ex officio, and all local authorities were strictly enjoined to see to it that all vagrants should be enslaved. In 1549 the Act was repealed and the Act of 22 Hen. VIII. revived.

11. Further Acts followed (5 and 6 Edw. VI., ch. 2; 2 and 3 Philip and Mary, ch. 5; and 5 Eliz., ch. 3) which re-enacted existing law with slight amendments. Then in 1572 there came a more comprehensive statute (14 Eliz., ch. 5); sturdy beggars found begging were to be "grevously whipped and burnte through the gristle of the right eare with a hot iron," unless someone would take them into service for a year. A second offence was to be deemed a felony, unless someone would take the offender into service for two years; a third offence was made felony without benefit of clergy. The Act was repealed in 1597 by 39 Eliz., ch. 4, but most of its provisions were re-enacted. Provisions as to branding and ear-marking were dropped. Branding (this time with an R on the left shoulder) was re-introduced for incorrigible or dangerous rogues by 1 James I., ch. 7, and appears to have remained legal till 1713. The Act of 1572, besides dealing with vagrants as criminals, contained elaborate provisions for the relief of the poor and the appointment of overseers of the poor, and the Act of 1597 was accompanied by another containing similar provisions for the same purpose (39 Eliz., ch. 3). The Act of 1597 treated as rogues and vagabonds not only beggars of all sorts, fortune-tellers, and others using "like fantasticall imagynations," but also tinkers, pedlars, and petty chapmen, jugglers, fencers, bear-wards, minstrels and play-actors, other than "players of enterludes belonging to any baron of this realme or any other honorable personage of greater degree to be auctoryzed to play under the hand and seale of armes of such baron or personage." The law as laid down in 1597 remained substantially much the same through the 17th and 18th centuries, though it was more than once repealed and re-enacted, with amendments.

12. It has often been suggested that the multiplicity of statutes passed in Tudor times for the suppression of vagrancy and the apparent ferocity of the punishments they impose indicate the existence of a very serious social evil, but it is questionable whether this assumption is altogether justified. In the first place, the severity of the punishments is not peculiar to the vagrancy laws, but is a characteristic of all the criminal law of that period. A generation who were accustomed to the notion that all larcenies to an amount exceeding one shilling should be punished by death and that persons charged with felony, and refusing to plead, could properly be made liable to the horrible torture of the peine forte et dure, and who moreover had by a special Act of Parliament (22 Hen. VIII., ch. 9) introduced the novel punishment of boiling to death for poisoners,* would be likely to look on whipping, branding, or mutilation as matters of small moment. Indeed it is probable that branding was not regarded as a punishment at all: it had been authorised in 1488 as a means of identifying persons who had been once admitted to benefit of clergy, and so preventing them escaping the proper punishment of felons a second time (4 Hen. VII., ch. 13), and it is probable that a similar reason led to its application to vagrants, just as at the present time sheep and cattle are branded and ear-marked for purposes of identification. Whipping was a punishment applicable at common law to all misdemeanants, and, at a time when imprisonment was scarcely known except as a means of enforcing a fine or a debt, it would be the most natural mode of punishing any of the less serious offences. Further, the penal provisions against vagrants were enacted contemporaneously with the establishment of poor relief for the aged and infirm, and with repeated attempts to build up a system for the correction and reformation of the vagrant.†

13. Again, it is clear from the wording of the statutes, as well as from other contemporary evidence, that so far from legislating to meet a widespread demand Parliament throughout this period was attempting to force on local authorities a repressive policy which local authorities were disinclined to carry into execution. It was perhaps natural that, at a time when the old social system was in dissolution and the ties that for centuries had bound the rural population to the soil were being everywhere rapidly broken, the Government may have seen a social danger in everyone who attempted to earn a humble livelihood otherwise than by tilling the soil or exercising some recognised handicraft; but the country justices, the mayors of towns and the constables of hundreds and villages must have looked with different eyes on a policy that practically proscribed everyone who lived by providing amusement for the common people.

14. From the State papers of the period it is clear that great importance was attached by the Government to the enforcement of the vagrancy laws; in 1570-2 returns were received from many parts of the country of the number of vagrants who had been "stocked and whipped," with reports of the searches made for vagrants; about twenty years later trouble seems to have been caused by a number of men either returning from the wars or pretending to do so, and in some counties provost-m Marshals were appointed to deal with them. Numerous proclamations and Orders in Council were issued, and judges when going circuit took occasion to urge justices, high constables and others to be active in the matter, but there is a striking absence of any evidence to show that in the country generally the suppression of vagrancy was regarded as a matter of any urgency. There are a sufficient number of representations to Government on other subjects to make this fact of some significance, and its significance is increased by reference to other sources.

15. In London sturdy rogues and dangerous criminals have always abounded, but Shakespeare knew at least as much of the country-side as any burgess or knight of the shire who went to Westminster to legislate; and in the numerous pictures he has given us of rural life a dangerous class of vagrants

* This part of the Act, together with other Acts creating new forms of treason, was repealed by 1 Edw. VI., ch. 12, and, as it is not printed in full in ordinary editions of the Statutes at Large, it may be worth quoting at more length as an illustration of the temper of Parliament at the time when the most notorious statutes against vagrants were passed. After reciting that "the making of good and wholesome lawes and due execution of the same agaynste the offendours therof is the only cause that good obedyence and order hath ben preserved in this Realme," and that one Richard Roose, a cook of Rochester, had poisoned a certain "vessell replenysshed with yeste or barme" in the Bishop of Rochester's kitchen, and thereby caused the death of two persons besides poisoning others, the statute declares that the offence shall be adjudged high treason, that Roose "shal be therfore boyled to deathe withoute havynge any advantage of his clergie" and that all similar offenders should, in future, receive similar treatment. The Act also gave jurisdiction to justices at quarter sessions and justices of assize in the matter of the "counterfaytynge of coyne of any outwarde Realme suffered to ronne and goo wythin this Realme by the Kynge's assente."

would surely have made their appearance if such a class had existed. Although no doubt the "vagrom men" whom Dogberry exhorted his watch to "comprehend" were to be found in the towns in considerable number, we find little evidence of a similar class in rural districts. Falstaff's followers, when Falstaff died, bid fair to become mere "rufflers and valiant beggars" of a dangerous kind, but in Henry V. we find one married to an ale-house keeper and another is hanged in France. Autolycus is a highly finished, though in some respects, no doubt, an ideal portrait of the vagrant as Shakespeare knew him, and assuredly Autolycus with all his roguery must have been on the whole a welcome feature at rural festivals rather than a social nuisance to be resented and suppressed. As a thief, he fears the gallows ("gallows and knocks are too powerful on the highway"), but he seems to be wholly unconscious of any legislation directed against him as a vagrant. Christopher Sly, again, "by birth a pedlar, by education a card-maker, by transmutation a bear-herd, and now by present profession a tinker," was unquestionably an idle and disorderly person in the eye of the law, but over his head too the law with all its terrors passes harmless.* No doubt the coming into existence of a pauper class was a new and alarming phenomenon of Tudor times; it is probable, too, that the suppression of the monasteries led to a large increase in the vagrant population, and there is no question as to the apprehension felt on this subject by responsible authorities, but we have no sufficient ground for concluding that the legislation against vagrancy as a criminal offence had its origin in any real condition of serious social disorder.

16. But, whatever view may be taken of the Tudor laws relating to vagrancy, the substance of the law remained in force for more than three centuries. Some of the amendments made are of general interest. The Act of 1597, which may be regarded as the conclusion arrived at after a series of experiments in legislation, required the justices to build and equip houses of correction to be used in addition to the county gaols for vagrants. If any vagrants appeared "dangerous to the inferior sorte of people where they shal be taken or otherwyse be such as will not be reformed of their rogish kind of lyfe," they might be committed to quarter sessions and then either "be judged perpetually to the gallyes of this realme," or banished from the realm and at the cost of the county conveyed to such place abroad as might be appointed by an Order in Council. An Order in Council of 1603 prescribed "the New found Lande" the East and West Indies, France, Germany, Spain and the Netherlands, as places to which incorrigible rogues might be banished. The growth of the colonies during the 17th century provided ready means of ridding this country of the more disorderly elements of the population, moss-troopers from the borders, "malignants" and rebels. In 1662 power was given to transport sturdy beggars and idle and disorderly persons to "any of the English plantations beyond the seas there to be disposed in the usual way of servants" for seven years. The use of transportation as a substitute for the death penalty to which all felons were liable is a later development of the practice. The 2 and 3 Anne, ch. 6, an Act for the increase of seamen and encouragement of navigation, furnished another example of the attempts so persistently made by the legislature to get rid of the vagrant population by allowing rogues and vagabonds to be utilised for "Her Majestie's service at sea," instead of being sent to their parish or a colony.

17. Branding ceased to be legal in 1713, when the Act 13 Anne, ch. 26, repealed and re-enacted with some amendments the earlier statutes. After this period the amendments of the vagrancy law are chiefly remarkable for the new definitions of persons to be treated as vagrants. The offence aimed at was no longer merely the vagrant mode of life, but the fact that the vagrant became chargeable to the poor rate or (and this was considered the more serious offence) chargeable to a parish in which he had no settlement. The most striking illustration of the length to which this policy was carried is section 25 of 17 Geo. II., ch. 5, which empowered quarter sessions to order a public whipping and imprisonment for 6 months for any woman wandering and begging who is delivered of a child in a parish to which she did not belong. Later, however, the vagrancy law was extended to persons belonging to the criminal classes against whom actual felony could not be proved, e.g., persons found in possession of house-breaking implements (23 Geo. III., ch. 88) and suspected persons and reputed thieves frequenting public places with a felonious intent (39 and 40 Geo. III., ch. 87, s. 12; 51 Geo. III., ch. 119, s. 18).

18. By the beginning of last century the vagrancy law had become extremely complicated and it is probable that few magistrates were fully aware of the extensive powers they possessed under it. Fencers, bear-wards, play-actors not authorised by law, minstrels, jugglers and persons wandering abroad and pretending to be in search of harvest work or pretending to be gipsies or wandering in the habit or form of Egyptians were still rogues and vagabonds under 17 Geo. II., ch. 5. The recognised form of warrant for whipping a vagrant still required the constable to strip the offender "naked from the middle upwards and publicly to whip or cause him to be whipped till his body be bloody."* An "end-gatherer," i.e., one who collected or bought any ends or refuse of woollen goods, was liable to be dealt with as an incorrigible rogue under Acts passed for the encouragement of woollen manufacturers. Under section 23 of 17 Geo. II., ch. 5, anyone who knowingly gave a rogue or vagabond lodging or shelter and refrained from handing him over to a constable was liable to a penalty of not less than 10s. nor more than 40s., or in default one month in the house of correction. There were also a number of very elaborate provisions with regard to passes for vagrants when discharged from prison.†

19. In 1821 a Select Committee of the House of Commons considered the laws as to vagrants. They were mainly concerned with the system of passing vagrants to their place of settlement, which had developed great abuses. The Committee recommended that the existing system should be abolished, and longer periods of imprisonment given for vagrancy offences. As a result of this Report, the existing legislation was in 1822 repealed en bloc by the Act 3 Geo. IV., ch. 40. Mr. Chetwynd, in moving for leave to bring in the Bill, stated that during the preceding 300 years, 49 Acts of Parliament had been passed, of which 27 were still in operation; he remarked also that in Wiltshire and an adjoining county as much as £2,587 had been spent from county funds in one year in "passing" vagrants. On the Second Reading it was remarked that £100,000 had been expended in all on this purpose during 1821. The object of the Bill was to remove the necessity for this expenditure and to consolidate the law, omitting all unnecessary and obsolete enactments. Another reason urged in Parliament was that there was at that time a danger of the vagrancy laws "becoming part" of the Poor Law. The Bill also considerably reduced the powers of magistrates with regard to vagrants, reducing the maximum term of detention from 7 years' transportation to 2 years' imprisonment, and not allowing whipping except by order of a court of quarter sessions. As finally passed the Act was only to continue in force till 1st Sept. 1824, and in that year another Bill was introduced which became the present Vagrancy Act (5 Geo. IV., ch. 83).

Vagrancy Act, 1824.

20. The Vagrancy Act, 1824, which is entitled "An Act for the punishment of idle and disorderly persons and rogues and vagabonds, in that part of Great Britain called England," repealed all former statutes on the subject. Under it, persons committing vagrancy offences are liable to punishment either as "idle and disorderly persons," or as "rogues and vagabonds," or as "incorrigible rogues."‡ Later statutes have provided that persons committing certain offences shall be deemed to come within one of the divisions mentioned, and in this way many offenders who are in no sense of the word vagrants have been brought under the laws relating to vagrancy. The offences dealt with by the existing vagrancy law (the Act of 1824 and subsequent amending statutes) are set out in a memorandum prepared by the Local Government Board. They may be divided into three distinct classes :—(1) offences of the kind created by the Tudor legislation, and committed by persons of a disreputable mode of life, such as begging, trading as a pedlar without a licence, telling fortunes, or sleeping in outhouses, unoccupied buildings, etc., without visible means of subsistence ; (2) offences against the Poor Law, such as leaving a wife and family chargeable to the poor rate, returning to and becoming chargeable to a parish after being removed therefrom by an order of the justices, refusing or neglecting to perform the task of work in a workhouse, or damaging clothes or other property belonging to the guardians ; and (3) offences committed by professional criminals, such as being found in possession of housebreaking implements or a gun or other offensive weapon with a felonious intent, or being found on any enclosed premises for an unlawful purpose, or frequenting public places for the purpose of felony.

* See Burn's Justice of the Peace (ed. 1814), vol. v. p. 610. The whipping of women was abolished by 32 Geo. III., ch. 45, s. 3.

† The history of these provisions is given fully in Mr. H. G. Codd's report to the Poor Law Commissioners of 1834 published in the Appendix [E] to their Report [H.C. 44]. An extreme instance of the results of the system is mentioned on page 18 of the former report. A widow with five children charged with 'sleeping out' was committed to prison for 14 days and was at the expiration of that period to be "passed" on to her place of settlement. It was calculated that the party would take five weeks to reach their destination, while receiving 5s. a day during their journey from the public purse.

21. The offences which may be regarded as specially characteristic of the vagrant class are begging, "sleeping out," and certain offences in casual wards, such as refusal to perform a task of work and destroying clothes. Persons committing offences of the last mentioned kind are classed as "idle and disorderly persons" and are liable on summary conviction by a single justice to imprisonment with hard labour for fourteen days, or on conviction by a petty sessional court (which includes any stipendiary magistrate sitting alone) to a fine of £5 or imprisonment for a month with or without hard labour. Any one committing such an offence after having been previously convicted as an "idle and disorderly person" is a "rogue and vagabond" liable, on conviction by a single justice, to imprisonment for fourteen days with hard labour, or on conviction by a petty sessional court to a fine of £25 or imprisonment for three months with or without hard labour. On a third conviction he becomes an "incorrigible rogue," and on conviction may be committed to prison and kept to hard labour till the next quarter sessions, when he is liable to a sentence of imprisonment for twelve months with hard labour. "Incorrigible rogues," if males, may also be whipped. Any person sleeping out without visible means of subsistence and not giving a good account of himself is a "rogue and vagabond," and may be treated on a second conviction as an "incorrigible rogue." An ordinary beggar is an "idle and disorderly person ;" if he exposes wounds or deformities, or if he endeavours to collect alms or charitable contributions under false pretences, he may be charged as a "rogue and vagabond" and is liable on a second conviction to be treated as an "incorrigible rogue."

22. In addition to establishing these divisions of offenders, the Act of 1824 contained a provision authorising magistrates to grant certificates or passes to vagrants discharged from prison to enable them to reach their places of settlement, and to obtain relief from parochial authorities on the way. This pass system, which was a survival of a very old practice, was only carried out by four counties and soon fell into disuse. It was severely condemned in the Report of the Poor Law Commission of 1832, as having the effect of causing paupers to be sent to prison in order to obtain the benefits of the pass. With the exception of the provision as to passes, the Act of 1824 was a measure simply of repression ; and in a way it was certainly effective, for the number of vagrants committed to prison rose from 7,092 in 1825 to 15,624 in 1832.

Legislation and Administration since 1824.

23. The reports made to the Poor Law Commission by their Assistant Commissioners went somewhat fully into the question of vagrancy.* In the Report of the Commission it was stated that it appeared from the evidence obtained that vagrancy had actually been converted into a trade, and not an unprofitable one ; and "that the severe and increasing burden arises from the vagrants by trade, not from those on account of destitution. We state, in proof of this, and the statement is more valuable, as it points out the remedy as well as the cause of the evil, that in those few districts in which the relief has been such as only the really destitute will accept, the resort of vagrants has ceased, or been so much diminished as to become only a trifling inconvenience. But it appears vain to expect the remedy from detailed statutory provisions. The tendency of legislation respecting the poor to aggravate the evils which it was intended to cure, a tendency which we have so often remarked, is strikingly exemplified in that portion of it which respects vagrancy." The Commission expressed the opinion that vagrancy would cease to be a burden if the relief given to vagrants was such as only the really destitute would accept, but that this could not be effected unless the system was general; and they expressed their conviction that no enactments to be executed by parochial officers would in all parishes be rigidly adhered to unless under the influence of strict superintendence and control. They consequently recommended that the Central Board which was to be established for the relief of the destitute poor generally, should be empowered and directed to frame and enforce regulations as to the relief to be afforded to vagrants and discharged prisoners. But the Poor Law Act of 1834 which established the Central Board (the Poor Law Commissioners) made no special reference to vagrants, and several years passed before any regulations were made as to such persons.

24. Under the Poor Law as reformed in 1834 the primary duty of the guardians is to provide relief for destitute persons resident within their district; and for the discharge of this duty it is necessary to inquire into the circumstances of persons applying for relief, and to make sure by the use of a test or by other means that relief is not given from the public funds except in cases of real necessity. The provision of casual wards for destitute wayfarers not belonging to the particular district is clearly a duty of an entirely different character and was not contemplated by the framers of the Poor Law of 1834. But when workhouses had been established, vagrants applied for admission to them representing themselves to be in urgent need of relief. The masters of workhouses had no means of investigating the facts and had to deal with each case on their own responsibility. At that time workhouse inmates who had no settlement were maintained at the expense of the parish in which the workhouse happened to be; this made the relief of the vagrant in the workhouse more difficult and workhouse masters were pressed by the guardians to refuse such cases altogether. In 1837 the Poor Law Commissioners, on being appealed to by the Commissioners of Metropolitan Police with regard to this question, expressed the opinion that it was the intention of the Act that all cases of destitution should be relieved irrespective of the fact that the applicant might belong to a distant parish. They stated that it was the duty of the relieving officer to relieve casually destitute wayfarers and of the workhouse master to admit such cases to the workhouse. These cases were distinguished from beggars by profession, who were to be dealt with under the Vagrancy Act of 1824.

25. In 1838 the Poor Law Commissioners issued a circular letter to boards of guardians in the Metropolis calling attention to the correspondence with the Commissioners of Police, and pointing out the duties of guardians in relieving the casually destitute, and they suggested the adoption of arrangements for securing the performance of a task of work. This was followed by another circular in the next year, threatening with dismissal officers who neglected to relieve cases of urgent casual destitution. Thus it may be said that the Poor Law vagrant is an accidental result of the law of settlement. As a class, however, vagrants came to be recognised by the Central Authority, who from this point issued a series of circulars and Orders dealing with them directly or indirectly. Between 1834 and 1848 vagrancy increased to an alarming extent in all parts of the country. This was probably in part due to the action of the Poor Law Commissioners as above mentioned, and partly to a great influx of Irish poor, owing to the famine in Ireland.

26. Under an Act of 1842 (5 & 6 Vict., ch. 57, sec. 5), boards of guardians generally were enabled to prescribe a task of work for persons relieved in the workhouse. The Act stated that this was to be "in return for the food and lodging afforded," but the guardians were not to detain any person against his will for the performance of the task for more than four hours after breakfast on the morning after admission. In the same year the Poor Law Commissioners issued a general Order requiring that vagrants should be kept in a separate ward of the workhouse, and dieted and set to work under regulations to be framed by the guardians and approved by the Commissioners. So early as 1837 arrangements were in force in Hatfield and certain other unions for exacting a task of work from vagrants relieved in the workhouse.

27. The Poor Law Act, 1844, contained a provision, which is still in force, authorising the formation of districts in London and certain other large towns for the provision of asylums for the temporary relief and setting to work of destitute houseless poor. Accordingly in 1845 the Poor Law Commissioners prepared a scheme forming districts in the Metropolis for this purpose, but it met with considerable opposition. In 1846 a Select Committee of the House of Commons was appointed to inquire into the manner in which the Poor Law Commissioners had exercised their powers under the provision referred to, and also to inquire into the effects of any asylums supported by voluntary subscriptions formed for the same purpose. They took a mass of evidence, but expressed no opinion on the question submitted to them. The evidence attributed the increase of vagrancy largely to the action of the Commissioners in issuing the circulars of 1837-9, which, it was urged, resulted in workhouse masters relieving all applicants whether deserving cases or not. The evidence was very strong as to the harmful effects of night asylums or shelters for the homeless in encouraging vagrancy. As a result of this inquiry, the scheme put forward by the Commissioners was abandoned.

28. In 1848, when the Poor Law Board took the place of the Poor Law Commissioners, the question of vagrancy was one of the first to be dealt with. In that year reports on vagrancy were made by the Inspectors to the new Board ; and these reports were presented to Parliament together with a special report by Mr. Boase, and various communications from boards of guardians on the subject.* These reports showed that in many cases the vagrant wards were defective : that the vagrants had greatly increased in numbers or were encouraged in idleness by the food and lodging provided for them : that their conduct was unruly and that little or no work was exacted from them ; that their condition was often filthy and verminous, and many instances were given in which they spread fever and other diseases. The fact that vagrants refused to work or committed other offences for the express purpose of being sent to prison was referred to, and generally speaking the opinion of the Inspectors was that a closer connection between the Poor Law, the police, and the prison administration should be brought about, and that the treatment of vagrants should be uniform. Mr. Boase was in favour of transferring the vagrants entirely to the care of the police. One of the Inspectors, Mr. Aneurin Owen, recommended the establishment of what would be termed now "labour colonies," and suggested that islands off the coast, where rock is of proper hardness to be broken for road material, would be a suitable place for the establishment of these depôts.

29. In consequence of these reports, a Minute of the Poor Law Board signed by Mr. Charles Buller, its first President, was communicated in the same year to boards of guardians and their officers calling attention to the necessity of repressing the growing evil of vagrancy, and the importance of exercising greater vigilance and discrimination in the administration of relief to vagrants. This Minute was popularly, though inaccurately, supposed to reverse to a considerable extent the policy of the Commissioners. In it complaint was made that all vagrants who applied for relief were admitted to the workhouse without discrimination, and it was stated that the responsibility rested with the guardians, who, "as they represent those who suffer from the evil, must seek the remedy principally in their own vigilance and energy. They can expect little help from Parliament when no material increase of their present power appears to be requisite." It went on to say that it was the duty of the officers "to relieve the destitute and to repel the impostor," and that the Board could not by general rules supply the place of that discrimination on the part of the guardians which was obviously necessary between the treatment of the professional vagrants and those really in distress. The professional vagrant was characterised as "the thief, the mendicant and the prostitute who crowd the vagrant wards." The Minute urged that there should be uniformity in action throughout England and recommended :—

- (a) the refusal of relief to able-bodied men not actually destitute ;
- (b) the employment of police officers as assistant relieving officers for vagrants ; and
- (c) some system of passes or certificates, to be given "by some proper authority" to persons actually in search of work. To lessen the chances of any abuse of those powers they should be granted only for a particular road and a limited period.

30. The recommendations of this Minute were very widely acted upon by boards of guardians (except it seems as to passes), and reports made by the Inspectors in 1849 showed that a great decrease in vagrancy had occurred as a result of more stringent regulations. The numbers of vagrants relieved fell from 13,714 on the 1st July, 1848, to 5,662 on the 1st July, 1849, and to 1,484 on the 1st July, 1853. From 1853, however, the numbers of vagrants began to rise again. The question of vagrancy seems to have been a source of continual trouble to the Poor Law Board who issued several circulars which appear to have had but little effect in securing uniformity.

31. For some time previously complaints had been made that the cost of the relief of vagrants pressed unduly heavily on particular parishes. In the Gilbert incorporations* this cost was already a common charge on the constituent parishes. In accordance with this precedent and in acknowledgment of the grievance complained of, the Poor Law Act of 1848 (11 & 12 Vict., ch. 110) made the cost a common charge in every union.

32. In 1857 the Poor Law Board revived the scheme which had been formulated by the Poor Law Commissioners in 1845 for the establishment of district asylums in the Metropolis, in which vagrants were to be treated in a uniform manner. The scheme, however, had again to be abandoned owing to the opposition with which it met. The Board argued in favour of the scheme that it was calculated :—

(i) to ensure a better test of destitution by one uniform system of labour, discipline, and treatment, in return for relief ;

(ii) to check vagrancy by diminishing the number of places for the reception of vagrants, and by establishing a system of supervision which would afford some ready method of detecting all second applications ;

(iii) to relieve the workhouse from the dirt, annoyance, clamour, and contagion of habitual tramps, pickpockets, and prostitutes, so that the ordinary paupers, the majority of whom were aged and infirm persons, might be left undisturbed and the officers might not be interrupted in their proper functions ;

(iv) to ensure a refuge for all who were really destitute and homeless, so arranged that the decent and well-conducted might find a night's shelter without being exposed to an intercourse with filthy and immoral inmates ; and

(v) to apportion the charge of such relief more equally among the parishes and unions of the Metropolis.

33. Although this scheme failed, the Select Committee on Poor Relief of 1864 recommended that the relief of vagrancy in London should be a common charge on the whole Metropolis,* and this led to the passing of the Houseless Poor Acts of 1864 and 1865, which are still partly in force. Under these two Acts the expenses in connection with vagrants were to be repaid to the guardians by the Metropolitan Board of Works, but in 1867 these expenses were made a charge on the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund. Under the Act of 1864 every London union was required to provide casual wards to the satisfaction of the Central Authority. In circular letters issued to London unions, the Poor Law Board specified certain requirements for casual wards, and suggested the use of sleeping platforms or barrack beds; they strongly recommended, but did not then prescribe, a task and a bath for each tramp; and they announced that they had made arrangements with the Commissioner of Police, by which officers of police would inspect the casual wards in London and make quarterly reports thereon to the Board. It may be mentioned here that, by an arrangement between the Poor Law Board and the Commissioner, the police were charged in 1863 to act as assistant relieving officers for vagrants in the Metropolitan unions and parishes. This practice lasted till 1872, when it came to an end by mutual consent, the police having made continual complaints of the duties imposed upon them, and of the filth and vermin brought to the police stations by applicants for relief. The various boards of guardians then appointed special officers as assistant relieving officers in place of the police, and four officers were appointed by the Local Government Board (who had succeeded the Poor Law Board in 1871) to supervise the casual wards and to make the quarterly reports which were required by the Act of 1865. This is still the practice in London.

34. In 1865 the Inspectors of the Poor Law Board were instructed to make reports upon the arrangements for dealing with vagrants within their respective districts. These reports were published in a volume and presented to Parliament in 1866†. They showed that great diversity in the treatment of tramps then existed. Of 619 unions 86 had no casual wards at all, and many others had quite unsuitable accommodation; while 195 imposed no task of work. It was clear that the policy of requiring masters of workhouses and relieving officers to exercise a discrimination in relieving vagrants, though it was generally adopted after the issue of the circular of 1848, was very soon abandoned by the guardians. The officers would not take the responsibility of refusing relief to anybody, and in nearly every union reported upon relief was given to all applicants alike. There was no uniformity whatever, either in the diet given or in the task enforced, and several of the Inspectors pointed out the great difficulty of making masters take the trouble necessary for strictly enforcing the task which had been prescribed. It was considered by individual boards of guardians then, as it is now, both easier and less expensive to let the vagrant go without doing any task. The evidence as to the value of employing police officers as assistant relieving officers was conflicting, but it is clear that many boards of guardians after trying the system had abandoned it, either because the police, having no special responsibility in the matter, gave orders without enquiry, or because of the friction between them and the union officers. In one county only (Essex) did it appear that the system of passes or certificates suggested in Mr. Charles Buller's Minute of 1848 was being worked, and here Sir John Walsham reported

* The recommendations of the Committee on this point were as follow :—

“That, in order to secure sufficient and convenient means for the relief of the casual and houseless poor within the Metropolis, as defined by the Metropolitan Local Management Act, it is expedient that the charges incurred for the support of such poor should be paid out of a rate assessed on the annual rateable value of the whole of the said Metropolis.

“That, in the opinion of this Committee, the machinery adopted under the Metropolitan Local Management Act might be made available for raising the amount of such charge, and your Committee recommend that authority be given to the Metropolitan board of works for such purpose.

“That the Poor Law Board be empowered to prescribe and enforce all necessary arrangements for providing the requisite accommodation in the several unions and parishes, and otherwise carrying the foregoing resolutions into effect.

“That, with the view of suppressing vagrancy as far as practicable, the Committee are of opinion that the Central Authority, when invested with adequate power for that purpose, should direct boards of guardians to provide suitable and sufficient wards for the reception of the wayfaring and wandering poor, and that the regulations for their management and relief should be on a uniform system throughout the country. The Committee approve of the employment of police constables as assistant relieving officers for vagrants, and think it desirable that the arrangement should be generally adopted.”

that vagrancy had been practically abolished by the energy of Admiral McHardy, the chief constable.

35. The Inspectors reported that in many cases the vagrant wards were insufficient. Mr. Doyle, in a most interesting report, quoted largely from the opinions of workhouse masters and the police, and, in illustration of the character of the tramps, gave extracts from their writings on the walls of the vagrant wards. These extracts establish conclusively his statement that "the casual ward of a workhouse, so far from being the temporary refuge of deserving poor, is a place of rendezvous for thieves and prostitutes, and other vagabonds of the lowest class, gangs of whom work allotted districts and make their circuits with as much regularity as the judges." He recommended that if it was not possible to induce guardians to discriminate between the various classes of tramps, and to refuse admission to those who were able-bodied and not destitute, then the care of tramps should be handed over to the police, and that the vagrant wards should be utilised as refuges for wayfarers in search of work who had obtained passes to a definite place from the authorities.

36. Several of the other Inspectors considered that the treatment of vagrants was a matter for the police, and that the joint action of the police and poor law authorities could only result in friction. All agreed that uniformity was essential. One of the Inspectors, Mr. Cane, advised that vagrants refusing to work should not, except in extreme cases, be taken before a magistrate, but should be merely detained for four hours. He said that the main cause of refusal to work and of tearing up clothes was not infrequently a desire to be sent to prison for a short time. It may be remarked that the Inspectors were by no means unanimous as to the efficacy of any task of work, partly on account of the difficulty of getting workhouse officers to enforce it, and partly because they were of opinion that, although a labour test was effective against a wayfarer in search of work, it broke down as against the professional vagrant.

37. In 1866 a dietary for vagrants was for the first time prescribed by the 19th Report of Central Authority, but the Order had reference only to London. It prescribed a Poor Law Board, uniform dietary. In 1868 the Poor Law Board issued a circular to guardians generally recommending the appointment of police as assistant relieving officers for vagrants and suggesting (a) that a register of applicants for admission should be kept; (b) that vagrants should be searched and bathed; (c) that they should be made to perform a task of not more than four hours; and (d) that a uniform dietary should be adopted. The circular commended the system of separate cells which had been introduced in a few places, and referred to a system of way-tickets adopted in certain counties, which dispensed with any task if a tramp had walked a sufficient distance from another workhouse, the walk being supposed to take the place of a task. It may be mentioned that the number of vagrants relieved fell from 7,020 on the 1st January, 1869, to 5,430 on the 1st January, 1870.

38. In 1871 the Pauper Inmates Discharge and Regulation Act was passed as 34 & 35 Vict., a Government measure, dealing with the whole question of the discharge of ch. 108. paupers from workhouses. In his speech introducing the Bill, Lord Kimberley referred to the proposal that the relief of vagrants should be entirely in the hands of the police, and intimated that though he thought this change might have great advantages he had decided against the proposal on the grounds that it might take the police from their other duties, and that it might involve considerable expense in the building of separate sets of wards in connection with police stations. The Act provided that a casual pauper should not be entitled to discharge himself from the casual ward before 11 a.m. on the day following his admission, nor before he had performed a prescribed task; and that, where a casual pauper had been admitted on more than two occasions during one month into any casual ward of the same union, he should not be entitled to discharge himself before 9 a.m. on the third day after his admission.

39. The detention of casuals over two nights made it necessary for the Local Government Board to prescribe a dietary for vagrants including a mid-day meal, a matter which has given rise to questions of great difficulty. A general Order was issued in November, 1871, prescribing a dietary (which is the same as that now in force) and tasks of work, and making general regulations as to the admission, discharge, and treatment of vagrants. The circular which was issued to guardians with the Order made various suggestions for dealing with vagrants. It stated that the Board would feel it their duty to require the provision of proper accommodation for vagrants, and it recommended generally the system of separate cells as being deterrent to the professional vagrant, and affording "protection from objectionable association to the honest but indigent wayfarer."

40. Immediately after the passing of the Act of 1871 the number of pauper vagrants began to decrease, and on the 1st January, 1875, it had fallen to 2,235, or about one-half of what it had been in 1866, and 3,000 less than it had been in 1870. But after 1875 the numbers began to rise again steadily until on 1st January, 1881, they amounted to 6,215. It may be noticed here that it appears to have been the experience that on most occasions when an Act has been passed, or an Order or circular issued by the Central Authority regulating the treatment of vagrants, the number of these persons has fallen, only, however, to rise again gradually until the next Act or Order.

41. In 1882 another Bill was introduced into Parliament to deal with vagrancy. In this Bill it was proposed inter alia to abolish the distinction between casual and ordinary paupers, to require that no pauper should be discharged from the workhouse without reasonable notice, and that no notice should be given before he had appeared before the guardians. The effect would have been that where the guardians met fortnightly a man might have to stop in the workhouse for a fortnight. These provisions were omitted during the passage of the Bill through Parliament, and the measure limited to casual paupers passed as the Casual Poor Act, 1882. It is still in force. It amended the Act of 1871 as to the discharge of casual paupers and extended the periods of detention. Under the Act of 1882 a casual pauper is not entitled to discharge himself from a casual ward before 9 a.m. on the second day following his admission (instead of 11 a.m. on the day following admission); and where he has been admitted on more than one occasion during one month into any casual ward of the same union, he is not entitled to discharge himself before 9 a.m. on the fourth day after admission (instead of 9 a.m. on the third day after admission). The Act also provides that for the purpose of determining the number of admissions of a casual pauper every casual ward in the Metropolis is to be deemed a casual ward of the same union. The Metropolis for the purpose of this Act is now the county of London (including the city of London). The effect is that if a person who has been admitted to a London casual ward subsequently goes to that or any other casual ward in London during the same month, he is liable to four nights' detention. To identify persons who have been admitted to any London wards more than once in a month, the four officers appointed by the Local Government Board pay frequent visits to the different wards.

42. The Act was followed by a new general Order dated the 18th December, 1882. This Order is set out in the Appendix. It provides inter alia that admission to the casual wards is to be only by an order of a relieving officer, assistant relieving officer, except in any case of sudden or urgent necessity. The admission is to be after 4 p.m. in winter and after 6 p.m. in summer. Vagrants are to be searched and have their money and all articles found upon them taken away; they are to have a bath; their clothing is to be dried and disinfected, and a nightshirt is to be supplied to them. An admission and discharge book is to be kept by the superintendent of the wards, which is to be a register of the vagrant's name, age, calling, previous sleeping place, task, and time of discharge. There is a proviso in the Order allowing the provisions of the Act as to detention to be dispensed with in particular cases, and this proviso has been one of the main causes of the want of uniformity in the administration of the Act and Order. In point of fact many boards of guardians make the exception the rule by not detaining any vagrant for two nights. The Order prescribes alternative forms of diet and task of work, and this again is an obstacle to uniformity of treatment. In 1887 a general Order was issued (applying to London only) requiring that either hot gruel or hot broth should be given for supper and breakfast in the case of males over fifteen.

43. In 1888 there was a Select Committee of the House of Lords on Poor Law Relief. Several witnesses of experience in poor law matters gave evidence in favour of the abolition of the casual wards, but the Committee thought that "paupers belonging to the vagrant and casual class, for various reasons, could not be dealt with otherwise than as a separate class, so that practically it would always be necessary to maintain a separate department of the workhouse for their reception." They added: "It might, perhaps, be advisable in the case of casual paupers to somewhat further extend the power of detention, where the pauper has been re-admitted, say within a period of 14 days," and they suggested that casual paupers should be allowed to discharge themselves before 9 a.m. In 1892 this last suggestion was given effect to by a general Order which conferred upon any casual pauper, who represented that he wished to seek work, the right to claim his discharge on the second day after admission, at 5.30 a.m. in the summer and 6.30 a.m. in the winter, provided he had performed his task to the best of his ability. In 1897 another general Order was issued providing for an improved diet for children under the age of seven years by giving them milk. Appendix II.

44. From 1882 to 1885 the figures of pauper vagrancy decreased, but between 1885 and 1895 the number was nearly doubled according to the figures for the 1st January, and in the last mentioned year a deputation representing 250 unions with a population of over 16,000,000 waited upon Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, President of the Local Government Board, asking for a Royal Commission or a Departmental Committee to inquire into the whole subject. This was refused, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre directing attention to the want of uniformity in the administration of the Act and Order of 1882, and saying that guardians should try the effect of carrying out the regulations before asking for fresh inquiry or legislation. A circular letter to this effect was issued in 1896. It pointed out that out of 648 unions 635 had casual wards, but that vagrants were detained for more than one night in only 305 unions. It stated that the regulations had been framed "with a view of ensuring from the vagrants such a return by work for the relief afforded to them by the guardians that they will understand that their lot whilst so relieved will be in no wise better as regards labour than that of the industrious working man," but "this intention is frustrated when from more than half the casual wards in the country vagrants are discharged the first morning after their admission generally without any adequate task of work being required from them." Referring to the plea of certain boards of guardians that their accommodation was insufficient to enable them to detain for more than one night the large number of vagrants who sought admission, the Board pointed out that in the case of an habitual vagrant "it may usually be assumed that if he is not sleeping in one workhouse he is doing so in another, and therefore if all guardians detained vagrants of this class, the extra strain on the accommodation which is anticipated would not, under ordinary circumstances, arise." And they added that it had been proved again and again that "strict administration immediately produces a marked reduction in the number of applicants for admission." The circular concludes thus:—"If it should hereafter be found that the existing law, when duly enforced by boards of guardians generally throughout the country, is insufficient to meet the evil, the Board will be quite ready to consider what further action should be taken with a view to dealing with the question either by legislation or otherwise." Preston Thomas, 189. Appendix IV.

45. This circular may have had a beneficial effect; at any rate pauper vagrancy decreased until 1900. But with the close of the South African War and the approach of a period of trade depression, the number of casual paupers again increased and in 1904 passed all previous records. The agitation against vagrants was renewed and fresh powers for dealing with them were sought. At last, in February, 1904, Mr. Long, the President of the Local Government Board, received a joint deputation from the Central Poor Law Conference and the Poor Law Unions Association with the result that the present Committee were appointed to consider the whole question.

CHAPTER II.

STATISTICS OF VAGRANCY.

46. The returns of pauperism published annually by the Local Government Board give figures relating to casual paupers, that is, vagrants relieved in casual wards, but these represent only a small portion of the total number of vagrants. From time to time counts have been made of various other classes of vagrants by the police and others in particular districts, but there are no trustworthy statistics of vagrancy in general. The persons classed broadly as "vagrants" differ greatly, and it is extremely difficult to define what is, in fact, included in the term. It is impossible to say exactly at what stage a bona fide workman on tramp in search of work, and failing to find or keep it, should be regarded as having joined the vagrant class, nor what amount of casual labour should be regarded as enough to take a man out of the class. The vagrant is to be found in many places: on the road, in casual wards, common lodging-houses, public or charitable shelters, and prisons; besides which he has many other resorts, such as barns, brick works, etc. Then again, the number of homeless wayfarers varies greatly from time to time and at different periods of the year, owing to conditions of trade, the state of the weather, or the attraction of seasonal employments. Any figure, therefore, which is given as the total number of vagrants must be accepted as a mere estimate.

We will refer in the first place to the different statistics which are in existence relating to persons of the vagrant class before we state our conclusions as to the aggregate number of such persons.

Vagrants in Casual Wards.

47. Since 1848 the Local Government Board have obtained particulars of the number of vagrants relieved in casual wards in England and Wales on two particular dates, the 1st January and the 1st July each year. Statements are given in the Appendix showing the number of vagrants relieved on those days during a series of years, and it will be seen from the chart prepared by Mr. Preston-Thomas that the number has been subject to considerable fluctuations. As a rule, the January figures are higher than those for July, the reason, no doubt, being that in the summer months many vagrants sleep out of doors instead of resorting to the casual wards. Taking the January figures, it will be seen that the number has risen from 2,416 in 1858 to 9,768 in 1905. The latter is the highest number of the series, while the lowest is 1,542 in 1860. The figures for the 1st January and 1st July, at quinquennial periods, for the last twenty-five years are as follows :—

			1st Jan.			1st July.
1880	-	-	5,914	-	-	7,742
1885	-	-	4,866	-	-	4,648
1890	-	-	5,701	-	-	5,089
1895	-	-	8,810	-	-	7,000 (estimated)
1900	-	-	5,579	-	-	4,170
1905	-	-	9,768	-	-	8,556

48. A slight examination of the figures quoted by Mr. Preston-Thomas is sufficient to show that certain groups or periods of years may be distinguished, in each of which pauper vagrancy rose and fell, though with some irregularity. The years 1861 to 1864, 1865 to 1875, 1876 to 1884, 1885 to 1891, and 1892 to 1900, are among the periods referred to. The highest points reached during these periods were :—

1st January	-	1863	-	-	-	4,234
1st July	-	1868	-	-	-	7,946
1st July	-	1880	-	-	-	7,742
1st January	-	1889	-	-	-	7,058
1st January	-	1895	-	-	-	8,810

Appendix V.

Appendix VI.

The figure for the 1st January, 1905, is about 10 per cent. higher than that for the 1st January, 1895, the highest point in the preceding decade.

49. It is impossible to give a complete explanation of all these variations. It does not appear from the chart already referred to that there is a very close connection between the fluctuations of pauper vagrancy and pauperism as a whole. In many instances, no doubt, a rise in each has taken place about the same time, and there has been a somewhat similar fall; but, generally speaking, the fluctuations in casual pauperism have been more numerous and more accentuated than in the total pauperism. In the case of London there is a considerable resemblance between the movements of vagrancy and pauperism, and this is shown by a chart in the Appendix. It is probable that the variations depend to a considerable extent on the state of trade, periods of trade depression, as in 1879, 1895, and the last few years, producing high vagrancy figures; while in a time of industrial activity, as in 1872-4 and 1900, the figures of vagrancy are low. In the statistics generally much allowance must be made for fortuitous variations not assignable to any particular cause. As we have already stated, alterations in the administration of casual wards have been followed often by a temporary reduction in the admissions. It is a point not to be lost sight of that since 1865 the population of England and Wales has increased by more than 50 per cent. There is also another point to be considered in comparing the earlier figures with recent counts, and that is that prior to 1871 the arrangements for receiving vagrants into the casual wards were not so much developed as at the present time. Appendix V.

50. We deal later with the subject of the recent increase in vagrancy, but it may be stated here that the figures of casual paupers relieved show a continuous increase since 1900 and are as follows:—

		1st Jan.		1st July
1900	- -	5,579	- -	4,170
1901	- -	6,795	- -	5,455
1902	- -	7,840	- -	6,609
1903	- -	8,266	- -	5,121
1904	- -	8,519	- -	6,748
1905	- -	9,768	- -	8,556

51. It may be mentioned that the figures given for the counts prior to the 1st July, 1890, are less valuable than the later ones, as it is doubtful to what extent the returns referred to the actual number of vagrants relieved in any given union on the particular night only, or to the number relieved at any time in the course of the day. An aggregate for the country based on the latter figure would include twice over those vagrants who, after discharge from casual wards in the morning, were admitted to the casual wards of another union in the evening. It is probable, therefore, that in the earlier returns many vagrants were counted twice, and the totals would therefore be in excess of the actual number of casual paupers. Since 1890 care has been taken to avoid this error, and a double return is now made on each occasion, showing separately those relieved at any time on the day as well as those relieved only on the night. The earlier figures are, however, of some utility for the purpose of comparison. Preston-Thomas, 198.

52. Until 1904 these half-yearly counts supplied the only figures as to casual paupers for the whole country, but in that year weekly counts of the inmates of casual wards were instituted for each Friday night. In the Appendix is given a chart prepared by Mr. Preston-Thomas showing the fluctuations of this census during 1904. It will be seen from this that the figures had an upward tendency from the beginning of January to the end of May, from which point they fell rapidly till the middle of July. From then they rose as rapidly and continued generally high till the end of the year. From a similar chart furnished to us by the Local Government Board, in which the results of this weekly census are continued down to November, 1905, it will be seen that vagrancy took much the same course in 1905 as in 1904. Appendix. VI.

53. It has been the practice to arrive at the average pauper vagrancy for the year by taking the mean between the January and July counts, but, as Mr. Preston-Thomas points out, it is probable that the result thus obtained would be below the actual mean. It is clear that the 1st January is not the date with the highest total, although probably the figure for the 1st July may represent approximately the lowest. On this point we may refer to the evidence of a witness who thought that the figures of the half-yearly census of vagrants taken in Scotland in June and December should be added together to arrive at the number of vagrants.

Appendix V.

54. In London weekly counts of casual paupers have been made since 1880. In this period the average number relieved on Friday night in each year has varied very little, rising only three times above 1,100 and falling only four times below 700, being generally about 1,000. Charts and tables will be found in the Appendix showing the variations during a series of years and for each week during 1904 and 1905.

Appendix VI.

55. The distribution of casual pauperism in 1904 is shown in tables given in the Appendix. These tables indicate the counties in which (on various bases) the rate of casual pauperism was above the average for England and Wales, and those in which there had been an increase above the average. Another table gives the highest and lowest monthly averages for each county during the year. An interesting map has been prepared by the Local Government Board which shows at a glance the comparative amount of vagrancy in each district. Mr. Preston-Thomas supplied us with a table showing for each county the average number of vagrants relieved per union for 8 years.

Appendix V.

56. We have been furnished by the Local Government Board with some particulars as to the ages of casual paupers. On the 1st January, 1905, the total number of casual paupers relieved was 9,768. Of 8,693 male and 887 female adults, the ages were as follows:—

	Males.	Females.
Sixteen years and under thirty-five -	2,156	132
Thirty-five years and under sixty-five -	6,143	660
Sixty-five years and upwards -	394	95

Figures obtained in 1899 and 1900 give the number of vagrants over sixty-five as follows:—

	Men.	Women.
1st July, 1899 -	368	94
1st January, 1900 -	224	59

Particulars are also given in the Appendix as to the ages of children relieved as vagrants in the years 1895-8.

Appendix V.

57. Figures showing the number of women and children included in the total of vagrants relieved have not been obtained regularly. The statement prepared by the Local Government Board shows to what extent this information is available. It appears from the figures given that women and children form only a small proportion of the total. Thus in 1891 the figures were:—

	Men.	Women.	Children.
1st January -	4,204	553	164
1st July -	4,384	758	281

In 1905 the figures were:—

1st January -	8,693	887	188
1st July -	7,554	813	189

On 1st January, 1891, men were 85 per cent. of the total, and on 1st January, 1905, 89 per cent. The proportion of women shows a slight decline in that period. It varies from 15 per cent. in July, 1894, to 9 per cent. in January, 1905. Children represent a proportion varying from about 2 to 5 per cent. of the total, the lowest number being 164 in 1891 and the highest 411 in July, 1893. The figures show that, in spite of the high level of vagrancy generally in the last four years, the number of children has remained consistently low. In London especially, the number of children relieved in the casual wards is very small, the average number for a single night being 16 in 1901, 19 in 1902, and 13 in 1903.

58. These figures and the evidence we have received show conclusively that so far as the casual wards are concerned there is no foundation for the statements which have been freely made in many quarters as to the large number of vagrant children. The exaggerated idea no doubt arises from the same children being counted again and again in the total for a month or a year. To arrive at any just estimate it is, of course, necessary to take the number for a particular day.

Vagrants in Prison.

59. We obtained a return from the Prison Commissioners, from which it appears that out of 12,369 convicted male prisoners on the 28th February, 1905, 3,736 were, in the opinion of the prison governors, persons with no fixed place of abode and no regular means of subsistence; and of 2,598 convicted female prisoners 372 answered the same description. These figures show that on the date in question more than one fourth of the total prison population were persons who might be considered as belonging to the vagrant class. According to the governor of Manchester prison, one-sixth of the male prisoners received in that prison during 1904 were committed for vagrancy offences. Appendix VII. Isaacson, 9123.

There are figures relating to offenders under the Vagrancy Act which are published in the annual Judicial Statistics: these, however, only show the total number of cases prosecuted each year, and assist but little in estimating the actual number of offenders.

Census of Vagrants in certain Counties.

60. In some counties attempts have been made from time to time to obtain more complete figures of vagrancy than those furnished by the returns of inmates of casual wards. In Gloucestershire, Admiral Christian, the chief constable, has since 1885 taken an annual census of the inmates of common lodging-houses in addition to the inmates of casual wards. This census has been taken on the first Tuesday in April in each year, and has shown males, females, and children, distinguishing them as "known residents" or "strangers." The number of such persons considered to belong to the "tramping" class is also given. The figures will be found in the statement handed in by Admiral Christian. On the 5th April, 1904, out of 465 persons sleeping in common lodging-houses 197 are described as "known residents" and 268 as "strangers." Of the total, 104 were deemed to belong to the tramping class. In the previous year there were 117 out of 475. These figures would seem to establish the fact that in Gloucestershire about one-fourth of the inmates of common lodging-houses were persons of the vagrant class. This census, of course, is not complete, as it takes no account of vagrants passing the night otherwise than in casual wards or common lodging-houses, e.g., sleeping out; but it enables a much better estimate to be obtained of the vagrancy in the county than can be got from the mere casual ward figures. Appendix VIII.

61. A census of another kind has been taken in Northumberland. There the chief constable caused a most careful enumeration to be made, by means of police officers placed at the most important points, of vagrants on the roads between the hours of 7 a.m. and 7 p.m. on the 17th March, 1905. From the particulars thus obtained the chief constable puts the number of vagrants in the county, exclusive of Newcastle and Tynemouth, at 300. As the population of this area is 300,000, this would be 1 vagrant per 1,000 of the population. James, 7519-40. 7548.

Census for the County of London.

62. On two occasions recently the London County Council have caused a census to be taken in their district of the persons who were homeless. Particulars

Appendix IX. of the census will be found in the statement handed in by Sir Shirley Murphy, the medical officer of health of the county of London. On the night of 29th January, 1904, the number of such persons was ascertained to be 1,797; of these 168 were sleeping on staircases, in doorways, or under arches, and the rest were walking the streets.

5726. 63. On the 17th February, 1905, another census of the same kind was taken which gave a total of 2,481. On that night the inmates of casual wards in London numbered 1,139. In addition, there were the vagrants in common lodging-houses, including shelters; on the night in question there were 23,381 inmates of these houses, but only a small proportion of these belong to the vagrant class. Sir Shirley Murphy is of opinion that something approaching 10 per cent. of the lodgers might be assumed to be persons of the vagrant class, using this term to include persons who wander from one house to another, sleeping indoors or out of doors according to their means. This agrees with the proportion stated by the police superintendent of the Whitechapel division.

64. It would appear, therefore, that on the 17th February, 1905, there were about 6,000 persons of the vagrant class in London :—

Homeless -	-	-	-	-	-	-	2,481
In casual wards	-	-	-	-	-	-	1,139
In common lodging-houses, including shelters	-	-	-	-	-	-	2,338
							5,958

Murphy, 5818. It is worthy of note that on the night of each census there was more than sufficient vacant accommodation in the casual wards and common lodging-houses for these "homeless" persons.

Census for Scotland.

65. In Scotland a very full census is taken of vagrants, beggars, migratory poor, etc., on two nights in each year, namely, in June and December. The count is made by the police for each county, city, or burgh, and shows the number of these persons in :—

- (a) prisons or prison cells;
- (b) houses of refuge, hospitals, or poor houses;
- (c) common lodging and other houses;
- (d) public parks or streets, out-houses, or barns, or about pits, brickworks, etc.

McHardy, 6779-80. The nationality of each person counted is given, i.e., Scotch, Irish, English, or foreign, and the number of men, women, and children under fourteen years is given separately. To obtain the particulars the police are required to "challenge" all vagrants. The two counts of 1904 gave the following figures :—

	Men.	Women.	Children.	Total.
26th June	6,286	1,834	1,664	9,784
25th December	5,477	1,414	1,057	7,948

It should be borne in mind that in Scotland there are no casual wards and the vagrant comes more in contact with the police than in this country. It will be seen that the proportion of children is far greater than in the English census of vagrants.

Police Census for England and Wales.

66. Returns were formerly collected by the Home Office from the different police forces showing the number of vagrants known to them. Thus the number was on

1st April, 1867	-	-	-	-	32,528
1st April, 1868	-	-	-	-	36,179

After 1868 this census was discontinued, and until the present year no further census of vagrants has been taken for the whole country. In the introduction to the Judicial Statistics of 1869 some explanation is given of the discontinuance of the census. It is pointed out that the terms "vagrants" and "tramps" are vague and liable to be differently understood, and that the police returns conflict with the returns made by the poor law unions. In the latter returns "only those who receive relief in the workhouse are included, while all vagrants known to the police as professional tramps, or as being without visible means of subsistence or any fixed place of residence, who slept on the night named in the different police districts, whether in the union workhouses, in tramps' lodging-houses or elsewhere, were included in the police returns."

67. In the two years above referred to, the number of persons relieved in the casual wards was on

1st January, 1868	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	6,129

According to these figures casual paupers represented about one-sixth of the total vagrancy of the country.

68. On the night of 7th July, 1905, a census was taken at our request by the different police forces in England and Wales of persons without a settled home or visible means of subsistence (a) in common lodging-houses and (b) elsewhere than in common lodging-houses or casual wards. The returns received when summarised give the following results :—

In common-lodging houses	-	-	-	-	-	-	47,588
Elsewhere than in common lodging-houses or casual wards	-	-	-	-	-	-	14,624
							<hr/> 62,212 <hr/>

These totals are made up as follows :—

Men	-	-	-	-	-	-	41,439	10,750
Women	-	-	-	-	-	-	4,869	2,436
Children	-	-	-	-	-	-	1,280	1,438
							<hr/> 47,588	<hr/> 14,624 <hr/>

69. The number of those returned as being elsewhere than in common lodging-houses and casual wards corresponds closely with the census of 1901, which gave 14,219 as the number of persons found in caravans, barns, &c., or sleeping in the open air, but, as Mr. Preston-Thomas points out, the latter number included a great number of persons who are in no sense tramps. It appears that in some districts large numbers of those who were sleeping out on the night of the July census were engaged in harvesting or other agricultural work. Preston-Thomas, 297.

70. It is the returns of vagrants in common lodging-houses that seem to us to be most open to doubt. It would appear from the returns that in some districts practically all the inmates of the common lodging-houses were included as being "without a settled home or visible means of subsistence." But it is clear that a large proportion of the inmates of common lodging-houses cannot properly be classed as vagrants. We realise that the police would experience great difficulty in discriminating between the different inmates of the lodging-houses, even where they had right of entry to such houses, and in many cases they would have to rely on the statements of the keepers of the lodging-houses. Moreover, it was found impossible to lay down any precise definition of a vagrant, and it would appear that in some districts all casual labourers were included, while one return includes 200 men in regular employment living in lodging-houses kept by the local authority. In London only one-tenth of the inmates of common lodging-houses were considered as vagrants by Sir Shirley Murphy, and it seems to us probable that the police returns have placed the numbers for the country considerably in excess of the actual figure. On the other hand, it is stated in some of the returns that many vagrants who would otherwise be in tramp wards or common lodging-houses were at this particular time engaged in temporary work such as fruit picking or harvesting, and were not included in the count, and that the figures obtained do not therefore fairly represent the average number of vagrants in the country.

On these grounds and from a consideration of the individual returns, we have come to the conclusion that this census cannot be accepted as a trustworthy guide to the actual number of vagrants.

Estimated Number of Vagrants.

71. The estimates which have been made by witnesses and others of the total number of vagrants in England and Wales vary greatly, and in some cases a different basis is taken. Mr. Preston-Thomas says the estimates range from 20,000 to 150,000. Colonel Curtis-Hayward puts the number as 30,000, at which he arrives by taking the proportion of vagrants to population in Gloucestershire and applying it to the whole country. This calculation, however, only takes account of vagrants in casual wards and common lodging-houses, and is therefore incomplete. Captain Fullarton James, chief constable of Northumberland, suggests that the number might be 36,000, or 1 per 1,000 of the population. This was the ratio he established in Northumberland by means of the census taken by him of vagrants on the roads. Mr. Loch puts the figures for this country as between 60,000 and 70,000. He takes as his basis the police census of vagrants in Scotland, and assumes that vagrancy in the two countries would bear the same proportion to the population. His figure comes out to 2 per 1,000 of population. Mr. Lamb gives the number of habitual vagrants in this country as 30,000, while Mr. Willink puts the number at 25,000.

72. As we have previously stated, returns made by the police for the whole of England and Wales showed that on the 1st April in the years 1867 and 1868, the number of vagrants known to them were 32,528 and 36,179. These figures included vagrants in casual wards, and the number of these on the 1st January in the years in question were 5,027 and 6,129, or about one-sixth of the total. Applying this proportion to the casual ward figures, viz., on 1st January, 1904 and 1905 (viz., 8,519 and 9,768), the result would be a total of from 50,000 to 60,000. Admiral Christian considered that the casual ward figures were one-fourth of the total.

73. The census taken by the police on the 7th July, 1905, gave a total of 62,212 persons without a settled home or visible means of subsistence. To this should be added the number of persons of this description in prison, and the number of inmates of casual wards. On the night in question there were 7,478 inmates of casual wards, while the number of this class in prison on the 28th February, 1905, was 4,108. These figures would give a total of 73,798. We have shown, however, that we feel doubts as to the figures obtained by the census of 7th July, and we have alluded to the difficulties of obtaining any reliable statistics of total vagrancy.

74. The only conclusion from the figures at which we arrive is that the number of persons with no settled home and no visible means of subsistence probably reaches, at times of trade depression, as high a total as 70,000 or 80,000, while in times of industrial activity (as in 1900) it might not exceed 30,000 or 40,000. Between these limits the number varies, affected by the conditions of trade, weather, and economic causes. In our Inquiry we are more concerned with the habitual vagrant, that is the class whom trade conditions do not affect. Of this class there is always an irreducible minimum though successive depressions of trade may increasingly swell the numbers. No definite figures as to this permanent class can be obtained, but we are inclined to think that the total number would not exceed 20,000 to 30,000.

Increase in Vagrancy.

75. Abundant proof has come before us of the recent increase in vagrancy. As regards inmates of casual wards the statistics of the Local Government Board show a continuous rise from 1900 to 1905, while the returns we have received from the chief constables of counties show that a similar increase has taken place among vagrants generally. see para. 50. Appendix X.

76. The movements in casual ward figures for the 1st January in each year can be seen most clearly from the chart printed in the Appendix. It will be observed that although the recent rise has lasted five years and has ended in higher figures than ever before recorded, there have been previous rises almost as remarkable. Thus in the four years, 1891 to 1895, the figures rose from 4,960 to 8,810, an increase of 3,850; while the recent rise spread over five years, (1900 to 1905), was from 5,579 to 9,768, an increase of 4,189. The figure reached in 1905 was 958 higher than that of 1895, which was the previous highest for the 1st January, but taking into account the increase of population during the ten years the proportion of vagrancy was about the same in 1905 as in 1895. The war in South Africa and a period of good trade are no doubt largely responsible for the low vagrancy figures reached in 1900; while the rise from that date may perhaps be ascribed to the end of the war and the consequent return to this country of large numbers of reservists and militiamen who resumed their former employments, and to the depression in trade which has been experienced since 1900. We have received evidence that the effect of the Workmen's Compensation Act and the growth of unskilled employment is to increase vagrancy. Appendix VI.

77. The weekly census of inmates of casual wards which, as we have said, was instituted for the first time in 1904, shows that in that year and in 1905 the 1st January totals were greatly exceeded at certain other times during those years, but for purposes of comparison with earlier years we must rely on the 1st January census. It will be seen from the chart giving the fluctuations in 1904 and 1905 that towards the end of 1905 vagrancy showed a tendency to fall. Appendix V.

CHAPTER III.

DESCRIPTION OF VAGRANTS.

78. The term "vagrant" is a very elastic one, and as ordinarily used no precise meaning can be attached to it. Gipsies, hawkers, and pedlars are often included in the term. We do not think, however, that they can properly be considered as vagrants for the purpose of our Inquiry, and a similar observation would apply to those engaged at certain times of the year in hop-picking or fruit-picking. We have received some evidence on the subject and we refer briefly to these classes in Chapter XVI. Among vagrants, who at one time or another are likely to resort to the casual ward, four types may be distinguished.

79. There is, first, the bona fide working man travelling in search of employment. Different estimates have been suggested to us by witnesses of the actual number of this class, varying from 1 to as much as 20 per cent. of the total number of vagrants in casual wards. In the opinion of the workhouse masters' association the proportion is less than 3 per cent. The president of the Poor Law Union's Association puts it at 2 or 3 per cent. Mr. W. Crooks, M.P., did not think it would be more than 1 per cent. in London. He said, "I sometimes go into the ward and talk to the men, and I am bound to say that what you would call men in search of work are rather rare, except that they all declare that they are in search of work; the man whom you really could believe was trying to find work is very rare." In times of trade depression, such as in the last few years, there is no doubt a larger number of genuine working men on tramp, but it seems clear to us that, as a rule, the vagrant who is bona fide in search of work is extremely rare. This view is confirmed by the reluctance of the vagrant to accept work when offered to him, of which we have had ample proof. At times a considerable number of navvies on their way to railway and other works, and of sailors making a journey from one port to another, make use of the vagrant wards. The evidence shows that these men spend their money before looking for other work.

80. We realise that whatever view may be taken of the number of vagrants who are really in search of work it is of the highest importance that every effort should be made to discriminate between them and the ordinary tramps, and the proposal we make in a later part of our report on the subject of way-tickets is directed to this end.

81. Secondly, there are the men who are willing to undertake casual labour for a short time but object to, or are unfit for, any continued work. They are among the first to lose employment on any falling off in trade and the last to be employed when conditions improve. As a rule, they will never work more than two or three days a week, living the other days by begging or cadging. The vagrant of this class is usually a man who has been unable to keep his employment from idleness, want of skill, drinking habits, or general incapacity, or perhaps from some physical disability. As time goes on, he succumbs to the influence of his demoralising mode of life and falls into the ranks of the habitual vagrant. We believe there is much truth in the saying "Once on the road, always on the road," and under present conditions the casual workman who takes to the road is almost certain sooner or later to join the ranks of habitual vagrancy, and it is most important that every effort should be made by a uniform enforcement of the regulations to deter him from continuing on the road.

82. A third class is the habitual vagrant, the man who may be professedly in search of work, but who certainly has no desire to find it. In a sense he belongs to the criminal class, for in so far as he depends on casual wards for his lodging, and there can be no doubt that the less successful of the fraternity are largely dependent on them, he commits a criminal offence under section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, as having refused or neglected to maintain himself, and becoming in consequence chargeable to Poor Law funds. Moreover, professional begging must inevitably become a form of obtaining money, clothes, or victuals by false pretences ; the money may be obtained in very small sums, but great ingenuity is sometimes shown in the mode by which it is obtained. We have heard of one beggar who obtained 12s. 6d. in a day by carrying about a letter which he represented as being addressed to a dying brother and asking for a penny for a stamp to put on it. We have been told that the successful London street beggar makes as much as 5s. a day, and it appears to us that tramps of this type are not to be distinguished in principle from the swindlers who achieve a wider notoriety by the audacity or the extent of their fraudulent operations.

83. Great numbers of this "work-shy" class follow in the track of the navy when new works of any magnitude are in progress, not to seek employment, but to prey upon the navy, who is generally very liberal when he has money. The statement that they are on their way to obtain employment affords a plausible excuse for begging. This is the class, too, who swarm to any place where new public charity is started ; they are the first to avail themselves of free shelters or free meals, and to a large extent oust the genuine unemployed from the benefits intended for them. As witnesses say, the existence of this class gives rise to the greatest difficulty when any attempt is made to deal with the question of the unemployed. They include in their number many loafers who do not wander much, but stay in one town and are a constant trouble to the police, the Poor Law, and the prison authorities. In the Appendix will be found lists of such men. One man has been convicted no less than nineteen times in eleven years, and eight times has received a sentence of one year as an incorrigible rogue. In addition to being a constant source of trouble to the police, these loafers may constitute a serious public danger.

84. The fourth class of vagrants consists of old and infirm persons who wander about to their own hurt ; they are "unemployable," and crawl from vagrant ward to vagrant ward, only entering the workhouse infirmaries when they are compelled to do so ; many of them are crazy, all of them live by begging, and they give much trouble to police and magistrates. We refer to this class in Chapter XIV.

85. The witnesses who have given evidence before us agree that the vagrant class as a whole is not much addicted to the worst forms of crime, but minor offences are very common. Petty larcenies and robberies from the back doors of houses are frequently committed by vagrants. What is known in Scotland as the "masterful beggar," who extorts alms by threats, chiefly by intimidating the woman in the cottage in the absence of her husband, is always a vagrant, and there is evidence that in parts of England this offence is rife. Cases of assaults by tramps on the highways frequently occur, and there is no doubt that in certain districts the tramp is a source of terror to women and children. More serious offences, such as rick-firing and robbery by violence, are often attributed to vagrants, while as inmates of the casual wards their offences against the law are continual. These generally take the form of refusing to work, destroying clothes, or window breaking. The proportion of vagrants who are repeatedly convicted of offences of a minor kind is very large indeed. The chief constable of Northumberland states that there is an enormous proportion of convictions among the vagrant classes of that county, looking to their probable numbers ; in fact, on an average every vagrant in Northumberland is committed to prison once a year, whereas convictions among the ordinary population only average about 25 per 1,000. The statement furnished to us by the chief constable of Berkshire shows that in that county in 1904 over 44 per cent. of the persons apprehended without warrant were vagrants. The number of prisoners of the vagrant class, according to the estimate we obtained from the Prison Commissioners, is about one-fourth of the whole prison population. It is clear, therefore, that as a criminal the vagrant is a source of considerable trouble.

86. The majority of vagrants are in the able-bodied period of life, and the number below the age of sixteen or above the age of sixty-five is very small. Out of 2,696 vagrants who came to Exeter workhouse in the year ended March, 1904, 1,562 were men under forty-five years old ; while only 130 were over sixty-five and only 45 were children under sixteen. We have received evidence to the effect that the average London vagrant is older than the country man. A return made to the Local Government Board for the whole country shows that 70 per cent. of the vagrants were between thirty-five and sixty-five years old. As the ages were given by the vagrants themselves these figures are only approximately accurate, but there is no doubt as to the general result. There are very few children or youths among them, and we have no information to show that the often repeated statement that tramps breed tramps has much foundation in fact. On the contrary, it is probable that few tramp women become parents after they have once taken to the road.

87. If we next consider the conditions of life for the vagrant class we find abundant evidence that vagrants are not an ill-fed class; they can always obtain food by begging, and they frequently bring broken victuals into the casual wards, which they prefer to the diet given there. The opinion of those who see the vagrants in their bath is that their bodies are, as a rule, well nourished. It also appears that vagrants of all descriptions are much better clad than they used to be, and as a rule their boots are sound. Formerly the vagrant wards were infested with vermin, and a large proportion of the vagrants suffered from itch and other skin diseases. Now the vagrant who frequents casual wards is regularly bathed and has a much higher standard of cleanliness. But in other respects the characteristics of the class have not changed for the better. The modern tramp, as a rule, lives an unsocial and wretched sort of existence. He has no object in life, and his very contentment with his miserable surroundings renders any improvement in his condition practically hopeless. It may be truly said that he exists "poor, nasty, mean, solitary, brutish," or, as another authority has described him, "sine re, sine spe, sine fide, sine sede." The man of the type of the poet's "jolly beggar" appears to be nearly extinct.

Low as is the standard of comfort of the ordinary vagrant, that of the class of people who frequent the charitable shelters or habitually "sleep out" in London and other large towns is still lower. The casual pauper is at least clean, while the man who sleeps in his clothes at a shelter, or passes the night on a staircase, is often verminous and always filthy. These people seldom or never go to casual wards, and they can only find a living in very large towns.

CHAPTER IV.

CASUAL WARDS.

Existing System.

88. Diversity of practice in the different unions is the most striking characteristic of the present system. We have obtained returns from the several boards of guardians which illustrate this very clearly, and it has to be remembered that the diversity is no doubt in fact greater than is shewn by Appendix XIII. these returns. Summaries of them are printed in the Appendix.

89. Before a vagrant enters a casual ward he has to obtain an order for admission either from a relieving officer or from the assistant relieving officer for vagrants, who is either a policeman or, in the case of small unions, an officer of the workhouse. In a case of sudden or urgent necessity the master admits a vagrant without an order. The hours of admission vary to some extent. Generally speaking, a vagrant is not admitted before 4 p.m. in the winter or 6 p.m. in the summer, nor after 9 p.m., but vagrants who go to the workhouse after that time are generally admitted, as, if illness occurred, the master might be held responsible for his refusal to admit. The regulations contained in the Order of the Local Government Board dated the 18th December, 1882, require that on admission the vagrant shall be searched, and in almost every case this is done, though not always very carefully. If any money is found, it should in strictness be paid to the treasurer of the union, but as a rule a vagrant is allowed to keep any small sum he may have on him. Very frequently the tramp brings in broken food; in some cases this is returned to him on his discharge, and in others he is allowed to eat it in the ward. Pipes, tobacco, and other small articles are returned to the vagrant on his discharge. Appendix II.

90. As soon as practicable after admission the vagrant is required to "be cleansed in a bath with water of suitable temperature." In large workhouses where there is an abundant supply of water, fresh water of a high temperature would probably be given to each man, but in many country workhouses the bathing arrangements are somewhat primitive, and the water is not changed for each person, nor is it more than tepid. A hot bath is deemed a luxury by many casuals, whereas a tepid one is disliked. When bathing was first introduced, it was found very effective in diminishing the number of vagrants, but at the present time this deterrent effect has passed off, and there is evidence that many tramps resort to wards where the bathing arrangements are good, in order to get the bath. An incidental advantage of the bathing is that it gives an opportunity for the detection of smallpox or any other infectious disease, from which the vagrant may be suffering. The regulations require that after the bath the vagrant's clothes shall be taken away from him and, if requisite, dried and disinfected, and a nightshirt provided. This is done in most cases.

91. Ever since the year 1871 the Local Government Board have put steady pressure upon boards of guardians to provide wards on the cellular system, on the ground that cells, while being deterrent to the habitual vagrant, relieve the bona fide wayfarer of the necessity of associating with him. In 434 unions wards under this system have been built, while in 204 unions there are no separate cells. The minimum dimensions of the cells, according to the requirements of the Local Government Board, are as follows:—height, 10 feet; length, 9 feet; and width, 4 feet.* It is usual to have a working cell opening out of the ordinary cell, with a grid through which the stone broken by the vagrant can be passed. Even where separate cells are provided it is generally found expedient to have an associated ward for emergencies to meet any sudden increase in the numbers. The habitual vagrant much prefers bad accommodation with laxity of control to a well-appointed cell and strict discipline. Preston-Thomas, 104, 494. Appendix XIII. Kitchin, 10087-8. Mitchell, 1865. Lockwood, 10487.

92. In most of the more recent wards the sleeping accommodation consists of a hammock or a wire bed with a mattress, together with a sufficient amount of rugs ; the cells are, as a rule, warmed with hot water pipes. The regulations provide that there shall be a bell in each cell. In the poorer unions, where the separate cell system has not been adopted, vagrants sleep in associated wards, either in hammocks, on straw mattresses or, in some cases, plank beds. The Local Government Board discourage plank beds, and they are now somewhat rare. Whether they are a hardship or not depends upon the sufficiency of the rugs provided, a matter which is very much in the hands of the superintendent.

93. Where the regulations are carried out the casual pauper is, as a general rule, detained two nights. On the day after his admission he has to do a task of work which has been sanctioned by the Local Government Board. The tasks are extremely diverse, the most usual being stone breaking, wood sawing, wood chopping, flint pounding, corn grinding, pumping and digging, and oakum picking. The task is supposed to represent nine hours' work. The Local Government Board have made considerable efforts to ensure that the task is fair to the vagrant and sufficiently hard to be a deterrent, but the evidence seems to show that they have not been successful in attaining this object. The object of the task was in the first instance not only to deter the vagrant, but to obtain some return from him for the cost of his food and lodging. The cost of the vagrant's food is so small, probably not exceeding 4d. for each person detained two nights, that in many cases where the tramp is put to a useful task he more than repays the cost. The inherent difficulty of arranging tasks fairly is that most of the work is necessarily to some extent skilled labour. For instance, a task of stone breaking or oakum picking which would be impossible for the beginner is mere child's play to the sturdy vagrant who has served a long apprenticeship in gaols and work-houses. Moreover, the quality of the oakum varies, and so does the hardness of the stones; and it is more difficult to break a hundredweight of hard granite than a ton of sandstone. Flints and boulders present very varying degrees of hardness, and it is thus quite impossible to prescribe tasks of work for all the unions in the country which shall be in any degree uniform. At present the regulations prescribe several alternative tasks, and any departure from these requires the sanction of the Local Government Board ; but we cannot find that there is any real uniformity in the tasks, while in many wards the task is not enforced. Refusal to perform task is a frequent offence among casual paupers ; in many cases the man pleads that he is unfit to do the work, and in that case a medical certificate as to his fitness is obtained by the guardians before taking proceedings against him. As regards stone breaking, it may be mentioned that in many wards eye-guards are supplied to the vagrants while engaged in this work. We think that this is a proper precaution.

94. The regulations provide that the vagrant shall be discharged at 9 a.m. on the second day after admission, but usually he can go, if he wishes, at any time after 6 a.m. Where a vagrant is detained for one night only, he is required to do a task representing only three hours' work, and is generally allowed to leave at 11 a.m. Where he is admitted to a casual ward for the second time in a month he is liable to be detained four nights. The power of detention which the guardians possess in such cases is but rarely used, and we find that out of a total number of admissions during the year ended September, 1904, of 2,156,975 there were only 19,824 detentions for four nights, and of these 16,060 were in London. Further, the general rule to detain all vagrants two nights is little observed. The Order itself empowers the guardians to give the master or superintendent of the wards directions to discharge at an earlier time any particular class of casual paupers, and the master or superintendent has also power to allow any casual pauper to leave if he thinks fit. It is much easier to discharge a vagrant than to detain him and make him work ; and consequently in many unions the tendency is to discharge as soon as possible. Where a union carries out the regulations as to detention and task of work, there is always a reduction in the number of admissions to their casual wards, but the evidence before us shows that severity of discipline in one union may merely cause the vagrants to frequent other unions.

95. On the evening of admission the vagrant receives his supper, which under the Order is to consist of 8 ounces of bread, or 6 ounces of bread and 1 pint of gruel or broth; the same ration is provided for breakfast and supper on the next day and for breakfast on the morning of his leaving the wards. His mid-day meal on the day after admission consists of 8 ounces of bread and $1\frac{1}{2}$ ounces of cheese, or 6 ounces of bread and 1 pint of soup. The Order provides that these dietaries may be revised by the guardians with the sanction of the Local Government Board, but we understand that it is now the practice of the Board to refuse any variation from this scale. It is evident that to a vagrant accustomed to a hard life and scanty fare there is a great difference between getting hot gruel in the evening and soup in the middle of the day, or having dry bread only or bread and cheese. In 374 unions he gets nothing but bread for breakfast and supper, and in 240 gruel or broth is given with bread. For the mid-day meal 474 unions give only bread and cheese, while 115 give soup or broth. The regulations therefore do not secure uniformity in so simple a matter as feeding the vagrant, and in many cases it appears that guardians give a dietary not authorised by the regulations. Any improvement in the diet of a particular ward invariably attracts tramps at once, and the habituels well know where to go for the best meals. On the other hand, some witnesses contend that the dietary of the casual wards is insufficient. We consider this question in Chapter VIII.

Burgess, 2523.
Poulton, 4683.
Fleming, 4934.

96. If a casual pauper is ill he is entitled to the attendance of the medical officer of the workhouse, and in case of severe illness he would be taken into the workhouse for treatment as an ordinary pauper. An inmate of the casual wards who is sick or infirm may receive a special diet and be exempted from the task of work.

97. Women and children are received into the casual wards, there being female attendants—frequently inmates—to look after them. Infants go into the same cell as their mother. The women's wards are separated from those appropriated to the men. The dietary for women is similar to that for men, but there is a special dietary for children and infants which includes an allowance of milk. Generally the treatment of women casuals does not differ materially from that of the men, except that the task enforced consists chiefly of washing and cleaning. Oakum picking is now discouraged by the Local Government Board as a task for women.

98. There is no complete information as to the cost of casual wards outside London. The actual cost of the food, as we state above, is but small; the buildings, however, are expensive in many cases. In London, the total cost comes out to 1s. 8½d. per day for each casual pauper. A statement prepared by the Local Government Board shows that during the half year ended Lady-Day, 1905, £24,226 was expended on "in-maintenance" in casual wards in England and Wales. This probably does not include much besides food.

Appendix V.

99. It may be added that the condition of the casual wards has immensely improved of late years. In some cases there are new wards, which are almost luxurious in their style and equipment. Between them and the older specimens of the associated ward there is a great difference, but all are now clean and habitable. The treatment the vagrant receives in the casual wards is largely dependent upon the particular board of guardians and the superintendent of the wards, and the consequence is that there is variation between different wards in every possible detail.

London Casual Wards.

100. Under the provisions of the Metropolitan Houseless Poor Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict., ch. 116, sec. 5) it is the duty of boards of guardians in the Metropolis, where no adequate accommodation exists, to "provide within their respective unions or parishes, such wards or other places of reception for destitute wayfarers and foundlings as the [Local Government] Board, having regard to the number of persons likely to require relief therein respectively, shall direct." In default of making such provision, the guardians are not entitled to charge the cost of vagrants to the common poor fund of the Metropolis. Under the provisions of this statute twenty-eight of the thirty-one boards of guardians in London have provided casual wards, and the total accommodation amounts to 1,248 beds for males, 449 single beds for females, and 119 double beds for mothers and children. The vagrant wards are in most cases detached from the workhouses and under the charge of a superintendent. In nearly every case they are provided with separate cells.

Lockwood, 10442. 101. The whole of the Metropolis is, under the Order of 1882, considered as one union so far as the relief of casual paupers is concerned, so that any vagrant resorting more than once a month to casual wards in the Metropolis is liable to be detained for four nights. To enable the guardians to carry out this provision there has been since 1871 a staff of visiting officers, appointed by the Local Government Board. These officers regularly inspect the wards and identify the vagrants who are liable to detention. There were 17,801 identifications in 1904, and 16,060 cases were detained for four nights. Some vagrants are detained many times in the same year. Not all the vagrants who are identified are detained, for the superintendent acting under the direction or influence of the guardians, or on his own discretion, exercises a power of discharge.

102. The London casual pauper involves a heavy charge. We discuss in Chapter IX. the excessive cost of the casual ward buildings. During the year ended Lady Day, 1905, the total expenditure charged on the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund in respect of casual wards, which included repayment of loans, maintenance of wards, officers' salaries, etc., amounted to over £35,000. Taking the average number of inmates as 1,134 this represents a daily cost of 1s. 8½d. per head. In one ward the average cost was 4s. 9d. a day.

Crooks, 5403. 103. The administration of the London casual wards, so far as bathing and search are concerned, is generally uniform. The dietary differs in one respect from that for the rest of the country, as the regulations require that in all cases a pint of hot gruel or hot broth shall be given to males over fifteen for breakfast and supper. With one or two exceptions there is the same dietary throughout London. But with regard to detention and task, there is no uniformity whatever. The Inspector for the Metropolis said "there is no real uniformity even in London; some guardians do not detain, some give one task, some another, and some practically none at all." He Lockwood, 10445, 10451. added that the guardians are guided by what they conceive to be their own interests, and in many instances by sentiment. Mr. Simmons, the superintendent visiting officer of the London wards, says—

Simmons, 3257. "There are twenty-eight casual wards and there are twenty-eight authorities for working them. Each board of guardians has a different opinion upon some point or another. Some boards of guardians say the casu-als are working-men honestly looking for work, and there is no doubt they are, but they know where they are going to get it. When they leave they know to what casual ward they are going, and whether they are going to break stones or pick oakum."

3265-73. The consequence is that the London vagrant flocks to Poplar, Thavies Inn, and the other wards where detention and work are not enforced, or where only a light task is given.

3400-10. 104. The Local Government Board publish annually a table in which is set out the number of refusals to admit on account of want of room at the various casual wards in London. In 1904 there were 21,367 refusals altogether, and two-thirds of these were in five wards. These wards were Thavies Inn (City of London union), which is an association ward; Marylebone, which Mr. Simmons describes as "a nice easy place, only a little oakum to pick; you pick as much as you like"; Poplar, where there is "no work at all"; Whitechapel, where there is an association ward, and the work is only oakum picking; and Hackney, where at that time the accommodation was obviously insufficient. On the other hand, at Chelsea and St. Pancras, where the detention and task are rigidly enforced, there have been no refusals from want of accommodation for the last seven years. No stronger illustration could be provided of the encouragement to tramps which lax administration affords.

Lockwood, 10488. 105. At the popular London wards the vagrants begin to assemble quite early in the day and hang about until the wards are open. They are then selected by the superintendent in various ways; sometimes he takes the first comer, sometimes he takes, say, every third man. Owing to complaints by the neighbours, in some cases the guardians have had to establish a waiting shed outside the wards. At some wards again the superintendent finds it convenient, when the wards are full, to put up a notice stating the fact, but this practice has been prohibited by the Local Government Board, partly because it interfered with their return of the number of refusals from want of room, and partly because it was thought to favour the habitual at the expense of the genuine wayfarer who arrived late. Lockwood, 10489-91.

106. The provision of the Houseless Poor Act, which makes it necessary for the guardians of each union to provide casual wards within the union, has precluded any general arrangement of wards in the most convenient situations throughout London. Mr. Simmons considers the present casual ward accommodation to be more than sufficient, and he points out that when there were only twenty-four wards the refusals were less than they are now. He says that he has never known a case where a vagrant who has been refused admission to the casual wards has been obliged to sleep out. They either make their way to another ward or pay for a lodging. Many of them apparently have money left at what they call "leaving places" in case of an emergency. Simmons, 3456. 3417. 3415.

107. A large and apparently increasing proportion of vagrants commit offences in the London casual wards, and are brought before the magistrates for refusing to work or for tearing up their clothes. A careful record of the number of convictions in these cases has been kept by Mr. Simmons. During the last five years the number has been :—

1901	-	-	-	692 „
1902	-	-	-	857 „
1903	-	-	-	991 „
1904	-	-	-	1,167 „

During the same period the number of casual paupers has only increased slightly, and no change has taken place in the administration of the casual wards. In the Appendix is given a list of the convictions of some London vagrants for offences in casual wards. The summary of the eight cases given shows that within the last few years the men were convicted from nineteen to thirty-three times, in many instances the sentence being twelve months. Mr. Simmons informed us that there were many similar cases. It is clear from these figures that certain men deliberately commit offences in order to be sent to prison. To many of these men prison seems to afford a desirable change to the casual ward. It does not appear that in other respects the habitué of the London casual wards is a criminal, and in Mr. Simmons's opinion he is not a professional beggar. A curious fact is that a vagrant of this type appears to dislike going to the workhouse much more than he dislikes going to prison. Mr. Simmons explains this by saying that in prison the man is "better treated and "has less work to do. If he went to a workhouse he would be classed as an "able-bodied man; he would have his work to do, and that would not suit him." Appendix XI. Simmons, 3322-42. 3298. 3437.

108. This class of vagrant prefers the casual ward to the workhouse, and many of them would rather remain in the streets than enter a workhouse. The casual wards in London have greatly improved of late years, and are now clean and comfortable places, and, in fact, seem to be much appreciated by the habitual tramp who looks upon them as his home. This sort of man would greatly object to the loss of liberty involved by going into the workhouse; even if he uses the casual wards every night, and is detained the full period on each admission, he can get one or two days liberty each week in which to loaf and receive charity. Mr. Simmons says, "I do not think there are many old tramps who do not sleep in a tramp ward every night." He quotes one vagrant—a man who carried boards—as saying that he could not get a lodging elsewhere so good as in the casual wards :— 3392-3.

"I have got a nice hot supper, a nice hot bath, a nice clean bunk to sleep in, and a clean shirt to put on, and when I come in here I know what I bring in, and I know what I am going to take out."

Mr. Simmons thinks that if casual wards were abolished, many of those who frequent them would get work rather than go into the workhouse. 3459.

Simmons, 3465.

109. The same witness gives a quaint illustration of the London tramps' view of the ordinary workhouse pauper :—

“ They do not mind being in the casual ward, but they do object to the ordinary pauper. Here is an instance : I went into a casual ward one morning ; one of the ordinary inmates of the workhouse whose duty it was to see that the hammers and things used for breaking stones were all right, happened to say something to one of the casuals who was breaking stones. The casual laid his hammer down, and looked the inmate up and down two or three times, and then said, ‘ Are you speaking to me, pauper ? ’ ‘ Yes,’ he said, ‘ I am speaking to you.’ ‘ Well,’ said the casual, ‘ all I have got to say is, you ought to be ashamed of yourself. I am here generally three months in the year ; the other nine months I work, but no matter when I come you are always here. You are always living on the ratepayers ; I am content to live on them for three months in the year. I am not a pauper ; I am a casual.’ ”

110. The frequenter of the London casual wards seems to be a class by himself. He has a higher standard of comfort than the country vagrant, and looks down on the man who frequents shelters. Attracted perhaps by the comparative comfort and cleanliness of the wards, he apparently seldom or never sleeps out or goes to a shelter. Once in London he finds it so comfortable that he remains there, except perhaps for an occasional expedition into the country for hop-picking. If he is not in a casual ward he is in prison, and detention which acts as a strong deterrent in the country appears to be ineffective in London, even where the detention is extended to four nights. The reason for this may be that the wards are better in London than in the country, and that the vagrant in the country generally has some objective, but in London he simply goes round and round from ward to ward. A list was given to us of 950 habitual tramps who practically live in the London casual wards. Their ages are considerably higher than those of country casual paupers, more than half both of the men and women being over sixty years. These persons remain casual paupers until they die or until their infirmities compel them to go into the workhouse.

111. In material well-being, however, the London casual pauper has apparently much improved of recent years. The standard of comfort set by the casual wards has put him out of reach of the degradation of the free shelters, and he generally appears to be well fed. He finds no difficulty in getting good food when outside the casual wards, and so much is given to him in the streets by the poorer classes, particularly in the East End, that the bread served out in the casual wards in the East of London is rarely eaten by him. Mr. Simmons says—“ You would be astonished if you went into the bath room to-night to see the habitual tramps with their well-nourished bodies.”

112. Mr. Lockwood and Mr. Simmons think that a uniform enforcement of the regulations would greatly reduce the number of casual paupers, but that uniformity in London could not be secured by any means short of transferring the management of the wards to one authority.

113. In the two preceding parts of this chapter we have described the existing system of casual wards in the country generally and in London in particular. It is clear to us that the present system neither repels nor reforms the vagrant. It is agreed that the essential condition of success is uniformity of administration, but the evidence is overwhelming to the effect that this object is not attained. In most cases the Orders of the Local Government Board are evaded and in many absolutely disregarded. Mr. Curtis, clerk to the King's Norton guardians says :—“ In my judgment the present measures have totally failed to achieve their object . . . my experience leads me to the conclusion “ that in a number of unions the administration of the Casual Poor Acts and “ regulations is practically a dead letter.”

114. There are 638 casual wards in England and Wales ; in many of them tramps are not regularly bathed or searched ; in many more the two nights' detention is not enforced, while in some no task of work is required at all. It is of course much easier, as we have already said, for a workhouse master or the superintendent of a casual ward to allow vagrants to discharge themselves on the morning after admission without labour, than to detain them and insist upon their doing the regulation task of work ; and the discretion which is left to the officers with respect to the discharge of certain classes of vagrants results in a complete variety of practice. The wards also vary in diet and every other respect. In these circumstances, it is not surprising to find that the present methods of treating vagrants have not succeeded in checking vagrancy.

115. The evidence also shows the practical impossibility of obtaining uniformity under the present system. It is clear that this must be the result when the administration is in the hands of over 600 independent authorities who are actuated by no common principle except the desire to get rid of the vagrant as cheaply as possible.

116. It has been suggested that more uniformity might be secured if the regulations were amended in the direction of substituting time-work for piece-work ; of allowing only one dietary instead of permitting the guardians to choose between two, as at present ; and of taking away from the guardians and their officers all discretion as to discharges before the prescribed time. These changes would, no doubt, have the effect of obtaining considerable uniformity of administration, but there is no likelihood of their being generally carried out. There is no means of obtaining uniformity at present, and if stricter requirements were introduced the difficulty would be increased. To require absolute uniformity in a matter such as the administration of casual wards, from so large a number of poor law authorities varying from each other in almost every possible detail, would involve so much interference by the Central Authority as to render the scheme impracticable. It would in practice be found impossible to exercise the pressure which would be necessary to secure compliance with any particular requirements. After careful consideration of all the circumstances, we are convinced that the Local Government Board would have no means at its disposal of securing the desired result.

117. There is another point. Witnesses are agreed as to the advantages of providing separate cells, but the additional buildings required for this purpose and to enable the guardians to carry out the provisions of the Orders as to detention, would be very costly, and some unions could not afford to provide them. In other Poor Law matters the expenditure, as a rule, bears some proportion to the rateable value of the union, but in the matter of the casual wards and vagrants this is not so, and there are many instances of very poor unions, the workhouses of which happen to be on main roads much infested by vagrants, where the applicants for casual relief are consequently very numerous. It can hardly be expected that there should be the same treatment of vagrants in a union like Rothbury, with 6,000 inhabitants and an area of 167,000 acres, as there is in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, with a population of 233,000 in an area of 7,000 acres ; and similar contrasts between adjacent unions occur in almost every county in England. In many small unions, too, there is only one male officer in the workhouse and this fact prevents any proper control of the vagrants in the casual wards. The retention of the union area for dealing with vagrancy is thus a formidable obstacle in the way of uniformity.

118. Neither can the present system be commended on the ground of economy. It is true that the actual cost of the casual pauper's food is trifling, but other expenses involved make his maintenance a heavy charge. We refer in Chapter IX. to the great expenditure incurred in providing casual wards, and in the present chapter we have shown that the total cost of the London casual pauper is extremely high.

Transfer to Police Authorities.

120. We are of opinion that the alteration we suggest in the preceding paragraph can best be effected by the substitution of the police authority for the Poor Law authority as the body responsible for the local relief of vagrants and the management of casual wards. We have considered in detail the difficulties in the way of this change, and on the whole we see no reason to doubt that, if the importance of effecting it is once realised, the necessary adjustments can be made without serious friction.

121. Some witnesses have urged that casual wards should be abolished, but we cannot agree to this proposal. Whatever results may ensue from changes made in consequence of our recommendations, we see no likelihood of its being possible to dispense altogether with casual wards for the reception of needy wayfarers, at all events for some years.

122. Various other suggestions have been made to us, but they appear to be at least as much open to objection, and to be less likely to secure uniformity in administration. For instance, it has been suggested that the guardians in each county might combine for the administration of the casual wards, the cost of the latter being imposed on the county. This would mean the setting up of a new authority for the purpose. To this there are many objections; much additional cost would be involved, and difficulties in administration would inevitably occur between the individual boards of guardians and the joint body. Even if such combinations did attain the end of getting a uniform administration of the wards in a county, there would be no means of obtaining a uniform system as between different counties and the police part of the question would be left untouched. We feel, therefore, that we could give no support to a proposal of this character.

123. Again, it is suggested that uniformity could be secured and some sort of co-operation between the police and the Poor Law authorities could be established, if a sum of, say, 5d. a day for each vagrant were paid from the Exchequer to the guardians on the certificate of the standing joint committee, or the chief constable of the county, that the wards were sufficiently good and properly administered. We do not, however, consider that we could recommend such a system for adoption. It would involve various complications, and, apart from the fact that we are opposed to any grant in aid of local taxation for this purpose, we feel that in practice there would be great difficulties in arranging and carrying out such a scheme, and there would be undoubtedly a risk of considerable friction between the county and union authorities.

124. It is important to note that the proposal to place vagrants under the care of the police is not a new one. The Inspectors of the Local Government Board and their predecessors have, as indicated in Chapter I., from time to time urged this transfer* and it has frequently been suggested at Poor Law conferences and meetings of guardians. Mr. Howe said that the opinion of workhouse masters was that vagrants should be transferred from the guardians to the police. And this view is held by many other witnesses. They agree that under police control uniformity of administration could be obtained. Mr. John Hutton, M.P., said "I would much rather trust to the discipline and management of the police, than of the present country workhouse master and his assistants."

"So bad and so badly founded is the present system, that I can see no remedy in anything short of its total abandonment. For scarcely can any doctrine be held out to the loose and indolent member of society more vicious as respects him and the community than that which teaches him to have any reliance for support other than on his own hands. The belief resulting from all my inquiries and experience on this subject is that at the least ninety out of every hundred occupants of the tramp wards have no claim on the honest poor man's fund. And dealing with these is assuredly the province of the police, whose power is still constantly required in their ultimate disposal, and by whom they are often referred back to the Poor Law officers. This bandying of tramps from one authority to another and shifting on the Poor Law officers the responsibility of dealing with characters for whom the law has always contemplated punishment rather than encouragement, is, in my opinion, the main cause of this great evil. And the returning again the control of vagrants to the lawful authority, is not only the most obvious, but the most proper course which I can suggest."

125. From the point of view of principle we think that the duty of providing food and lodging to needy wayfarers is one that might quite as properly devolve upon the police as on the guardians. Mr. Preston-Thomas says "If we were beginning again, I imagine that we should put the tramp under the police, because it is mainly qua vagrant and not qua pauper that he has to be treated." In Scotland the poor law authorities have no such duty to perform, and in some places, notably Glasgow, the police carry out work of this kind, though under no statutory authority.* In England the regulation of houseless persons has from early times been regarded as a police duty, and it appears to have been a mere accident that Poor Law authorities, whose main duties are in relation to the poor settled in their own neighbourhood, should have been burdened with responsibility for the care of persons travelling from other and often distant districts. As we have already pointed out, the care of the vagrant may be regarded rather as an excrescence on the Poor Law than an integral part of the system. We have received evidence to the effect that guardians generally would be glad to be relieved of this responsibility. The vagrant is frequently a source of considerable trouble in the administration of the workhouse, and his removal would leave the guardians and their officers a much freer hand in dealing with the ordinary poor. On these grounds, and having regard to the character of most of those who avail themselves of the casual wards, we have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that vagrants are more suitable subjects for the care of the police authorities than of the Poor Law authorities.

126. Several objections have been brought against any such change, of which the following appear to be the more important :—

- (i) That in view of the close association between the police and the criminal classes, it would be unfair to the bona fide wayfarer to give the police control over the building in which he may have to seek his night's lodging.

Poulton, 4773.
10567.

We do not think there is any substance in this objection. In the first place, the evidence shows that the bona fide wayfarer supplies but a very small proportion of the total number of vagrants, and we have no reason to suppose that the police would treat this class in any way more harshly than is done under the present system. Indeed, we recommend a much more efficient system of relief for the work-seeker than exists at present, and we think he might properly look to the police for assistance and guidance on his way. Again, the detection and prevention of crime is only one—though no doubt the most conspicuous—of the multifarious duties performed by the police. For instance, the granting of pedlars' licences, the billeting of soldiers on the march, the regulation of traffic, the work done in connection with the licensing of public houses and with coroners' inquests, and the impounding of stray cattle, are a few examples of work which brings the police into contact with every class of the community, in addition to their functions in the general preservation of order. It may be mentioned, too, that in 36 counties the police now act as assistant relieving officers for vagrants, and orders for admission to the casual wards are obtained from them. Having given this matter careful consideration, we have come unanimously to the conclusion that no hardship whatever would be inflicted on the honest wayfarer by making it necessary for him to seek shelter at a place where the police authority has control rather than at one controlled by the Poor Law authority. On the contrary, we consider that under the system we suggest such a man may pass to his destination with a guarantee of character and a protection which no authority could furnish so efficiently as the police, while to the habitual vagrant the transfer to police supervision will no doubt be a deterrent.

See para. 79.

- (ii) That the police would be taken away from their proper duties by having to look after vagrants.

* The Scottish Departmental Committee on Habitual Offenders (1894) recommended that "the police authorities should be empowered to grant temporary relief to the extent of a night's lodging and food to the necessitous homeless and travelling poor where they think it expedient to do so, and that they should also have power to exact, if they think right, a labour equivalent from those that are able to work."

As to this, it will be seen from our proposals that it is not intended that any great burden should be put on the active members of the police force. And it must be remembered that habitual vagrants, who constitute a large proportion of the vagrant class, are often potential criminals, and the police might be greatly helped in the prevention and detection of crime by having the whole class under their surveillance.

- (iii) That the existence of casual wards, which have been built at great cost by the guardians and are their property, renders the proposal impracticable.

We do not think any insuperable difficulty need be experienced in this respect. We propose that the existing wards should, as far as possible, be hired from the guardians, and we contemplate that it will only be necessary in exceptional cases to provide fresh wards.

James, 7707.

127. Apart from the question of principle and the question whether the police will be aided in the discharge of their ordinary duties by being brought into relation with the inmates of the casual wards, there are strong practical reasons for the proposed change. The evidence is unanimous to the effect that uniformity in the administration of the casual wards is most necessary, and we have no doubt that within each police area at least uniformity can be secured by giving the control of the wards to the police, while the powers of the Home Office with regard to the local police forces can by a slight change in the law be easily and effectively utilised for promoting uniformity as between one county and another. In fact we consider that it is only through the police that this end can be attained.

128. When we come to consider the subject of way-tickets, it will be seen that no system could be made universal without throwing on the police a very special responsibility in respect of vagrants, and this consideration of itself is a strong argument in favour of the proposed change.

129. But apart from placing the vagrant directly under the control of the police, which we consider the most important point, there are other reasons which lead us to the conclusion that the police authority should be selected as the body to deal with vagrants. The extension of the area of chargeability and administration which we also consider necessary can best be secured by making the county the area. We do not think it necessary or advisable that a new authority should be established for the purpose, and of the existing authorities in the county the standing joint committee (the police authority) is obviously the most suitable. It is composed equally of members elected by the county council and of representatives of the magistrates. It already has the control of the county police and obtains through the county council the necessary funds. It is, therefore, the natural body to have control of this further work which we propose should be assigned to the police, and could undertake it more easily than any other authority. Another point in favour of the standing joint committee is that the magistrates sitting in petty sessions have the subject of vagrancy constantly brought to their notice in a concrete form ; many of them are, as we know, keenly interested in the question ; many, again, as members of the visiting committees of local prisons have experience of actual administrative work which, at some points, is brought into close connection with the administration of casual wards.

130. The standing joint committee would be able to secure a much better arrangement of wards in the county than at present exists : for instance, by closing some that are unnecessary, or by placing others where they are most wanted. It appears from information which we have obtained from the Inspectors of the Local Government Board that cases of this kind are by no means uncommon, and that there are many wards which are, in fact, superfluous. In present circumstances such wards could not be closed, but under a single authority for the county this could easily be done, and it is clear that such a step would lead to a considerable saving of expense.

Preston-Thomas,
8492.
Roberts, 5575.
James, 7638.

131. In the administration of casual wards the standing joint committee would find the services of the police of the utmost value. From their daily experience in patrolling the roads the police would have knowledge of the general movement of vagrants, and become at once aware of any considerable increase or decrease in their number, or any variation in the route they are generally accustomed to follow. They would inspect the wards regularly and would see whether the regulations were being satisfactorily carried out, and would always be available to deal with any difficulty arising from violent conduct on the part of vagrants or from any sudden increase in their number. The police would be able to assign to its proper cause any marked increase in the number of tramps visiting a particular locality. It would be the duty of the chief constable to make a special report to the standing joint committee every quarter on these points, with any remarks that the experience gained through the officers under his command might suggest with regard to such matters as the closing of a superfluous casual ward, the opening of a new one, or the extension of an existing one. The standing joint committee would in this way be in a better position than any other authority to form a comprehensive and accurate judgment on questions relating to vagrancy; and we think it not impossible that the experience so gained might lead to important and valuable developments in the mode of treating these questions. There would in short be in each county a body specially interested in vagrancy as a whole, instead of a number of bodies each interested only in the vagrants who resort to a single casual ward.

132. As regards the use of existing casual wards by the police, it has been pointed out that the wards are frequently an integral part of the workhouse and that the difficulties of their administration by another authority would be great. The entire abandonment of the present wards and the substitution of new ones is out of the question, owing to the great cost of such a step. Where the existing casual wards are entirely separate from the workhouse, the transfer can easily be arranged. But, even where the wards form part of the workhouse, we do not anticipate that there need be any real difficulty in giving effect to our recommendation. In most cases it will be possible to make a separate entrance to the wards and thus render them self-contained. It will, we believe, be only in comparatively few cases that entirely fresh buildings will be necessary.

133. It has been suggested that as the existing casual wards have been provided out of rates for this special purpose, the new authority should be empowered to take over without compensation any wards that they desire to continue. We have carefully considered this question and feel that great hardship would be entailed by such a plan. In some unions good wards have been provided at great expense; in others the accommodation is very inferior, and, if in these further provision were found to be necessary, it would be unjust that the ratepayers in other unions where adequate provision has already been made should be charged with a full share of the cost. There would be difficulty again in regard to loans which have been raised to pay the cost of erecting casual wards; some of these loans are still in part outstanding; and it would seem unfair that the ratepayers of a particular union should continue to make loan repayments for a purpose which had become a county charge, and from which they received no special benefit. We consider that the most equitable arrangement, and the one that would lead to the least difficulty, would be that where the wards form part of a workhouse the guardians should retain ownership, but should be required to let the wards to the standing joint committee; that where the ward is entirely distinct from the workhouse it should be open to the standing joint committee either to purchase or to hire it; and that the rent or purchase price should be agreed on between the committee and the guardians, or settled, in case of dispute, by the Local Government Board. On no account should there be any occasion to resort to costly valuation or arbitration proceedings, and we strongly urge that some simple method of settling the rent or purchase price, as the case may be, should be adopted.* Where the standing joint committee do not require the use of any particular ward, the guardians would be free to use the building for any purpose they thought fit, or, if it was a separate building, they might dispose of it

* A suggestion was made that each party should declare its price and the Central Authority be required to decide on the one which seemed the more reasonable of the two.

by sale. In many cases the accommodation thus available would be of considerable use to the guardians, and might obviate the erection of new buildings for Poor Law purposes. The adoption of the arrangement above indicated would leave the standing joint committee free to select such wards as they thought most suitable and would facilitate the discontinuance of superfluous casual wards. It should not be overlooked that with the wards under police control it would be possible in times of pressure to utilise accommodation at police stations.

134. Where the ward is not separate from the workhouse, the agreement might extend to the heating of the ward and the supply of hot water from the workhouse, and the standing joint committee might obtain at contract prices food and other necessities by indent from the workhouse authorities; this arrangement would be greatly facilitated where the workhouse master remains in charge of the wards.

135. In most country unions the workhouse master acts as superintendent of the casual wards, and we think that as a rule he might properly continue to perform this duty under the police authority. Generally we consider that, as far as possible, the existing staff of the casual wards should be continued in office by the police authority, though, as vacancies occur, it would probably be found convenient to fill them by the appointment of retired constables who are drawing pensions from county funds. Where the wards at present have a staff of officers separate from the workhouse, the obvious course would be for the police authority to appoint them as their officers. But, in cases where workhouse officers act also for the casual wards, it would be a matter for arrangement between the police authority and the guardians whether these officers could continue so to act, but under the direction of the new authority; in any such case the consent of the Local Government Board should be obtained. The usual provision should, of course, be made for any permanent officer who might lose office under the scheme.

James, 7738.

136. Separate Police Boroughs.—We have hitherto regarded the proposed transfer as being in all cases to a county authority. But in 127 boroughs, of which 60 are county boroughs under the Local Government Act, 1888, there are separate police forces, and the watch committee of the borough is an independent police authority. We propose, therefore, that the watch committee should be in the same position as the standing joint committee with regard to any casual wards within their area. We have caused inquiries to be made as to the case of these boroughs. We find that in 27 boroughs there are no wards situated inside the borough, but that the wards which really are intended for the borough are outside its boundary. In such cases we propose that the control of the particular wards should be in the hands of the county police, in whose area they are, in fact, situated. It would be clearly unfair that in these cases the borough ratepayers should escape all charges for the maintenance of casual wards, and we suggest, therefore, that in every case where there is no casual ward in a borough maintaining a separate police force, a contribution strictly in proportion to rateable value should be made from borough funds towards the total cost incurred by the county police authority as a vagrancy authority. As regards financial arrangements for this purpose between the county and borough authorities, no large amount will be at issue, and while recognising that some questions of detail may arise which will have to be settled by the Central Authority, we see no reason to doubt that a workable scheme could be prepared under which our suggestions could be easily carried into effect.

137. Metropolitan Area.—The part of the scheme which offers the greatest difficulty relates to the counties and parts of counties policed by the Metropolitan police, namely, the counties of London (exclusive of the City of London) and Middlesex, and a number of parishes in Surrey, Kent, Essex, and Hertfordshire, which are wholly or partly within fifteen miles of Charing Cross. In this area the Secretary of State is the statutory police authority, and the force is governed under him by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis who is appointed by the Crown. Besides 27 casual wards in London, and 5 in Middlesex, there are at present 4 Surrey casual wards, and 1 each in Kent, Essex, and Hertfordshire that are within the Metropolitan police area. A map of this district is given in the Appendix.

138. We find a difficulty in applying to this area the proposals we have made for the rest of England and Wales, for there is no body of police under local control. It must be remembered, however, that our proposal to transfer the wards to the standing joint committees in counties outside the Metropolitan police district is made mainly because they are the police authorities and could use the police to carry out the scheme which we consider is essentially an affair of police. In London this question is of special importance. Besides the large body of habitual vagrants or loafers who make their home there, numbers of vagrants from the country flock in at particular times. London is always a source of attraction to the vagrant class, and on any announcement of public charity the influx reaches alarming proportions. For this reason it is particularly important that the regulations for dealing with vagrants should be not less strict in London than elsewhere, and it seems to us that it is only by the aid of the police that an adequate control can be secured.

139. The obvious plan seems to be to transfer to the Metropolitan police the casual wards in the whole of the area for which they act, but in order to determine whether this is the best course we turn to the various alternatives that suggest themselves :—

(i) The standing joint committees for London and Middlesex have been proposed as bodies to take control of the casual wards in those counties.

These two authorities, however, differ most materially from the standing joint committees in the rest of the country. They have no control over the police and no experience of vagrants. Their ordinary duties are in no way akin to those comprised in the management of casual wards, and they have no staff which would be available for the proposed duties.

140. Moreover, there would remain the question of providing for the parts of Kent, Surrey, Essex, and Hertfordshire, which are within the Metropolitan police district, and therefore outside the areas of the standing joint committees of those counties. To put the casual wards in those parts under the standing joint committee of the particular county would be to introduce outside police control within the area of the Metropolitan police, and would inevitably give rise to difficulties.

(ii) For similar reasons we do not consider that the London County Council or the Metropolitan Asylums Board should be made the authority for controlling the casual wards in the Metropolis.

(iii) Another possible suggestion is the establishment of a joint committee of the boards of guardians in the Metropolis. This plan would give little, if any, advantage over the present system, and would be more difficult and costly in working.

141. It is important to note as regards all these alternatives that there would be no means of enforcing uniformity. London would be treated exceptionally, and the regulations which, through the medium of the Home Office and the police could be applied evenly elsewhere, could be disregarded in the very place where they would be most needed.

(iv) A further suggestion is to establish some body specially for the purpose, and, by giving representation on it to the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police, to enable it to work in connection with the police. We do not think the scheme would be effective unless the body could have some direct control over the police, and this seems extremely doubtful.

142. We are therefore thrown back on the proposal to hand the work over to the Metropolitan police. We have carefully considered the question in all its bearings, and have come to the conclusion that they are the proper body to have control of the wards. We are convinced that it is only through them that uniformity between London and the rest of the country can be secured. To meet the difficulty caused by the fact that the Secretary of State is the Police Authority for the Metropolitan area, we think that the Metropolitan police, for the purpose of the management of the casual wards, should be placed practically in the same position as the standing joint committees in the rest of the country, leaving the Secretary of State the same power of control as he exercises elsewhere. Objection may be raised to giving to the Metropolitan police duties now performed by locally elected bodies, but we consider that the circumstances of London are sufficiently exceptional to render this step necessary. And this accords with our general scheme, the essential part of which is transfer to the police. It will be an immense advantage to have one authority dealing with the vagrant or loafer in London, whether as an offender against the law or as a frequenter of casual wards, and to ensure uniformity of treatment as between the Metropolis and the rest of the country.

143. It is important to note that the additional duty proposed to be placed on the Metropolitan police is not onerous. It is, in fact, only the control of the 39 casual wards in their district; and, looking to the multifarious duties so ably performed by that body at the present time, we cannot see that any real difficulty would be caused by their assuming this work. The actual transfer could be easily accomplished. The existing wards in London are in most cases separate from the workhouse, and could probably be handed over without difficulty to the new authority, and the existing officers could be continued.

144. We propose, therefore, that the Metropolitan police should take charge of the wards in the whole of the Metropolitan police district. The city of London is in a somewhat similar position to a separate police borough and the city police would manage the wards there. This arrangement would leave the casual wards in the parts of the counties of Essex, Hertfordshire, Kent, and Surrey, outside the Metropolitan police district, to the control of the standing joint committees of those counties.

145. Special arrangements will be necessary in London owing to the existence of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund. Most of the casual wards in London have been provided at the cost of that fund, and it seems equitable that any payments made to a board of guardians in London by the Metropolitan police for the use or acquisition of wards should be placed by the guardians to the credit of the fund.

146. Control by Central Authority.—It is clear that for the purposes of securing uniformity between different police districts in the matter of treatment of vagrants in casual wards the control of some central authority is essential. When the casual wards have been transferred from the guardians to the police authorities, the power of making regulations in respect of them will naturally be transferred from the Local Government Board to the Secretary of State. We think that the best means of enforcing them will be through the Secretary of State's certificate of efficiency, the issue of which is the necessary condition of the grant from the Local Taxation Account towards the cost of every county or borough police force. Vagrancy is a matter in which the different police areas have an interest in common, and is by no means a merely local concern. If means can be devised for reducing the total amount of vagrancy, a responsible local authority that refuses or neglects to adopt them would fail in its duty towards its neighbours, and would not, in our opinion, be entitled to the usual grant from the Exchequer towards the cost of the pay and clothing of the police. We recommend, therefore, that the issue of the Secretary of State's certificate of efficiency under section 16 of the County and Borough Police Act, 1856, as amended by sections 24 and 25 of the Local Government Act, 1888, should be made conditional on the satisfactory character of the arrangements respecting vagrancy within the area of the police authority to which the certificate is granted. In the case of a borough not having a casual ward within its boundary, this condition would be satisfied if it paid a fair contribution to the county in respect of its vagrants.

147. For the proper execution of the duties imposed on him in this matter the Secretary of State would require to have the services of local inspectors able to judge whether the arrangements for dealing with vagrants are reasonably satisfactory. We hope that arrangements might be made whereby he might avail himself of the wide experience and the local knowledge possessed by the general Inspectors of the Local Government Board.

Amendments in the Regulations.

148. There would no doubt be a considerable saving of time and trouble in the management of the wards if a task could be dispensed with, but we consider that it acts to a certain extent as a deterrent and prevents a too free resort to the assistance afforded by them. Moreover, it is important that some return should be made by those who obtain food and lodging at the cost of the rates. Under the scheme we propose we think that the performance of a task of work should be enforced in every case where the man is capable of performing it.

149. As regards the task itself, we think it should, if possible, be of a useful character, and one that does not give the expert an advantage over the novice. It should therefore be measured by time and should be such a kind as can be performed by anyone. The opinion has been expressed that, as a rule, oakum picking is unsuitable work; there has been difficulty in disposing of the oakum when picked, the work is unremunerative, and as a task is easy to the old hand. 447. We have, however, been lately informed that picked oakum can now be utilised in large quantities in paper making. Two kinds of work we consider especially suitable for ordinary cases, viz., stone pounding and corn grinding. We have inspected workhouses where these tasks are carried out and have been impressed with their advantages. The tasks are useful, they can be performed by anyone without previous experience, and are not costly in working. The products of stone pounding are of considerable utility, and the crushed material can, in some localities, be sold for a price which affords a profit on the work. It is important that work should be provided for all the inmates of the wards. To those who are not physically able to perform the ordinary tasks lighter work should be given, such as wood chopping, wood bundling, sack making, waste paper sorting, etc. The task should, we think, be nine hours' work. With the wards under an authority extending over a large area, there will be more opportunities for disposing of the products obtained from the work of the casuals, and this will allow of useful work being prescribed.

150. We consider it important that in any case of doubt as to the fitness of a man to perform the task the opinion of a medical man should be obtained. For this purpose, and for the treatment of vagrants who may be ill, arrangements should be made to secure the attendance of a medical man when necessary. Provision, perhaps, should be made for any cases of serious illness (not of an infectious character) being received into the infirmary of the nearest workhouse.

151. In the following chapter we propose that the holder of a way-ticket should be treated differently from other inmates of the casual ward. This proposal would meet the case of the genuine work-seeker; in all other cases we think the detention should be uniform and that the discretionary power now vested in the superintendent of the wards should not be continued. With the wards under the control of the police, we do not think there would be any need for the special appointment of police officers as assistant relieving officers; if an order for admission to the wards was deemed necessary this might be given by any policeman to whom application was made.

152. Later, we make suggestions for amending the dietary in casual wards and for providing a mid-day meal for every one leaving the wards in the morning. We also recommend that female vagrants and children should be received into the workhouse. Subject to the exceptions indicated, we think that regulations similar to those now in force as to admission, treatment, detention, and discharge should apply to the wards when under the police authority and should be strictly enforced.

Scottish and Irish Systems.

153. We have received valuable evidence as to the methods of dealing with vagrancy in Scotland, where there are no casual wards and the law does not recognise mere destitution as a sufficient qualification for Poor Law relief.

Dewar, 6664-71, 6710-6. Strictly speaking, the able-bodied man is not entitled to relief at all ; but destitute tramps can, in practice, usually procure relief in a poor-house, a Despard, 6869, casual sick-house, or a common lodging-house, or in the alternative can go to 6878. the police or to some private charity for a lodging.
Ross, 6943-8, 6977.

Appendix XIV. We have been favoured by the Irish Local Government Board with an interesting memorandum on vagrancy in Ireland. It appears that the law in that country makes no provision for the establishment of casual wards and the casual, or "night lodger," as he is called, is merely a pauper admitted to the workhouse on the ground of sudden and urgent necessity. This corresponds to the state of things in England prior to 1842.

CHAPTER V.

ASSISTANCE FOR BONA FIDE WORK-SEEKERS.

154. There is a general agreement that some means should be adopted of discriminating between the wayfarer who is genuinely in search of work and the idle vagrant. Nearly all the witnesses we have examined have expressed themselves in favour of some system of way-tickets as a means of helping the bona fide work-seeker on his way or of assisting to distinguish such a case from the undeserving mendicant. The proposal is one which has received general support. Although, as we have shown, the bona fide work-seeker forms but a very small proportion of the total number of vagrants, it is impossible to exclude this class from any consideration of the vagrancy problem. The fact that under the present system the working man on tramp who goes to a casual ward receives just the same treatment there as the professional mendicant, is a direct encouragement to indiscriminate almsgiving, as persons who give to the beggar on the road have the excuse that he may be a bona fide work-seeker who ought not to be treated like the ordinary vagrant.

Hutton, 4019.

155. We are strongly of opinion that some better provision should be made to assist the man genuinely in search of work, not only because his case merits different treatment, but because it is most important to remove the excuse for casual almsgiving. It appears that in the case of members of trades unions there is no need of any provision of this sort. We have been informed by witnesses that a man belonging to a trade union who desired to go to another district to obtain work would invariably be helped on his way by his union, who in most cases would pay his railway fare. We understand that members of these associations do not use the casual wards.

Before discussing the plan which we suggest, we may refer to some of the systems which have already been tried for assisting the wayfarer.

The Berkshire Way-ticket System.

156. The way-ticket system as known in this country is that commonly called the "Berkshire system." This is now in force in the counties of Gloucestershire and Wiltshire, where it was adopted in 1882. Its object is twofold; first, to enable the needy wayfarer to move through the county towards his destination by the most direct route and without unnecessary delay, and, secondly, by providing him with lodging, supper and breakfast at the casual ward and with a mid-day meal on his route, to remove all necessity for begging from the public.

157. A way-ticket system has been in force in several counties at various times, but it has never been universal. In 1868 a system of way-tickets appears to have been in force more or less generally in several counties. In 1871 a system very similar to that now in force in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire was tried in Hampshire, but little use was made of it and it was soon abandoned. Then Berkshire, too, in that year, adopted the system only to give it up almost at once owing to the lack of co-operation on the part of the boards of guardians in the county. It was re-introduced there in 1879, and for some four or five years met with success, before it was again dropped, owing, it is said, to lack of co-operation on the part of the adjoining counties. A similar system was adopted in North Wales in 1884, but it is now in force only in four unions.

Poulton, 4663-6
Dorington, 4290.

Roberts, 5513.

158. We have had the advantage of hearing evidence from Colonel Curtis-Hayward, who was chairman of the vagrancy committee for Gloucestershire from 1883 to 1904, and Mr. A. C. Mitchell, who holds a similar position in Wiltshire, from Admiral Christian and Captain Sterne, the chief constables of Gloucestershire and Wiltshire, and from Sir John Dorington, M.P., with regard to the existing system in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire. In each county it is worked through a vagrancy committee consisting of representatives of quarter sessions and the various boards of guardians.

159. The plan adopted, as explained to us, is as follows:—On entering the county a vagrant applies to the assistant relieving officer for vagrants, generally a policeman, who issues to him a way-ticket, on which is marked the man's description, the place that he comes from and his destination. On the ticket are spaces for the names of the casual wards he will pass on his route through the county toward his destination, and a list of stations at which he can obtain a mid-day meal of bread. A copy of the ticket is shown in the Appendix. With the ticket the vagrant goes to the casual ward and is treated in the ordinary way: he gets his food night and morning and has to do his task. When he leaves the ward in the morning, the master of the workhouse or the superintendent of the casual ward marks on the ticket the name of the casual ward to which he should next go in the direct route to his final destination, and also the name of a bread station where on presentation of his ticket he can get eight ounces of bread. The bread station is sometimes at a police station, and is as nearly as possible mid-way between casual wards. If the man arrives in the evening at the casual ward marked on his ticket he has what is called a "good ticket"; but if he arrives at some other casual ward, or has no ticket at all, he would be considered a "bad ticket" man. The practice is to detain for one night (instead of two nights as directed by the Order of the Local Government Board) the man with the good ticket, who shows that he is passing as quickly as he can to his destination, and to detain for two nights the man with the bad ticket. A man who is without a way-ticket can, however, obtain one in any union after two nights' detention, and, while keeping to the route described in the ticket, would be treated as a "good ticket" man. It will be seen that an advantage is offered to the man who adheres to the route he has originally stated: he gets only one night's detention, and after doing a small task the next morning, nominally three hours' work, he can start off again on his journey.

Appendix VIII.

Christian, 1575-7.

160. The mid-day meal is an essential part of the Berkshire system. It is stated that in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire the effect of the mid-day meal has been to reduce begging and almsgiving. In these counties notices are issued stating that a mid-day meal of bread is provided free for vagrants, and asking that money should not be given to them. The fact of a vagrant being discharged from the casual ward early in the morning, and having no chance of getting food until he arrives at the next casual ward in the evening, forms a strong ground for sympathy from the public.* At present it is held that a board of guardians cannot provide a vagrant with food when he leaves the casual ward: in most cases it would be giving out-relief to an able-bodied man without requiring a task; the result is that, if he is really destitute and cannot get any work, he is practically bound to beg or steal any meal he gets during the day. We have been told that magistrates are often reluctant to convict a man for begging when it is known that he has had no chance of getting food honestly from the time he left the casual ward in the morning until the evening. The provision of the mid-day meal is intended to remove this undoubted grievance.

Mitchell, 1849.

161. In Gloucestershire and Wiltshire only $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of bread is given to each vagrant presenting the way-ticket. Previously to 1887 the amount given in the former county was 1 lb., but it was afterwards considered that, apart from the question of expense, the smaller quantity was sufficient. The cost of the bread was defrayed at first by voluntary subscriptions as it was considered illegal for boards of guardians to make any payment for the purpose; but during the last few years the Local Government Board have given authority to

* "In England a vagrant is discharged from the vagrant wards as destitute as when he came in; and if he cannot find work, which is generally the last thing he wishes to do, he must on alternate days either get his mid-day meal by begging or stealing, or he must go without it. This fact is supposed to be a reason for giving money to beggars, and may be alleged as an excuse by magistrates who discourage the police from apprehending vagrants, probably because they think more of the county rate than of the inconvenience to which their poorer neighbours are put by the threats and importunities of sturdy tramps. In Germany, where the relief stations have been established, there will be no such excuse, but there is some doubt whether the most ample provision for vagrants will render their trade the less lucrative. For people who give money to beggars generally do so to satisfy a mischievous impulse, and without giving any thought at all to the rights or wrongs of the matter." (Reports on the Elberfeld Poor Law System and German Workmen's Colonies. 1888.)

boards of guardians to make contributions, and in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire there is little difficulty in raising the necessary funds. In Berkshire, we are told, the difficulty of getting subscriptions was one of the causes of their system falling into disuse. ^{1856.} Mitchell, 1814.

162. It appears that in Gloucestershire the cost of the bread has averaged £45 a year for the whole time the system has been in operation, though now the cost has risen to £80. In Wiltshire the cost in the year ended 31st March, 1904, came to about £50. The expense, therefore, is comparatively small, but it is to be observed that the benefits of the mid-day meal system in these counties are open only to those who bring a way-ticket, i.e., those who have used the casual wards. In Gloucestershire during a period of ten years, out of a total of 395,000 admissions to casual wards 111,300 applications were made for the mid-day meal, while only in 88,000 cases were "good" tickets brought to the casual wards. ^{Curtis-Hayward, 1635-6. Mitchell, 1809-12.}

Bread Tickets and Mendicity Societies.

163. In addition to the counties where the way-ticket system is in force there are a few counties in which a mid-day meal is provided for vagrants through a mendicity society: by means of bread tickets, a ration of bread can be obtained by any vagrant in the middle of the day. The benefits of the system are not limited, as in the case of way-tickets, to vagrants who come from casual wards. It is contended that the bread tickets have had a useful effect in checking indiscriminate almsgiving, but there is no certain evidence forthcoming as to this, and it is difficult to say to what degree this has been the case. No doubt it is largely dependent on the extent to which the public are made aware of the facilities provided. ^{Preston-Thomas, 391.}

164. Dorsetshire.—A mendicity society has been established since 1869; the chief constable of the county acts as secretary to the society, which derives its income from voluntary subscriptions. Bread tickets are issued to subscribers and to the police, and a vagrant on application receives one of these tickets, which enables him to obtain bread at certain specified places in the county. During the year 1904, 35,509 tickets were exchanged for bread. The cost of the bread amounted to £147 19s. 1d., the total working expenses being £207 16s. 6d. The object of the society is stated to be "the suppression of vagrancy and the assistance of the deserving workman in search of employment." It is contended that the society has diminished indiscriminate almsgiving by removing the plea of starvation, and the chief constable attributes the comparative absence of offences on the part of vagrants to the effect of the bread ticket system. ^{Fleming, 4928. Appendix VIII.}

165. Herefordshire.—A bread ticket system carried on by a mendicity society has been in existence for nearly thirty years. The system is similar to that in force in Dorsetshire, and the chief constable of the county acts as hon. secretary to the society. Bread tickets can be obtained by vagrants at workhouses and police stations or from subscribers to the society, which enable them to get a mid-day meal of bread at certain shops in different towns and villages. In the year 1904, 2,688 rations of bread were supplied at a cost of £11 4s. During the year, 731 bread tickets were issued by the police, 932 by workhouse masters, and 111 by subscribers. Mr. Barneby, a county alderman and guardian of Hereford, referred to a possible danger from this system:— ^{Appendix VIII. Barneby, 4260.}

"The police told me that it did a great deal of mischief. If they found anybody loafing about a private house in the country, and they were suspicious of him, the police were immediately disarmed because the loafer turned round and said, 'I am only going to ask for a bread ticket.'"

It appears from the report of the society for the year 1903 that bread stations were discontinued in certain parts of the county owing to the difficulty of finding tradesmen willing to supply bread.

166. Worcestershire.—A wayfarers' relief society provides a mid-day meal for wayfarers in the county in search of work. The society is a private one, but works in co-operation with certain of the workhouses. Men who appear to be looking for work are selected by the workhouse officers from among the vagrants, and receive a ticket which enables them to get a mid-day meal of $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of bread and $1\frac{1}{2}$ oz. of cheese, at a cost of 2d. to the society. During 1904, out of 66,881 vagrants relieved in the casual wards, 6,129 were assisted in this way.

167. Ayrshire.—A mendicity society carries on a system somewhat similar to that in force in Dorsetshire. The society was established in 1885, and provides for the distribution to vagrants of tickets for food or lodging, which have been purchased by charitable persons. There are sixty-five bread stations in Ayrshire, and at any of these a vagrant can, on presentation of a bread ticket, obtain 1 lb. of bread, but he cannot get more than 2 lbs. at one time. The same man cannot get a second supply of bread at the same station within a week. There is also a superior food ticket available only in Ayr, which enables a man to obtain food to the value of $2\frac{1}{2}$ d., either bread and cheese, or bread and soup, or tea and bread and butter. As to this better ticket, Captain McHardy says:—
- “it destroys the objects of the society, as even a little more generous relief like that attracts the wayfarer to the district.”
6769. A ticket for lodging when obtained by a vagrant must be presented at the police office, there to be exchanged for an order on a lodging house. These are more popular than the bread tickets, as they are worth really 5d. or 6d., but the negotiation of the tickets at the police office is a check, as the police can refuse an order where they think fit to do so. Captain McHardy says that the tickets are now little used in Ayrshire. The statement furnished by him as to the receipts and expenditure of the society shows that in the year 1895–6 the value of food tickets exchanged was £26 14s. 2d. and of lodging tickets £56 0s. 9d. In the year 1904–5 the food tickets exchanged amounted to £3 19s. 2d. and the lodging tickets to £12 13s. 10d. The funds of the society are derived from subscriptions and the sale of the tickets. We were informed that in Ayrshire some of the police buy tickets themselves to give to vagrants. It is to be remembered that in Scotland, as we have already mentioned, there are no casual wards and no provision is made by the Poor Law for able-bodied vagrants.

German System.

168. This system was described to us by Mr. Dawson. Every German leaving his district must carry certain papers of identification in addition to a Wanderschein or way-ticket. For the relief of the destitute wayfarer there is the Herberge, or lodging-house, which is maintained by a voluntary society, and the Verpflegungs-station, or relief station, which is maintained by the local authorities. In each, the man in search of work can obtain lodging and food either by payment of a small sum or the performance of three hours' work, such as wood chopping or stone breaking. In a place where there is a Herberge the local authorities do not establish a relief station. Provision is made for a mid-day meal.

- 3565.

169. A copy of the regulations in force in Westphalia as to the use of relief stations by wayfarers will be found in the recent Board of Trade report.* A similar system is carried on in other provinces, but not so thoroughly as in Westphalia. A pass can be obtained on payment of 6d., or the performance of four hours' work at a relief station, on proof of identity (i.e., production of army discharge or insurance papers) and of recent employment. A person without a pass, who cannot produce evidence of identity and recent employment, is referred to the police and is required to perform a full day's work to their satisfaction before he can obtain a pass. At each relief station the pass is stamped with the date of departure, and the name of the next station to which the holder proposes to travel must be entered on the pass. All attempts to secure employment must be made through the labour registry in connection with the relief station. No one who refuses to accept a suitable situation offered by the registry is allowed to receive relief at the station. A wayfarer who does not comply with the regulations is referred to the police for relief; and if he does not keep to the fixed route he may be punished as a vagrant.

170. The Herberge is a sort of model lodging-house, but the traveller who cannot pay has to do a task of work in return for his food and lodging. In Dawson, 3558. 1904 there were 466 of these homes, with 20,000 beds. The number of the non-paying inmates has increased considerably during the last few years. As to the relief stations we have not seen any recent figures. It appears that in 1896 there were 1,287 of these institutions, but Mr. Dawson informed us that they are now increasing in number. On the night of the 15th December, 1890, 3850. there were 9,216 inmates of the relief stations.

Swiss System.

171. A society named the Inter-Cantonal Union, whose operations extend to fourteen of the twenty-two cantons in the country, provides for the relief of persons without means who are really in search of employment. A way-ticket in the form of a book, called a "Wanderschein," is issued to those who can prove that they have worked for an employer within the three preceding months, and that at least five days have elapsed since that employment ceased. The union has established stations in most of the cantons, and a man genuinely in search of work can, with the aid of the way-ticket, wander over most of Switzerland, obtaining lodging and food (three meals daily) on application at these stations. Food and lodging is given only once in six months to the same traveller at the same station.

172. No work is exacted from persons relieved; the bona fide work-seeker is helped on his way and endeavours are made to find him employment. The beggars and the work-shy are excluded from the benefits of this system. The funds of the union are derived from voluntary subscriptions and grants from the Federal Government and the councils of the various cantons. A fuller description of the working of the system appears in Mr. Preston-Thomas's report on Switzerland and in his evidence before us. Appendix XVII. Preston-Thomas, 8283-8301.

Proposed Way-ticket System.

173. If the main object is to assist the genuine work-seeker on his way and afford a means of discriminating between him and the idle vagrant, it seems to us that, of the various plans which have been tried, the Swiss system is the one which offers the best chance of success.

174. The "Berkshire" system which, as we have said, is now in force in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire does not appear to have met with such success that we could recommend its universal adoption in its present form. Under that system the ticket is granted to anyone who obtains admission to the casual ward, on his stating his destination. If the professional vagrant can state a destination on the route to which he is willing to keep for a time, he can obtain all the benefits of the system; while, if at any time he wishes to start off on a fresh route, he can easily obtain a new ticket after having been treated as a "bad-ticket" man and detained two nights at one place; from that point he would be a "good ticket" man so long as he kept to his set route. It seems to us that it is too easy for the professional vagrant to take advantage of this system to make it of much use in distinguishing between him and the genuine work-seeker. Nor do we think that the system is of much value as affording a means of identification of the habitual vagrant, for he could always remove the evidence of the way-ticket by destroying it. In Continental countries where individual records are kept and it is necessary for every one to have certain papers in his possession, identification is an easy matter; but we are not prepared to recommend that every wayfarer in this country should be required to carry papers. A compulsory system of this character needs some penalty for non-compliance; and we feel strong objections to making the non-production of a way-ticket a punishable offence. Fleming, 4882. Lamb, 7135. Loch, 8778-9. Fleming, 4880, 5025. Peacock, 7797.

175. Mr. Preston-Thomas expressed himself in favour of a way-ticket which should be issued only to a man who could afford evidence that he had actually Preston-Thomas, 647.

worked. He says: "I would not grant it on any statement of what he is going to do; but I would grant it on evidence of what he has done." With this suggestion we agree. The Swiss way-ticket is issued only to a man who can prove that he has worked for an employer within the three preceding months. Other witnesses whom we have examined agree that the way-ticket should be granted only to the man who is really travelling in search of work. Mr. Curtis, clerk to the King's Norton guardians, put before us suggestions to this effect, and his proposal has received considerable support from boards of guardians. He proposes, as do some other witnesses, that the possession of the way-ticket should entitle the holder to preferential treatment at the casual wards. Mr. Preston-Thomas's proposal differs in an important particular from others we have received. Following the Swiss system, he would make the ticket available for a certain period, say four months, instead of indicating a fixed destination and requiring the man to continue to move directly towards it. He considered the latter plan open to objection as not allowing the man in search of work to change his route on hearing of work in some other direction. We have carefully considered the question, but though we are of opinion that latitude should be given to the genuine searcher for work, we are on the whole inclined to the view that in this country the plan of issuing a ticket available for a certain period with no route indicated, instead of being an advantage, would be rather a source of danger as being likely to encourage vagrancy. A ticket giving the right to wander for some months is in itself an inducement to tramp, and the habit of vagrancy and a confirmed love of the road would in our view more probably result than the finding of any settled employment.

176. It was found that when the way-ticket was introduced in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire there was a considerable reduction in the number of casual paupers in those counties. In fact the numbers in Gloucestershire went down the next year nearly 50 per cent. Whether the fall was due to the new system or to the effect of the Casual Poor Act of 1882 it is difficult to say. But the numbers began almost immediately to increase again, and in 1904 the total had reached the figures of 1882. It is only fair to say that while only a few counties at a time have adopted this system, there has been little chance of obtaining good results, for it is quite easy for the vagrant to avoid the effect of it by passing into another county where the system is not in force. Colonel Curtis-Hayward considered that the starting of the Gloucestershire system caused the vagrants to leave that county at first.

177. We are strongly of opinion that to be successful any way-ticket system must be universal over the country, and this is the opinion of all the witnesses. Moreover, the system should be worked in a uniform manner not only in one county, but all over the country. We have pointed out in another part of our Report the difficulty of obtaining uniformity from the boards of guardians on account of the number of the unions and their varying circumstances; and we agree with the suggestion of many of our witnesses that any ticket system should be placed under the control of, and be worked by, the police. Indeed, we consider that it is only by these means that the system could be made effective. In Wiltshire, where the present system is most carefully administered, it has been hitherto found impossible to get uniformity of treatment by the different boards of guardians, and this has been the experience in other counties.

178. We think that the police should be empowered to issue a way-ticket to a man who can satisfy them either that he has worked at some employment (other than a casual job) within a recent period, say three months, and that he has reasonable ground for expecting to get work at a certain place, and that he is likely to keep to it, or that he has some other good ground for desiring to go to some particular place. A case that might be dealt with under the latter description is the sailor who has missed his ship and wishes to get to some other port.

179. The ticket should give the man's personal description, his usual trade, his reason for wanting to travel, and his proposed destination, and should contain his signature and, possibly, his finger-prints for the purpose of testing identity. It should be in the form of a book, something like the Swiss traveller's book with spaces on which should be stamped the name of each casual ward visited. We think that the duration of the book should be limited to a certain period, say one month. With this book the man would go to the casual ward and be entitled to a night's lodging, supper, and breakfast, and, after performing two hours' work to help to pay for his food and lodging, he should be free to leave the ward whenever he likes. The name of the next ward on the direct line of his route, which he can reach that night, should be entered in the book, and if he arrived at that place he should be treated in the same manner. The book would thus be a record of the man's journey and show clearly on the face of it whether he is genuinely in search for work. Preston-Thomas, 8288.

180. We propose the performance of a small task by the holder of a way-ticket. It may be urged that if the man is bona fide in search of work he should not be required to do any task; but we consider that a task of a useful but light nature will help to maintain a spirit of independence, and at the same time act as a check to any abuse of the facilities provided. In return for the food and lodging given it seems only right that the recipient should do some work, but we think he should be free to do the work as soon as he wishes, either on the day of arrival or the next day, so that he can leave the ward as early as possible. For the way-ticket man we propose that there should practically be no detention, and we think that he should generally have better treatment and accommodation than the ordinary vagrants and be kept as far as possible apart from them. And it should be open to him to remain at the ward for another night if he desires a rest on his journey.

181. We deal in Chapter VIII. with the question of food in the casual wards, and suggest alterations in the present dietary, including provision for a mid-day meal for all men leaving the casual wards. We propose that the holder of the way-ticket should receive, on leaving the ward in the morning, a ration of bread and cheese, which would provide for his needs during the day and enable him to pursue his way without the necessity of reporting himself at any intermediate station to get the meal. We limit this advantage to the holder of the way-ticket; a man without a way-ticket should, we think, be required to call at some police station on the way to the next casual ward, where, on presentation of a ticket issued by the superintendent of the last casual ward he would be enabled to obtain his food. We consider it useful to make this discrimination between the two classes of travellers. It confers an advantage Poulton, 4847. on the man bona fide in search of work, and it tends to bring the other class into contact with the police in the middle of the day, and to keep them to the main roads. There is also this point; the bona fide wayfarer would be less Preston-Thomas, 388. likely to waste his ration of bread and cheese; if food were given to all on leaving Fleming, 4886, the casual wards, it is certain that a very large quantity would be thrown away. 4939. We do not consider it necessary to propose arrangements for the supply of food at the public expense to vagrants who have not used the casual wards.

182. We have stated above that we do not agree with the proposal to make the ticket available for a certain period without a settled destination. But we think that provision should be made to meet the case of the man who finds it necessary or desirable to depart from his original route; for instance, if he hears of work available at some other place to the right or left of his route. We accordingly suggest that the superintendent of a casual ward, with the concurrence of the district officer of police, should have power, if satisfied of the man's bona fides, to authorise the change of route, the book being endorsed to that effect. We do not anticipate that there would be any difficulty on this point, and we feel sure that there would be every disposition on the part of the police authorities to facilitate the change of journey, if they were satisfied that there was reasonable ground for it. This provision would, we think, amply meet the objection raised by Mr. Preston-Thomas to the ticket with a specified route, and would at the same time be an additional check against abuse of the system.

183. If our recommendation is adopted there will be several points of detail to be settled, and we suggest that these should be defined by regulations issued by the Home Office to apply uniformly to the whole country. For instance, the form of the ticket should be prescribed ; the keeping of a register of tickets at each casual ward should be required ; and provision should be made to deal with cases of renewal of ticket, loss of ticket, improper possession or forgery of ticket, cancelling of tickets on misuse, and generally for the working of the system. We think that the Secretary of State's certificate of the efficiency of each police force should be made dependent on the system having been properly carried out.

Information as to Employment.

184. Most of the witnesses were of opinion that it is very desirable that some means should be adopted to enable the man in search of work to know where there is work to be found. Any scheme for this purpose, besides being a valuable addition to the way-ticket system, might be of assistance to the man thrown out of employment who wished to know if there was any chance of work in the district. Moreover, it would afford a means of detecting the idle vagrant, by his refusal to accept work which was available. Such a scheme, too, might be of great help, particularly in agricultural districts, to employers who would, no doubt, be willing to assist in it by sending from time to time particulars of any work they could offer.

185. If our proposals as to the transfer of the casual wards to the police authorities are adopted, we would suggest that the superintendent of each police division should be responsible for the collection of information as to work available in his district, and this information should be transmitted at frequent intervals to the chief constable of the county. A complete list could then be prepared for the whole county, and a copy of it sent to each casual ward and police station, where it would be open to the inspection of those seeking work. The divisional superintendent should furnish each casual ward and police station in his district with the information relating to the immediate neighbourhood, as he obtains it. If this plan should prove satisfactory, it might be desirable to extend it so as to provide for an interchange of information between one county and another.

CHAPTER VI.

PUNISHMENT OF VAGRANT OFFENDERS.

Sentences of Imprisonment.

186. The information before us shows that there is no uniformity whatever in the sentences for vagrancy offences. Occasionally, magistrates in one petty sessional division agree to deal with these cases in much the same way, but as a rule in the same county the sentences vary from three days to twenty-eight days for such offences as refusing to perform a task of work in a vagrant ward or destroying clothing, a variation which appears to us to be so wide as to be difficult of justification. The sentences given by stipendiary magistrates appear to be as little governed by any fixed principles as those inflicted by the unpaid justices. In one town, the local magistrates give a month for casual ward offences, while the stipendiary generally gives only seven days, consequently the workhouse authorities, if possible, take proceedings on the days when the local magistrates are sitting; in another town, on the other hand, although much the same sentences are given by the stipendiary and the local magistrates, the former is much more apt to convict than the latter, as he confines himself to the question whether the vagrant has refused to perform his task or not.

187. The same absence of uniformity appears to exist in the decisions of the magistrates sitting in the Metropolitan police courts. The superintendent visiting officer of the London vagrant wards said :—

“A man tears up his clothes and he goes before a certain magistrate and gets three days perhaps; at the most seven. He will go before another magistrate in the Metropolis and he is bound to get a month; if it is his second time he will get three months.”

In dealing with cases of begging, there seems to be even more variation on the part of the magistrates. While some give fourteen days to a month, others discharge the man on his promising to leave the town. It is hardly necessary to say that, in places where no sentence is given, the police cease to bring cases of begging before the magistrates, and the offence continues unchecked.

188. Short Sentences.—The great majority of the sentences given for vagrancy offences are for fourteen days or under. Thus in 1904 the imprisonments for begging and sleeping out were 16,626 and 6,219; of these no less than 13,831 and 5,198 were sentences of fourteen days or under. The judicial statistics do not show separately how many sentences of seven days or less are given, but it would seem from the information before us that the large majority of these short sentences do not exceed seven days.

Appendix XVIII

189. The evidence we have received shows conclusively that from any practical point of view it is impossible to defend a sentence of a few days. That it is in no way deterrent to the vagrant is the opinion of all the witnesses. Mr. Fenwick, Metropolitan police magistrate, said that his colleagues at Bow Street, Sir Albert de Rutzen and Mr. Marsham, agreed with him that sentences of three, five, or seven days are of no use at all. He added: “no case occurs to my mind in which a three days’ sentence would be of the slightest use at all.” And, if the short sentence does no good, it certainly may be harmful. A few days in prison, so far from reforming the vagrant, may turn him out worse than when he entered, and for the tramp who is addicted to drink the few days’ incarceration is perhaps the worst thing that could happen to him. Sir Andrew Clark, in his evidence before the Inebriates Committee of 1892, expressed the opinion that in the case of an inebriate the short sentence aggravated the habit of drunkenness. Mr. Torr, a Lincolnshire magistrate, in giving evidence before us, said :—

Motion, 6530.

Fenwick, 10629,
10689, 10694.

Armstrong, 3105

Torr, 10162.

“The short sentence diminishes what little self-respect he has got; it does not teach him any single thing; he comes out rather bitter against the world.”

190. An objection to short sentences, which was brought out by the evidence, is the great cost which they involve. In each case there is the conveyance of the man to the court and then to prison; if he is remanded, there is the double journey to the court, and often the prison is at a considerable distance. A policeman has to be told off to accompany the prisoner; the travelling expenses incurred often amount to a considerable sum, and in addition the constable's time is wasted. The cost of conveyance is as great in the case of the sentence for a few days as when the sentence is for a long period, and, in the case of a man who is repeatedly imprisoned for begging as he passes from county to county, it becomes a burden wholly out of proportion to any benefit to the community. Two vagrants quoted in Mr. Torr's evidence, who received a series of convictions in Lincolnshire cost, in travelling expenses alone, £12 and £16 10s. Another objection to the present system of short sentences is that it crowds the prisons, rendering administration difficult and proper classification almost impossible.

191. We have heard from several witnesses that the vagrant deliberately commits offences in order to obtain a short imprisonment. Sometimes his object is to get sent to the county prison, and thus helped on his way. Thus, a man leaving London to go through Essex to Ipswich might commit some small offence, in order to be sent to Chelmsford gaol, some twenty miles on his journey, and on reaching the borders of Suffolk another offence would ensure his conveyance to Ipswich. And innumerable cases are reported where the object is to get a few days' rest in prison. It must be remembered that prison is not distasteful to the vagrant; often he is only too glad to get the warmth and comfort of the prison cell after some days on the road.

192. The short sentence is very ineffective in getting work out of the prisoner. A three days' sentence means only one day's imprisonment, for the day of admission and the day of discharge each count as one day; and if the man refused to do any work there would not be time to punish him by reducing his diet. A seven days' sentence given on a Monday means release on the Saturday morning, leaving only four clear days in prison; and though when given on any other day than Monday, it involves five clear days in prison, one of these will be a Sunday on which no labour is enforced. The short sentence, in fact, causes the maximum amount of trouble to the police, the magistrates, and the prison authorities, is very costly and effects no useful purpose. That it does not deter is clear from the fact that offenders come up again and again for a similar sentence, and the lists of convictions of certain men, given in the Appendix, afford strong confirmation of this.

193. The Prison Commissioners in their Report for the year ended 31st March, 1905, observe that the large increase in the number of offences by vagrants

"must furnish material for grave reflection whether successive commitments to prison for short sentences, not as a rule exceeding 14 days, is a proper or even a reasonable remedy for the grave social malady which this continuous increase of commitments for offences against the vagrancy laws connotes"; and they quote reports from prison officers on the subject. The governor of Ruthin prison observes:—

"No incorrigible rogues have been received from quarter sessions, the committals being confined chiefly to about three petty sessional divisions, whose sentences for vagrancy are usually of 7 or 14 days duration. These prisoners are nearly always lazy and indolent; they invariably apply for aid from the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, an institution they all appear to take interest in, and this class of prisoners are responsible for nearly all the reports and punishments inflicted for idleness. I am of opinion that some system of dealing with this evil should be adopted with a view of a more uniform punishment. The present plan of inflicting short sentences in one district, whereas in another vagrancy is not looked upon as an offence, is worse than useless, and leniency towards these offenders is a mistaken kindness."

The governor of Wakefield prison remarks :—

“As regards the increase of vagrancy it is evident that the proper treatment of the tramp or habitual vagrant is daily growing more important, and as governor of a prison one is struck with the small effort made by the authorities to put the existing machinery of the law in operation against it, and have habituals committed for considerable terms as incorrigible rogues. The characteristics of the tramp are apathy, idleness, and distaste for continuous effort, the rational treatment for which would seem to be regular life, discipline, and the habit of continuous work. Instead of this, one finds tramps almost daily and repeatedly committed for varying terms of from 2 to 14 days. From my personal observation of this class of prisoner I am convinced that short sentences are not only futile as regards any punitive effect, but they are even demoralising and almost encourage and foster vagrant tendencies of life.”

194. Minimum Sentences. We have received suggestions that a minimum sentence should be fixed for vagrancy offences, and there is much to be said in favour of this. Most of the witnesses agreed that no sentence of less than fourteen days could be of any use to a prisoner of the vagrant class, and some urged that nothing less than a month should be given. Mr. John Hutton, M.P., who for many years has been chairman of quarter sessions for the North Riding of Yorkshire, said, “I consider if a man has not committed an offence worthy of twenty-eight days’ imprisonment you must forgive him a first fault, or a second, or even a third, fault. . . . I would certainly legislate to prevent any person of any kind or description being sent to prison for less than 28 days.” Simpson, 1103.
Hutton, 3983-4.

195. In 1879, minimum sentences were practically abolished, except that a saving was kept for fines under the Militia and Volunteer Acts. Since that date, however, provision has been made for minimum sentences in some few cases. The great objection to minimum sentences which existed prior to 1879 was removed by the Summary Jurisdiction Act of that year, which enables magistrates either to find a person guilty but discharge him with a caution, or not to convict him at all, if they think the offence is too trivial to merit punishment. The question of re-establishing minimum sentences generally is beyond the scope of our inquiry, but, so far as vagrancy offences are concerned, we are convinced that there would be great advantage in providing that no sentences of a few days only should be given. At the same time we feel the force of the view urged by Sir John Dorington and Mr. Fenwick that there would be considerable objection to taking away the discretion of the magistrates. Sir John Dorington said that by doing away with the short sentence “you do away with the discretion of the justices. . . . I should be very loth to introduce a new principle of leaving justices with no discretion.” As regards a minimum sentence for vagrancy, Mr. Fenwick said, “I should be opposed to that altogether; I would rather leave it to the absolute discretion of the magistrate. I know of no class of cases in which the circumstances vary more than in these cases. . . . You must remember that occasionally a man comes up after he has been in custody on remand for seven days. Seven days’ imprisonment after that gives him fourteen days’ detention. I would not like to hamper a magistrate in his discretion. . . . I am in favour of leaving the discretion to the magistrates, and I cannot suggest any means of compelling them to give more than in their discretion they think the man ought to receive.” Simpson, 1103.
Dorington, 4325.
Fenwick, 10647-8.

196. Although we are not prepared to dissent from the general views expressed by these witnesses, we are so fully convinced of the futility and needless expense of the short sentence that we consider it necessary to urge that in any case where the magistrate deems it expedient to give a sentence of less than fourteen days for a vagrancy offence the sentence should be for one day only. Mr. Fenwick agreed as to the advantage of the one day sentence over the three days’ sentence, and said that the former was frequently given at Bow Street. A sentence for one day means that the prisoner is detained until the rising of the court and then discharged. Under our proposal this sentence would be a conviction; the conviction would be recorded, and the offender could be warned by the court that on his second or third conviction he would be imprisoned for a considerable 10689.

Fenwick, 10711. period or, if our later recommendations are accepted, he could be committed for a still longer period of detention in a labour colony as an habitual vagrant. Procedure on these lines would avoid much of the expense and trouble caused by the present practice, and would be far more effectual in checking vagrancy offences, and we consider it a most necessary part of the scheme which we propose for dealing with habitual vagrants.

The Vagrant in Prison.

197. It has been made clear to us in the course of our inquiry that whatever sentence is given, imprisonment under present conditions is an inadequate mode of dealing with persons convicted of vagrancy offences. We have dealt already with the objections to short sentences of imprisonment, but we are convinced that even with longer sentences prison treatment is in most cases wholly unsuitable for persons of this class.

Appendix XI.
and XVI.

198. We print in the Appendix the records of some habitual offenders which show that to them prison was no deterrent even when sentences up to twelve months were given. There is abundant evidence that the habitual vagrant comes up again and again for sentence undeterred by any punishment that can be given him under existing conditions. A certain class of vagrant even shows a desire for imprisonment, and will often commit some offence, such as refusing to do his task in the casual wards, tearing up his clothes, or breaking a window, with the express object of being sent to prison. The chaplain of Northallerton prison reports that—

Hutton, 3982.
Barneby, 4200.
Poulton, 4682.

“the professional tramp is the most hopeless class of prisoner met with. He looks upon H.M. prison as a house of rest and refreshment, and uses it freely for such purposes, deliberately committing offences in order that he may be sent there. Prison discipline seems to have no terror for such men. Some other method must be devised for dealing with them or they will be an increasing quantity.”*

199. Many tramps openly declare that they prefer prison to the casual wards, and there is a widespread opinion that this is no mere pretence on their part. We find that it is no new thing for the vagrant to want to go to prison. Thus in 1848, when casual wards were merely rough shelters with no discipline and very little work, Sir John Walsham, a general Inspector of the Poor Law Board, reported that vagrants assigned as a reason for refusing to work that they wished to lay up for a fortnight during the winter in gaol. He said :—

“It is now, I apprehend, becoming a system with the vagrants to pass away the cold months by fortnightly halts in different gaols In the summer months vagrancy is a pleasanter occupation, and then they find the workhouses such convenient lodging-houses or hotels that they behave better; nevertheless, work is their special aversion; and in most of my workhouses they are set to work, whilst in Ipswich and other gaols work has been abandoned. . . . It appears to me that there ought to be some special mode of dealing in prison with vagrants committed for refusing to work and damaging or destroying the property of the establishments where they are lodged and fed.”

In the same year Mr. Hawley, another Inspector of the Poor Law Board, reported that a more rigid system of prison discipline ought to be established—

“since it is obvious that any coercive system out of doors must fail when it is known that resistance to it will secure to the refractory offender easier employment, a more liberal diet, and greater general comforts within the walls of a house of correction.”

Again another Inspector, Mr. Boase, said :—

“The most frequent act which incurs the interference of the police with tramps is window breaking, for which numbers are committed from almost every union workhouse; and the opinion among officers who are connected with them is almost unanimous that the object of this offence is to obtain a short imprisonment. Tearing clothes is another act for which they are frequently punished, and for which they appear to have an additional motive—to get a better suit of clothes.”†

200. In 1866 another series of reports by the general Inspectors of the Poor Law Board showed that the same desire for prison was then entertained by vagrants, and Mr. Cane, one of the Inspectors, advised workhouse masters not to prosecute vagrants since it was their wish to go to prison. Lieut.-Colonel Isaacson, governor of Manchester prison, said that the preference for prison was an old story; he had heard of it for twenty years. Isaacson, 9065.

* Report of the Commissioners of Prisons for the year ended 31st March, 1905.

201. The complaints which are now made of prison not being deterrent to vagrants are therefore no new thing, and the difficulty is probably inherent in any prison system. It cannot be doubted that the general conditions in the modern prison are superior to those to which the ordinary tramp is accustomed; the food is good and plentiful, the cell is clean and well warmed and lighted, and the work is not heavy. On the other hand, it is difficult to estimate how far he is affected by the loss of liberty and the rigid enforcement of discipline which a sentence of imprisonment entails. His standard of comfort is certainly much lower than that of the average prisoner. Indeed, Dr. Parker Wilson, medical officer of Pentonville prison, said that the vagrant prisoner has no idea of comfort and is the lowest type of prisoner. Preston-Thomas, 336. Mitchell, 1839-42. Curtis, 2635. Hutton, 3927. Poulton, 4714. Simpson, 1140. Wilson, 9282-3.

202. It has, however, been so frequently suggested that conditions in prison have improved of late years, and that the recent increase in the number of convictions for vagrancy and similar offences is due to this improvement, that it may be well to consider this question more closely. It appears that the only changes in prison conditions which have taken place of late years which would affect prisoners of the vagrant class are (a) in diet and (b) in labour.

203. Prison Dietary.—As a result of the recommendations of the Prison Dietaries Committee of 1898 considerable improvements were made in the diet in prisons. So far as regards the dietary for the first month in the case of sentences not exceeding four months, the changes came into force on the 21st April, 1899. Under the previous dietary, a prisoner sentenced to not more than a month received for the first seven days eight ounces of bread for breakfast, eight ounces of bread for supper, and one-and-a-half pints of stirabout (made of Indian meal) for dinner. The new dietary added a pint of gruel for both breakfast and supper, and for dinner, instead of the stirabout, gave eight ounces of bread each day, in addition to one pint of porridge three days a week, eight ounces of potatoes twice a week, and eight ounces of suet pudding twice a week. Clayton, 733.

204. This was the main change introduced in 1899, though a slight improvement was also made in the diet for the rest of the first month where the sentence did not exceed four months. In September, 1901, a revised dietary was introduced for all classes of prisoners. This did not alter the diet for the first seven days of sentences not exceeding four months, as settled in 1899, and though the changes it introduced were more extensive in their application they are not so important for our present purpose as those introduced in 1899. We print in the Appendix a list of the dietaries showing (a) that in force at the present time, (b) that established in April, 1899, and (c) that in force before April, 1899. Appendix XXX.

205. There is a special diet for the day of reception in prison, which has been in force since 1892. It is as follows:—breakfast.—bread, 8 ozs.; cocoa, 1 pint: dinner—bread, 12 ozs.; cooked meat preserved by heat, 4 ozs.: supper—bread, 8 ozs.; porridge, 1 pint. In most cases the vagrant does not reach prison in time to get the breakfast or dinner of this special diet; he usually gets only the supper, but if he does not get the dinner in prison, he would receive a mid-day meal from the police. We were informed by the Prison Commissioners that out of 1,343 vagrant offenders admitted to prison during a given fortnight, only 356 arrived in time to receive the dinner prescribed for the day of admission. Appendix VII.

206. It is clear that the diet in prison is better than that commonly given in casual wards. Mr. Preston-Thomas sets out in his evidence the difference between the two diets. It must be remembered, too, that as a rule prison food is better cooked. We are not prepared to defend the diet generally given to casual paupers as being adequate. Indeed we Preston-Thomas, 336.

suggest that it should be improved, but it is not contemplated that a man should have continuous recourse to this diet, while that given in prison is fixed for longer periods and different conditions.

207. Prison Labour.—It has also been contended that the labour in prison is less severe than the casual ward tasks. As will be seen from the Appendix, the tasks most common in casual wards are stone breaking, oakum picking, wood cutting and digging. Refusal to perform these tasks renders a casual pauper liable to imprisonment with hard labour. Prosecutions for refusing to perform the task are very numerous; in London in 1904 there were no less than 682.

208. "Hard labour" in local prisons now consists of coal sack or coal bag making, oakum picking, stone breaking, wood chopping, mat making, and heavy ship fender making. Before 1898 in 40 of the 54 local prisons hard labour included the treadmill and the crank, but these forms of labour were abolished during 1900 and 1901 in 26 prisons, or two-thirds of the number where this labour was previously in force, and since 1901 have been abolished in all but one of the other prisons. This change was the result of the recommendation of the Prisons Committee of 1895 who advised that unproductive labour, under which term they included all purely mechanical work on cranks or treadwheels, should, except as a punishment, be entirely abolished wherever possible. The principle they adopted was that the labour ought to be both deterrent and reformatory, but they recognised that "if the crank and treadmill are abandoned, hard labour of the 1st class will be difficult and usually impossible to provide," and they recommended that every effort should be made to find work which would be a fitting equivalent. Sir John Dorington, M.P., who was a member of that Committee, in his evidence before us stated as follows:—

"We said that there was a great objection to the treadmill and the crank, but the question was what was to be substituted for them. If the crank and the treadmill were abandoned, hard labour of the first class would usually be confined to picking oakum in a solitary cell, the cell itself being far superior in every way to a tramp cell and still more so to an associated tramp ward. The treadmill and the crank having been done away with, there is, in my opinion, no adequate hard labour for persons under short sentences in prisons. The prisons are very well conducted as regards the prisoner with a longish sentence, but I think for prisoners with a short sentence and the vagabond prisoner you have made your prison too comfortable I do not know that I am entitled to say so, but I think the prison authorities made a great mistake in abolishing all forms of hard labour."

209. Dr. Parker Wilson, medical officer of Pentonville prison, said:—

"There is no such thing as hard labour; hard labour is a term used in the present day, but the thing itself is absolutely obsolete" and added that there was now no hard labour which involved physical exertion. On the other hand, he stated that from his experience of prisoners nothing was deterrent, and that severity in task would not tend to reduce the number of admissions. The object of the task, he considered, was merely disciplinary. He did not think that the treadmill was more deterrent than oakum picking or sack making, and Colonel Isaacson expressed the opinion that oakum picking in confinement was a heavier punishment than the treadmill.

210. The "hard labour" given at Pentonville prison consists only of oakum picking and sack making. It appears that the work varies in different prisons; stone breaking is not much in force owing to the difficulty of disposing of the stone, and the same remark would apply to wood cutting. The most general tasks for short sentence prisoners with hard labour seem to be coal sack making and oakum picking. The former is done for the Admiralty, but this work is not always available. "Hard labour," indeed, appears to be merely a technical term which bears little relation to the facts of the case, and it seems to us that there would be advantage if some other expression which was less misleading could be adopted.

211. As we have said, large numbers of casual paupers are committed to prison for refusing to perform their tasks in the casual wards. In any case of doubt, it is the general practice for the guardians to obtain from their medical officer a certificate as to the man's fitness for the work before any proceedings are taken, and this certificate is produced to the magistrate. On arrival at the prison the offender undergoes a medical examination which is intended to test his fitness for any kind of "hard labour." If the man is deemed unfit for the hardest form of "hard labour," he would be certified as unfit for any hard labour. In some prisons he might be put on oakum picking, although a less quantity would be given to him, or he would be given light work of an industrial kind, such as wool or cotton picking or pea sorting. Dr. Wilson pointed out to us that a certificate of fitness for hard labour would involve liability to be put to any form of it. Major Clayton stated that 50 per cent. of the prisoners are certified as unfit for hard labour. As the vagrant is seldom wholly sound in body, he therefore stands a good chance of escaping any heavy labour when in prison.

212. There is no doubt that the conditions under which work is performed are less unpleasant in prison than in the casual ward; the cells are larger, better lighted, and better ventilated, and even assuming that the work is equally severe in prison, there is good reason to suppose that a man would prefer as a change the prison task. It is to be observed, also, that in the case of the short-sentence prisoner there is little opportunity of enforcing work in prison, and, as we have already pointed out, no work is done on the day of admission or the day of discharge, both of which count as part of the sentence. On the whole it seems clear to us that prison labour under present conditions is not deterrent to the vagrant offender, and certainly affords no adequate punishment for the man who has refused to perform his task in the casual wards.

213. Suggestion of Prison Commissioners.—In their Reports for the last few years the Prison Commissioners have drawn special attention to this matter. In the Report for the year ended 31st March, 1903, they say:—

"the only opinion that we can form after careful consideration of the matter, is that a remedy for the above preference of prison to workhouse treatment on the part of that large class of wastrels and ne'er-do-wells, who hover on the borderland between the two, is by the adoption, by the workhouse authorities, of a uniform scale of dietary and task, which shall not be less favourable than the standard adopted, after full inquiry, for persons convicted of crime."

By "workhouse" the Commissioners no doubt intend to refer to casual wards: the vagrant class are not received as ordinary inmates in the workhouse, and, so far as we are aware, no suggestion has been made that the diet in workhouses is insufficient or the work performed by the ordinary pauper too severe. But as regards casual wards we are fully aware, as we show elsewhere, that there is at present little uniformity in diet and tasks. We fully recognise the necessity of uniformity in these matters, and have made suggestions with a view to securing this result. We cannot, however, accept the suggestion of the Prison Commissioners that the diet and tasks given to the vagrant in the casual wards should necessarily be not less favourable than the diet and tasks now given in prison. As the Commissioners point out in the Report referred to, the present prison dietary and tasks were not specially devised to deal with the vagrant class, but to meet the needs of "prisoners of different classes, characters, professions, and physique," and they contend that these conditions should not be altered to meet—

"the special case of a few ne'er-do-wells who have lost all sense of self-respect, and to whom it is a matter of indifference whether they spend a few nights in a workhouse, a prison, or a barn."

214. Effect of recent Prison changes.—In considering the suggestion, to which reference has been made above, that the recent improvements in prison conditions have been to a certain extent the cause of the increase in vagrancy offences during the last few years, it is to be remembered that an improvement took place in diet in April, 1899, and a further improvement in September, 1901, and that the abolition of the treadwheel and crank was carried out during 1900 and 1901. Figures and diagrams are printed in the Appendix as to prosecutions for vagrancy and other offences. These show a continuous increase since 1900. It must be borne in mind that during this period there has been a considerable increase of vagrancy, while, as already stated, the number of prosecutions for vagrancy offences at any time is a matter almost entirely dependent on local action. It is probable that the close of the South African war, and the period of trade depression which followed, are partly responsible for the increase in vagrancy offences, but the increase in prosecutions for these offences is more marked and extends over a longer period than any other fluctuation that is to be found in the figures available since 1857.

215. The evidence we have received shows that there is a general opinion that prison conditions have recently improved and the vagrant no doubt shares this opinion. On the other hand, except as regards the small class of children under the age of seven years, whose diet was improved in 1897, there has been no general alteration in diet in the casual ward regulations since 1882; and it seems to us difficult to avoid the conclusion that prison has in the last few years become even less deterrent to the vagrant than it formerly was.

216. Conclusion.—The view to which the above considerations point is that prison is not the proper place for punishing vagrant offenders. This seems to be the view of the Prison Commissioners, for in their Report for the year ended March, 1905, they say that—

“the elaborate and expensive machinery of a prison, whose object is to punish and at the same time to improve by a continuous discipline and applied labour, cannot fulfil its object in the case of this hopeless body of men who are here to-day and gone to-morrow, and who, from long habit and custom, are hardened against such deterrent influences as a short detention in prison may afford.”

It is evident that short periods of imprisonment are useless for dealing with this class, while sufficiently long periods could not be given without injustice. If it is not possible to render prison conditions deterrent to vagrant offenders, then it is clear that other treatment should be provided for them. And this seems an unanswerable argument in favour of the recommendation we make in the following chapter for the establishment of labour colonies for the detention of habitual vagrants.

Habitual Vagrants.

217. Under the Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV., ch. 83), courts of summary jurisdiction have already very considerable powers for dealing with habitual vagrants. Thus, any person begging or refusing to maintain himself is to be deemed an “idle and disorderly person,” and is liable to imprisonment for one month. On a second conviction, the idle and disorderly person becomes under the Act a “rogue and vagabond” and is liable to a sentence of three months; while on a third conviction the rogue and vagabond becomes an “incorrigible rogue” and may be committed to prison, there to be put to hard labour until the next quarter sessions, when he may be sentenced to further imprisonment with hard labour for a period not exceeding a year, and may also be punished by whipping. It appears that though practically all habitual vagrants are qualified to be treated as incorrigible rogues within the meaning of the Act, few are actually dealt with in this manner. This seems to be chiefly due to the difficulty of identifying the man and proving his previous convictions. By moving into another district the vagrant practically escapes all chance of identification and is able to pose as a first offender. Even in cases where the previous convictions of the vagrant are known there is often a reluctance on the part of the magistrates to avail themselves of the powers conferred on them.

Buchanan, 11074.

Fenwick, 10617.

218. In London the number of persons dealt with as incorrigible rogues is greater because there is a better system of identification due largely to the excellent work of the London Mendicity Society, which has established records of thousands of London beggars. Last year, at Bow Street, out of 339 persons convicted of begging 9 were sent to quarter sessions and dealt with as incorrigible rogues. At all the police courts in London in the same year the persons convicted of begging numbered 3,019, and of these 134 were treated as incorrigible rogues.

219. As a rule outside London it would appear that the person who is treated as an incorrigible rogue is a man who has committed repeatedly some offence under the Vagrancy Acts other than begging, as, for instance, exposing his person. It is difficult to say why the more severe procedure is not resorted to more frequently in the case of habitual vagrants whose antecedents are known to the police. It may be that magistrates feel that prison under present conditions is not the right place for this class of offender, and we are inclined to think that if the detention were to be undergone in some other form of institution the disinclination to put the Act in force would be considerably lessened. Hutton, 4040.
Fenwick, 10704

220. The absolute necessity of some other mode of dealing with persons of this class is fully shown by the evidence; prison, as we have already pointed out, is no deterrent to them, and they come up again and again for sentence with surprising regularity. The lists we print in the Appendix of the convictions of certain men establish the fact that there is a class whom no sentence under the existing law deters. For instance, in the case of J.R. it will be seen that in ten years he was sentenced eight times to terms of twelve months' imprisonment as an incorrigible rogue in addition to several shorter sentences. And there are many other cases like his. Of this class of man Mr. Fenwick says:— Appendix XI.
and XVI.
Simmons, 3322.
Buchanan, 11098
Fenwick, 10726.

"With regard to that man I think it is desirable that some means should be devised either by sending him to a penal workhouse or labour colony—I do not care by what name you call it—by which he could be checked by detention, and placed in such a position for some considerable period so that he can no longer prey upon society and set a bad example to others. . . . reform him if you can, instil into him habits of work if you can, but keep him under restraint somewhat in the way you do the habitual drunkard."

The evidence we have received is overwhelmingly in favour of increased powers of detention for habitual vagrants.

221. Our view is that means should be provided to allow of the habitual vagrant being dealt with otherwise than under the Vagrancy Act, and that as far as possible he should be treated not as a criminal, but as a person requiring detention on account of his mode of life. This is the principle which governs the system adopted in Belgium under the law of 1891. For this purpose we propose that a class of habitual vagrants should be defined by statute, and that this class should include any person who has been three or more times convicted during a period of, say, twelve months of certain offences now coming under the Vagrancy Act, namely, sleeping out, begging, refusing to perform task of work in casual wards, or refusing or neglecting to maintain himself so that he becomes chargeable to the poor rate.* It will be seen that we do not propose to create any new offence, and that under the existing law this class could be dealt with as incorrigible rogues. Under this proposal a means is provided of enabling the poor law authorities to deal with the class of "ins and outs" who now cause considerable trouble in workhouse administration. Torr, 10185.
Appendix XXI.

Fenwick, 10641,

* Under Section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, as amended by section 3 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1849, every person who being able wholly or in part to maintain himself and his family wilfully refuses or neglects to do so, so that such person or any of his family whom he is legally bound to maintain becomes chargeable to the poor rate, is to be deemed an idle and disorderly person.

power which already exists of treating persons of this class as incorrigible rogues should be resorted to, and we suggest, therefore, that the provisions in the Vagrancy Act should be retained and looked upon as an alternative to the new procedure we have recommended. We are, however, strongly of opinion that the labour colony, and not the prison, is the proper place of detention for these persons.

223. It may be observed that at present the incorrigible rogue is kept at hard labour after committal by petty sessions until the next quarter sessions, which may, outside London, be for any period up to three months. No doubt this period of detention is taken into consideration by quarter sessions in determining the length of sentence they will impose. If habitual vagrants are dealt with as we propose there may be a similar period between petty sessions and the quarter sessions or assizes, but we think it will be desirable that habitual vagrants awaiting sentence should not be committed to prison where they would be treated as ordinary offenders, but should be sent temporarily to a labour colony in cases where one is available, if the interval after petty sessions is sufficiently long to justify this course. If the interval is only a short one, it may be possible for the police authority to arrange for the offender being sent temporarily to some casual ward under their control if proper arrangements can be made for his reception.

224. Identification.—As we stated above, the difficulty of identification has hitherto proved a great obstacle in the way of any effective dealing with habitual offenders of this class, but this difficulty can now be surmounted by means of finger-prints. At present in the Habitual Criminals Registry at New Scotland Yard accurate records are kept of over 70,000 persons, and we are informed that it would be possible in a similar manner to keep records of all persons convicted of vagrancy offences. We propose that after each conviction a person should be finger-printed and the result sent to a central office. We think that, on the whole, it will probably be found more convenient to keep the habitual vagrants register separate from the habitual criminals register, but we express no positive opinion on this point. It would be necessary on a person being charged for the magistrate, if satisfied of the justice of this course, to remand him for a few days to enable the information as to any previous convictions to be obtained from headquarters. We realise that on the first adoption of this system some slight inconvenience would be caused by the remanding of practically every person charged with a vagrancy offence, but we believe that the results obtained would be sufficient to justify any trouble thus occasioned.

CHAPTER VII.

LABOUR COLONIES.

225. For many years there has been a growing conviction in this country that new methods are necessary for dealing with habitual vagrants, and during the last few years the rapid increase in the number of vagrants has quickened the public interest in the matter. The report on the Belgian colony at Merxplas, which was issued by the committee appointed by the Lindsey quarter sessions in 1903, received approval on all sides, and has resulted in a general demand for the establishment of similar institutions in this country. A large number of local authorities and courts of quarter sessions throughout England and Wales have addressed memorials to the Secretary of State and the Local Government Board in favour of the establishment of labour colonies for vagrants and increased powers of detention; frequent Poor Law conferences have passed resolutions to the same effect, and the public press has urged the necessity of action of this nature.

226. In view of these strong indications of popular opinion we have considered that one of the main points referred to us for consideration was the question of the desirability of establishing places in this country specially adapted for the detention of persons of the vagrant class. We have accordingly heard many witnesses on the subject and have visited several institutions of this character, and have in other ways collected much information bearing upon the question. Mr. Preston-Thomas, who specially visited the Swiss labour colonies in 1903 and wrote a valuable report on them, described to us the system in force in Switzerland. At the beginning of last year he also visited, at our request, the Swiss colony at Lucerne, as well as a small German colony established at Munden in Hertfordshire. Mr. W. H. Dawson gave evidence on the labour colonies in Germany, which have also been visited by a member of the Committee. The Dutch labour colonies were described to us by Mr. H. G. Willink, whose work on the subject is well known.* We received information regarding the Belgian system from Mr. Willink, Mr. Torr, and other witnesses, and the colonies of Merxplas and Wortel were personally visited by several of our number. Witnesses have also referred to the institutions used for a similar class in France and Denmark. † We received evidence with regard to the farm colony which the Salvation Army has established at Hadleigh in Essex, and the colony of the Christian Social Service Union at Lingfield in Surrey, and we also visited those institutions. We inspected the colony at Laindon, Essex, which is used by the Poplar guardians as a branch workhouse, and the colony at Hollesley Bay in Suffolk, which was started in 1905 by the London Central Unemployed Committee.

227. The establishment of labour colonies is not a new proposal. Institutions for the reception of beggars and vagrants were to be found at an early date. In the 16th century houses of correction for vagrants were set up in this country, and at the end of that century and the beginning of the next similar institutions were established in different parts of Europe for the detention for long periods of habitual vagrants. Reference may be made to the experiments of Sir Benjamin Thompson (better known as Count Rumford) towards the end of the 18th century. This famous philanthropist dealt with the plague of beggars that infested Bavaria, by setting them to work in workshops established by him. For a time his scheme met with considerable success.

We will proceed to give some account of the more important labour colonies.

Holland.

228. In 1818, General Van den Bosch established in Holland, under royal patronage, a charitable organisation, the "Society of Beneficence," for

* The Dutch Home Labour Colonies (1889).

† A full account of the foreign labour colonies will be found in two Reports, issued by the Board of Trade in 1893 and 1904, on "Agencies and Methods for dealing with the Unemployed."

employing the poor on the land. This Society acquired colonies in Holland, and established others at Wortel and Merxplas in Belgium. The Dutch colonies consisted of free colonies, and beggar colonies for the repression of mendicity. The Free Colonies were intended for the reception of indigent persons. Men, with their families, were settled on the land as small farmers or labourers, in order to be fitted to earn their living independently. The expenses were defrayed by subscriptions and the intention was to give temporary assistance, but it was found that persons entering the free colonies remained there, very few fresh cases were received, and the scheme does not appear to have been very successful. The Society still maintains the free colonies. There are three of these, viz., Frederiksoord, Willemsoord and Wilhelminasoord, which form practically one colony, but the number of inmates is decreasing. In 1827 the population was 2,179 ; in 1873, 2,007 ; in 1887, 1,796 ; and in 1902, 1,460.

Willink, 8867.

229. The Beggar Colonies were intended for the compulsory detention of persons of the vagrant class. The chief colonies were at Ommerschans, Veenhuizen, and Merxplas. Under the Society severe discipline was maintained, and the colonies were penal rather than reformatory. Mr. Willink thus describes the colonies :—

“The idea was that the man would be able to earn enough in the institution to support himself, and to learn something which would be useful to him when he went out. The idea was at first that it should be principally agriculture, but by degrees they found that it was more and more necessary to introduce other things besides agriculture ; and it was found also that the ends did not meet, and they got more and more in debt to the State which advanced them money, and then they manufactured articles for the State, uniforms for the Army, and sacking and all sorts of things, and finally they got into a very unsound financial condition and the State took them over stock, lock and barrel.”

In 1859 the Society handed over the beggar colonies to the Government. The institution is now concentrated at Veenhuizen, where, on some 3,000 acres of land, between 3,000 and 4 000 men of the vagrant class are detained. Persons convicted of certain offences (one being public begging) are committed by magistrates for a term of detention of not less than six months and not more than three years. There is a separate institution of the same kind for women at Hoorn.

230. Professor Mavor, in the Board of Trade Report of 1893, states as regards the inmates of the beggar colonies :—

“All of them have been convicted of begging ; a very large proportion are confirmed beggars. The type of men is similar to that which may be found in Merxplas and in the German ‘Corrections-Anstalten.’ They appear to be fibreless and irresponsible to an extreme degree. . . . Forestry, agriculture, and gardening are the employments of the colonists. Though prisoners, they enjoy a certain amount of freedom within the limits of the colony, they have an allowance for wages, and receive the unexpended balance of these on leaving. The method of administration is similar to that of Merxplas, in Belgium.”

Belgium.

231. At the establishment of the separate Kingdom of Belgium in 1831, there were in existence in that country six “Dépôts de Mendicité” for the compulsory detention of persons of the vagrant class. There were also the two colonies established by the Dutch Society of Beneficence, at one of which, Merxplas, able-bodied mendicants were detained and forced to work, while the other, Wortel, was more of the nature of a voluntary colony. The Government for some years paid a subsidy to the colonies, but in 1842 they were closed. In 1870, however, the Government acquired the colonies for a sum of 800,000 francs and re-established them as institutions under State control ; they are now termed “Colonies de Bienfaisance de L’Etat.” The question of vagrancy seems to have given much trouble in Belgium, which has been called “the classic land of pauperism.” In 1891 the law on the subject was consolidated after much discussion and strong opposition.* Under the law of 27th November, 1891, which came into force on 1st January, 1892, State institutions of two sorts were established, termed “Dépôts de Mendicité” and “Maisons de Refuge.” A translation of this Act is printed in the Appendix. Appendix XXI.

232. The “maison de refuge” is intended for the reception of men who from age or infirmity are unable to work, or who have been driven to begging or vagrancy by the want of work or misfortune. It is in fact similar to an English workhouse for the old and infirm, and it receives also men out of work who would be willing to work if they could get employment. There is power of detention for a period not exceeding one year. Destitute persons furnished with an order from their commune may enter voluntarily. The chief “maison de refuge” is at Hoogstraeten; for purpose of administration it is divided into two sections, called Hoogstraeten and Wortel, the latter being reserved for the able-bodied colonists.

233. The “dépôts de mendicité” are intended for the reception of able-bodied men who are professional beggars or live in a state of vagrancy, and also for certain other classes, such as inebriates, persons convicted of immoral offences, etc. The principal dépôt is at Merxplas. Persons are committed to a dépôt by a judicial authority (juges de paix) on summary conviction, for a period of not less than two years or more than seven years. The intention of the Act seems to be to treat habitual vagrants and beggars not as criminals requiring punishment, but as persons requiring treatment on account of their mode of life, and, in the words of the Act, they are placed “at the disposal of the Government.”

234. An account of the Merxplas colony is contained in the evidence given before us by Mr. Torr, and in the report to the Lindsey quarter sessions, of which he was one of the authors. It is also described in the two Reports issued by the Board of Trade. Some of the members of our Committee visited the colony, and carefully inspected the arrangements in force there. We have since been furnished by the director with statements giving interesting details as to the working of the colony. Extracts from these will be found in the Appendix. Appendix XXII.

235. The population of Merxplas on the 1st January, 1905, was 5,110. It has shown a steady increase since 1890, when it was 2,924. Most of the inmates are permanent residents: on the day of our visit only twenty of the colonists were there for the first time. The work of the colonists is land reclamation, farming, and the manufacture of all kinds of articles required in the colony. The industrial side is highly organised, and there is no difficulty in disposing of the products. At the time of our visit, mats, brushes, and portmanteaus were being made for the English market. We do not find, however, that there is any systematic industrial training at the colony; each man is employed at his own trade, and those who have no trade are set to work in reclaiming the land or in other unskilled labour. Although the colony does not teach trades it enables the colonists to retain and perfect their knowledge of their own trades. The money value of the work done by the colonists is considerable. A grant of about 6d. a day is made to the colony in respect of each able-bodied inmate, paid in equal parts by the State, the province and the commune. With the help of this grant, the accounts show an excess of receipts over expenditure. This excess is applied to the cost of new buildings or the reduction of the rate of contribution. Practically everything required is made in the colony and all the buildings have been erected by the colonists. The produce of the land, however, is not sufficient for the colony, and large quantities of potatoes and cereals have to be purchased outside. The net annual cost of maintenance, including all expenses and payments to the colonists, is about £9 per head. A copy of the estimates of receipts and payments for 1905 will be found in the Appendix.

* During the discussion on the Bill in the Belgian Parliament, M. Woeste said — “It is said that these dépôts de mendicité are not prisons. In reality these depôts imply a régime much more severe, much more punitive for those who are detained in them, than the prisons. . . . If I approve of the proposal of the Government to prolong the period of detention . . . in these dépôts de mendicité, it is because I am convinced that those who might be disposed to become vagabonds will recoil from this extremity, that they will change their mode of life and acquire regular habits of labour. . . . In these severe measures I see this advantage, that the population of these dépôts would become less numerous, because those who might be sent there would recoil from the imprisonment the dépôts would inflict upon them. . . . I am of those who think that when workmen are out of work, when they search well they will end by finding it. While waiting until they do find it, it would appear that legal and private charity has to come to their relief. But I cannot admit that it offers any acceptable remedy to the painful situation in which they find themselves, to send them into the dépôts de mendicité or into the houses of refuge from which they emerge only to return.”

Appendix XXII.

236. The colonists can earn sums varying from 1d. to 3d. a day, according to the amount and quality of work done. One half of their earnings is retained by the management until discharge, while the other half is given to the men monthly in tokens to spend, if they like, at the canteen on articles of food, tobacco, etc. The canteen is managed by the colony, and articles there are sold at cost price. A statement showing how the colonists spend their money in the canteen is given in the Appendix. It will be seen that the articles most largely purchased are tobacco, bacon and lard.

237. Seven years is the maximum term of detention, but the average time is 16 months. Remission of the sentence can be granted by the Minister of Justice in any case where this seems desirable. A detachment of 150 soldiers is quartered at the colony, but we understood that their services have not been required, and that there is no difficulty in maintaining order and discipline among the colonists. In this regard the director attached considerable importance to the vegetable character of the food given. A table showing the dietary in force is printed in the Appendix.

238. An objection urged against Merxplas is the lack of classification and the absence of religious influences. It seems clear to us that the discipline there has little or no active reformatory effect, and the constant association of so large a number of men of the vagrant class in these conditions cannot fail to have a deteriorating influence on the whole body. The director informed us that almost as soon as one period of detention was over the colonist was generally sent back to the colony for another term. In a memorandum with which he has kindly furnished us, the following passage occurs :—

“The same causes which led to the first entry act again soon after liberation and almost always provoke the same effects, which in the main are the return to Merxplas. The reformation ‘en masse’ of the colonists is then a Utopian enterprise, and it is only exceptionally that we can effect a rescue amongst the social wreckage which forms the basis of the population of the dépôt.”

Willink, 8903.

“Once a colonist, always a colonist” seems to be perfectly true of this institution. It would appear that the large majority of the inmates have reached their present position owing to drink. There is no doubt, however, that the colony is effective in clearing the streets of beggars and loafers, and during his term of detention it prevents the colonist from doing harm to the general public. Those of us who visited the colony were much impressed with the great ability shown in the management of so difficult an institution.

239. The Maison de Refuge at Hoogstraeten and Wortel is described fully in the Board of Trade Report of 1904. This institution is managed on similar lines to Merxplas, but owing to the shorter time of residence, and the fact that many of the inmates are partially infirm, the industries are much less developed. Persons out of work are accepted as voluntary colonists, but the number of these is very small. In winter the population of the colony increases considerably, but when the summer comes most of the inmates are allowed to leave. Many of the colonists at Hoogstraeten and Wortel are persons who in this country would find refuge in a workhouse. The colonists can earn wages ranging from 1d. to 7d. a day: one-third of this is given to them to spend at the canteen, and the rest is retained for the formation of a "masse de sortie," or leaving fund. When this amounts to 12s. the colonist can claim his discharge.

240. Both the dépôts and the houses of refuge are subject to the inspection and control of a committee composed of the Governor of the Province of Antwerp (as President) and nine other members nominated by the King. There is a dépôt and a house of refuge for women at Bruges under similar regulations.

Germany.

241. The labour colonies in Germany are under the management of a charitable association, the Labour Colony Central Board. There are at present thirty-four* of these colonies which provide accommodation for nearly 4,000 persons. Admission to the colonies is voluntary and there is no compulsion to remain, but it appears to be now the practice to endeavour to make the men stay for not less than two months. During the year 1903, there were 10,307 admissions to the colonies, and 10,338 discharges. Of 3,968 inmates of the colonies at the end of 1903, 1,837, or nearly one half, had been in the colonies less than two months, while 933 more had been there from two to four months. About one-tenth of the colonists leaving during the year are stated to have gone to situations found by themselves, and another tenth to situations found for them by the colonies. The funds for the support of the colonies are obtained from grants by the provincial and municipal authorities, and from voluntary subscriptions. Mr. Dawson states that the average annual cost per head is £10, and the average earning £4, which leaves a net cost of £6 per head inclusive of all expenses. Dawson, 3627.

242. The first labour colony was founded by Pastor Von Bodelschwingh in 1882, at Wilhelmsdorf near Bielefeld, in Westphalia. This colony may be taken as a type of the agricultural colony. The original work was land reclamation, but now that the soil has been rendered fit for cultivation all kinds of agriculture and farm work are carried on. Nearly all the labour colonies are agricultural, but there are a few industrial colonies such as those at Berlin and Magdeberg. In these great difficulty is experienced in finding suitable industries which do not compete with the independent manufacturers. A small wage is allowed in all the colonies and from this is deducted the cost of clothes and tobacco supplied to the colonists, the balance, if any, being paid on discharge. The persons who enter the colonies are chiefly unemployed workmen and men on tramp. We have already given an account of the shelters (Herbergen) under philanthropic societies, and the relief stations (Verpflegungs-Stationen) under the local authorities, which provide for the wayfarer in search of work. It is found that in winter the colonies are full, while in the early summer there is a general exodus and it is difficult to get sufficient labour for the land. 3616. See page 46.

243. It is clear that a labour colony of the German type is of little use for dealing with persons of the tramp class. Mr. Dawson says that "it is not disciplinary in the coercive sense: it is purely voluntary; the inmates can stay or not as they please." Many of this type of colonists come again and again, and are termed "colony loafers." They correspond to the "ins and outs" of our English workhouses. The object of the colonies is to effect some moral reformation, but it appears that three-fourths of the colonists have been previously imprisoned and there is no evidence that any substantial improvement results from the time spent in the colonies. Mr. Dawson expresses his opinion thus:— Dawson, 3726.

"speaking generally, I do not think that you can regard them as being reformatory institutions. The inmates do not stay long enough and the discipline is not severe enough." 3739.

244. For dealing with habitual vagrants and persons who neglect to maintain

* Including one at Munden, Hertfordshire, for destitute Germans in England.

themselves, there are "workhouses" (Arbeitshäuser) which to a certain extent correspond to the original houses of correction in this country, the forced labour farms of Switzerland and the compulsory colonies of Belgium and Holland. There are twenty-four of these "workhouses" in Germany, each province having one at least. Under sections 361 and 362 of the Imperial Code, the following classes of persons, amongst others, are liable to detention in a workhouse for a period not exceeding two years :—

1. anyone who wanders about as a vagabond ;
2. anyone who begs, or causes or allows his children to beg ;
3. anyone who through gambling, drunkenness, or idleness is forced to apply for relief for himself, or those for whose maintenance he is responsible ;
4. anyone who while in receipt of public relief refuses to do work given him by the authorities ; and
5. anyone who after losing his lodging fails to procure another within a certain time.

245. A person committing one of these offences would be sentenced to a term of imprisonment and after that to detention in a workhouse. There are no sentences of detention for less than three months, the average length being one year. The workhouses are controlled by the authorities of the province. They are in fact a kind of prison and are under strict military discipline. The punishments consist of confinement to cells, reduction of diet, and sleeping on the floor, but there is no corporal punishment. They have accommodation for 14,836 persons. During the year ended 31st March, 1904, the number of admissions was 10,363, while in the year ended March, 1884, the number was 15,474. Mr. Dawson points out that the Westphalian workhouse built in 1821 has not been enlarged, although the population of the province has greatly increased, and that there are fewer inmates of the workhouse now than in 1821. The inmates, who are termed prisoners, are kept daily at work which is either domestic, agricultural, or industrial. Numerous trades are carried on, skilled teachers being employed to supervise their work. A description of the life in a German workhouse will be found in the Appendix.

Appendix XXIII.

246. The cost in the German workhouses is comparatively small, and in some the work of the inmates appears to cover almost the whole expenditure. At the Benninghausen workhouse in Westphalia, the annual gross cost of each man in 1902 was £17 8s., against which the average earning was £8 14s. At Gro 3 Salze workhouse the inmates earn £11 11s. each, leaving only £2 7s. per head to be paid out of the public funds. In the workhouse at Moritzburg, the inmates earn £9 16s. 10d., leaving only £3 12s. 9d. to be paid by subsidy, and at Bockelholm the earnings are £11 10s. 8d., and the subsidy only £2 18s. 6d. per head. Mr. Dawson suggests, as the reason for the small cost, that these colonies are on an industrial basis and follow handicraft rather than agriculture. As to the disposal of the produce of the workhouse, he states that it is not the practice to sell in the open market,

"but to provide public institutions with the necessities they require in the nature, for example, of furniture, woven goods, and various things. . . . in Benninghausen they supply all things which are needed in the provincial institutions for the blind, the deaf and dumb, and so forth, and the hospitals."

It must be also pointed out that the diet given is chiefly vegetarian, and is much less expensive than that given in prisons in this country. In the Appendix is printed a dietary table applicable to the Benninghausen workhouse.

Appendix XXIII.

247. As to the effect of these workhouses, it appears to be the opinion in Germany that they have diminished vagrancy ; and the statistics show that the number of commitments is decreasing. Mr. Dawson is of opinion that these institutions, by reason of the length of the sentence, do exercise some influence on the men, but it appears that over 40 per cent. of the inmates at Benninghausen in 1903-4 had previously been in a workhouse. The work is chiefly industrial ; there is little agriculture. Thus, there is a considerable difference between the German institutions for the detention of vagrants and the compulsory labour colonies in Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland.

248. The system in force in Germany is summed up in Mr. Flynt's book, Tramping with Tramps, in these terms :—

"The community practically says to the culprit: 'You can make use of our Verpflegungs-Stationen, where you can work for your lodging and meals, and have also a half-day to search for work, if you can identify yourself as a seeker of labour. We not only offer this, but also attempt to guarantee you, through the efforts of our philanthropists, a casual refuge in die Herberge zur Heimath while you are out of work. And if, through untoward circumstances, or through your own carelessness and weakness you have fallen so low that the Stationen and the Heimath cannot take you in because your identification-papers are irregular, and you appear more of a vagabond than an unfortunate labourer, we then invite you into the labour colonies, founded also by our philanthropists, where you can remain until you have earned good clothes and proved yourself worthy. But if we catch you begging we will punish you as a vagrant: consequently you would do better to make use of all the privileges we offer and thus break no laws. This is the theory, and I consider it a good one. But the man who will not work passes through these institutions as freely as the man who will, owing to the lack of determined discrimination on the part of the officers, and the desperate cleverness of the offenders."

Dawson, 3905-7.

Switzerland.

249. A full account of the Swiss colonies is to be found in Mr. Preston-Thomas's report on "The Methods of Dealing with Vagrancy in Switzerland" which is printed in the Appendix, and in the evidence given by him. In Switzerland there are labour colonies of both kinds, voluntary and compulsory. Of the former class there are only three. They are managed by philanthropic societies, and entry and discharge are voluntary, but a man on admission must agree to stay a certain period, one or two months. The compulsory colonies, or forced labour farms, are more numerous. Nearly every canton has one, or has an agreement with another canton to send cases to their farm. The farm is managed by the cantonal council, who appoint the officers; the Federal Government does not inspect these institutions or take any share in their management.

Appendix XVII

250. A man found begging can be arrested by the police and taken before a magistrate or the council of the district (union) to which he belongs. The former can sentence him, if he is an habitual offender, to imprisonment for a period of from two to six months, or to detention in a forced labour institution for a period of six months to two years. If the man is taken before the district council and they find that he has refused work, they decide that he is "work-shy" and can send him to a forced labour institution for a period of from three months to two years. The district council, as Mr. Preston-Thomas points out, knows more about the man than the magistrates and can tell whether he is an habitual vagrant or not. It may be mentioned that at several of the colonies persons committed by the magistrates for minor offences other than vagrancy offences are received.

251. The Swiss labour institutions are generally small; in Witzwyl, the largest, the number of inmates does not exceed 200. The labour farms are worked economically; there are no walls round the place, but escape is rare. The inmates receive no money, and if they escaped would probably have to beg and would be brought back by the police. In Switzerland everyone is required to carry papers and this enables the men to be easily traced. The buildings are cheap and for the most part have been built by the colonists. It appears that most of the colonists are engaged in land reclamation or farm work, but there are also workshops where tailoring, shoemaking, smith's work, carpentering, basket making, etc., are carried on. Only men with some knowledge of these trades are employed on them, others are sent to work on the farm. As at Merxplas, there appears to be no attempt made to teach trades.

Preston-Thomas,
8383, 8369.

252. There is no difficulty in disposing of the produce of the farm and any goods manufactured in the colony. Mr. Preston-Thomas says as to the Lucerne farm colony :—

"They have an excellent market close at hand where there is a great demand for all sorts of things. They have a number of cows and they sell milk in Lucerne."

8330.

253. At Witzwyl the staff numbers forty-five, or one to every five inmates. The men are encouraged to work by the staff who act more as foremen than warders, and work with the men. Mr. Preston-Thomas states that he was impressed with the way in which the colonists worked and he refers to the absence of formalism as compared with the casual wards or prisons in England :—" They really did work hard, and you saw the results of their work all about." They work eleven hours a day, but as Mr. Preston-Thomas points out in his report, the work is of an attractive character :—

"When a man sees the products of his labour, which have grown up before his eyes, he is induced to exert himself and is stimulated in a fashion which contrasts with the leaden monotony of such occupations as stone breaking and corn grinding."

Punishment is generally by reduction of food. The average term of detention is one year for men sent to the colony by the district council, and two months when sentenced by the magistrates. A remission of a third of the sentence can be earned, which is granted by the cantonal council. On discharge from a compulsory colony a man is provided for either by (a) employment as a paid labourer at the colony; (b) the action of a discharged prisoners' aid society; or (c) admission into a voluntary farm.

254. Owing to the useful work done in the forced labour farms and the money realised from the the sale of their produce, the net cost per head is very small. The district council make a grant of from £2 to £5 per head for each man committed from their district. The Appenzell colony just pays its way, the £4 per man received from the district council being all to the good. At the St. Johannsen colony the cost is about £6 per head, at Lucerne £14, and at Liesthal £14 10s. This amount includes all the expenses of the institution except payment of interest on capital. In the voluntary colonies, however, the cost is much greater. At Herdern, for instance, each inmate costs on an average £50 a year, and this is much the same as the cost in an English voluntary farm colony.

255. With regard to the results of the colony system in Switzerland, Mr. Preston-Thomas states :—

"The officials can only judge by the fact that there are not very many who come there again and again. They say that a good many men get remission of part of their sentence, because the colony authorities are satisfied that they will work for themselves and will not come there again, and that a large number of these people are apparently reformed; but it can only be a matter of speculation as to what the reform is and how far it has gone. There is no doubt that the fact of having worked hard for a year or eighteen months makes a man apt to get into the habit of working, and this is believed to be the actual result."

It appears that in Switzerland, as in other places, there is difficulty in obtaining any record of the men after they leave the colony, but Mr. Preston-Thomas states that the people in charge of the colony think it does have a certain reformatory influence.

256. It seems clear that in Switzerland some good results may reasonably be hoped for from the compulsory colony, but that the voluntary colony does little good. The president of the society which maintains the Herdern voluntary colony said, as regards the inmates of that colony,

"we cannot make any attempt to reform them; we create some more employment for men who say they cannot get any, but that is all; we do not profess to do them any good, but we try to preach to them a little, and exercise a good influence over them."

It seems an undoubted fact that begging and vagrancy have greatly diminished in Switzerland of late years. Mr. Preston-Thomas ascribes this result to the stringent measures taken by the police, to the labour colonies, and to the system in force for helping genuine wayfarers which we have already described. Generally in Switzerland the compulsory labour colonies appear to have had more success than elsewhere; it would seem that they have exercised a greater reformatory influence than colonies in other countries, and no doubt this is largely due to the fact that as they are small institutions the colonists can receive more individual attention.

England.

257. In this country attempts were made by Parliament at an early date to establish places for the detention of vagrants closely parallel to the modern German Arbeitshäuser or "workhouses." In 1535, the Act 27 Hen. VIII., ch. 25, enjoined all local authorities, including mayors, aldermen, sheriffs, bailiffs, and constables, not only to maintain the impotent and aged poor, but also to "cause and to compell all and every the said sturdie vacabundes and valeant beggers to be sett and kepte to continuall labour in suche wise as by their seid labours they and every of them may gette their owne livinge with the contynuall labour of their owne handes." The cost was to be defrayed by alms collected by the churchwardens and others, and any parish that failed to carry out the provisions of the Act was liable to a fine of 20s. for every month during which the omission continued. Similar provisions were contained in the drastic Act of 1 Edw. VI. quoted in Chapter 1.

258. Then in 1572 when provision was made by 14 Eliz., ch. 5, for collections for the relief of the impotent poor, power was given to any three justices to use any surplus monies for placing and setting to work in any convenient place such rogues and vagabonds as might be disposed to work, "there to be holden to worcke by the oversight of the said overseers." In 1575, for more completely carrying out this design, the justices in quarter sessions for each county were required by 18 Eliz., ch. 3, to establish "abyding howses or places convenient in some market towne or corporate towne or other place," to be called houses of correction and to be stocked with wool, hemp, "flaxe, iron or other stuffe as the countrye ys moste meete for," as well as with implements for manufacturing it. So necessary was the execution of this Act thought to be that every justice was made liable to a fine of £5 if he left quarter sessions "before conference had towchinge the execution of this Estatute," the fine going towards providing and furnishing a house of correction.*

259. In 1609 the 7 James I, ch. 4, made the provision of houses of correction a more stringent duty than ever; in any county where one was not provided before Michaelmas, 1611, every justice was to forfeit £5. In 1630 a Royal Commission issued for the purpose of enforcing the vagrancy laws directed that the houses of correction should be made adjacent to the common gaols and the gaoler made governor of them, so that the prisoners in the gaols might be taught to work as well as those committed to the houses of correction. After this date the houses of correction seem to have been regarded more and more as places of punishment to which persons were committed for definite terms to do hard labour, rather than to be taught to work; and in many counties the common gaols were used as houses of correction. It is from an amalgamation of the two that the modern "local prison" has sprung.

260. The process was a gradual one. Thus in section 8 of the Habeas Corpus Act, 1679, (31 Charles II., ch. 2) the case of a prisoner committed to gaol is distinguished from that of one "sent by order of any judge of assize or justice of the peace to any common worke-house or house of correction." Even in 1744, when the vagrancy law was revised and consolidated by 17 George II., ch. 5, the house of correction was apparently regarded as more akin to the workhouse than to the gaol. Persons convicted under the Act were to be passed to their place of settlement there to be set to work or placed "in some workhouse or almshouse" till they found employment for themselves. If they refused to work (s. 19), or if their place of settlement could not be found (ss. 11 and 28), they became a charge to the county instead of to the parish, and were to be disposed of either in the house of correction, or as servants, or as soldiers or sailors, either in this country or in the colonies. In 1822 when the vagrancy laws were next revised the houses of correction had become distinctively penal establishments, and the Act of that year (3 Geo. IV., ch. 40), while providing for the punishment of vagrants by committal there, makes no provision for dealing with them otherwise than by punishing them. In view of the subsequent history of the law as to casual paupers, it is matter for regret that Parliament should have thus abandoned the older tradition by which county authorities were charged with a responsibility for vagrants nearly akin to the responsibility falling on parochial authorities in respect of ordinary paupers.

* Little information appears to be extant with regard to these early labour colonies. A document quoted in Ribton Turner's History of Vagrants and Vagrancy (p. 118) from a Harleian MS. (Brit. Mus. No. 364) gives the diet for vagrants committed to the house of correction for the county of Suffolk. Dinner and supper on the "fleshe" days consisted of 8 ounces of rye bread, a pint of porridge, a quarter of a pound of meat, and a pint of beer; on fish days cheese or a herring was to be substituted. If the inmates worked well they were to have an allowance of beer and a little bread between meals. Those who did not work were to be kept to bread and beer only. This diet was lavish enough, but on the other hand every one coming in, man and woman alike, was to be whipped, and a clog, chain, or manacle put on him, the whipping to be repeated and the irons to be made heavier for such as would not work.

261. At the present time the English convict establishments offer in many respects a close parallel to the labour colony at Merxplas. The inmates are employed on farm work, land reclamation, quarrying, or the ordinary work of excavators, masons, or bricklayers, or they work in workshops as tailors, bootmakers, smiths, and so on. The whole of the prison buildings at Wormwood Scrubs were erected and equipped, including the tiled pavements and the stained glass for the chapel, by convict labour. Convicts can, by good conduct and industry, earn remission of one quarter of their sentence, and can also earn a gratuity on their discharge amounting in some cases to as much as £6. Great care is taken in classifying them, partly by their age, the nature of their crime and their antecedents, and partly by their conduct in prison. On the other hand the majority of convicts are of an entirely different type from the mere vagrant, and require closer supervision and more rigid discipline than the inmates of Merxplas or the Swiss labour farms.

262. There is, in fact, no institution in this country which serves the same purpose as the Continental labour colonies, but there are certain institutions established by charitable agencies for the benefit of the class from which the vagrant is largely recruited. The largest is the farm colony of the Salvation Army at Hadleigh in Essex, in which there is accommodation for about 400 inmates. Then there is a training colony established by the Christian Social Service Union at Lingfield in Surrey, which has accommodation for between sixty and seventy inmates. The same body have also a much smaller colony at Starnthwaite in Westmorland. There is also a colony which was established by the Central London Unemployed Committee in the winter of 1904-5 at Hollesley Bay in Suffolk, for the reception of selected cases of unemployed workmen, who were willing to undertake agricultural work. None of these institutions is intended primarily for persons actually belonging to the vagrant class; there is no power of detention, and the conditions are generally superior to what would be desirable in a colony to which habitual vagrants would be committed. These institutions are more on the lines of the voluntary colonies in Germany and Switzerland.

263. Hadleigh Colony.—This colony includes 2,000 acres of land and 1,000 acres of foreshore. The average number of colonists is 250, but the actual number has fluctuated greatly. The work carried on is chiefly agriculture and brick-making. Paid labourers and assistants to the number of fifty or sixty are employed on the colony. It appears from a return furnished to us that of 523 persons received in the colony during the two years ended September, 1904, 142 were paupers sent by boards of guardians who paid a fixed sum for their maintenance, 137 came from the Salvation Army shelters and workshops, in London; and 236 were private cases who came on their own application, or were sent by friends. During the same period, 484 cases left the colony, the cause of leaving being stated as follows:—

209 of the persons received during the period mentioned left within a month, and only 158 remained in the colony more than six months.

264. With regard to the success of the colony in reforming the inmates, we have been furnished with statements by Mr. Lamb, and he has dealt with the question in his evidence. It appears, however, difficult to obtain any accurate information as to what really becomes of men after leaving the colony. Mr. Lamb admitted that the Salvation Army authorities could not keep in touch with them. The number of re-admissions to the colony in the two years referred to was 92, and of this number 60 had been previously discharged as "satisfactory." Upon the evidence before us, it is impossible to say what percentage of cases can be considered as really satisfactory; but it is clear to us that any high estimates of success from this, as from other colonies, must be accepted with great reserve. On this point the statement printed in the Appendix of cases sent to the colony by the Woolwich guardians is instructive. On the other hand, the system in force at Hadleigh affords encouragement to the man who is trying to improve himself. By good conduct the colonist can secure better treatment and wages, and may even obtain a situation at the colony. The moral and religious influences exercised can hardly fail to have a beneficial effect on the colonists, and we have no doubt that much good may be done where inmates remain a sufficient time for such influences to be brought to bear.

Appendix XXV.

265. In a memorandum supplied to us by Mr. Lamb the capital cost of the colony is stated as £140,000, including land, buildings, and working stock, for 500 inmates and employes, or nearly £300 per head. He suggests that a new colony could be provided at £250 per head. At Hadleigh the average number of inmates is 250; for these the weekly cost of maintenance per head is stated as follows:—

	s.	d.
For lodging, laundry, and medical attendance - -	11	0
Home supervision and management, etc. - - -	2	0

about £34 a year. This does not include the cost of any clothing supplied to the men or the gratuities given to those who work well, but includes provision for interest on capital outlay and depreciation. For pauper cases sent by boards of guardians the colony charges 10s. 6d. a week for the first three months, but after that time the charge is reduced.

266. From the accounts printed in the Appendix the actual cost per inmate can be more nearly arrived at. The working account for the year ended 30th September, 1904, indicates that the net cost of the colony was £5,600. To this must be added charges in respect of capital expenditure. The extract from the balance sheet shows a total cost on capital account of £126,000 for land, tramways, brickworks, machinery, etc. (omitting stock), which at 5 per cent. for interest and repayment represents an annual charge of £6,300. The total annual cost would, therefore, be about £12,000, and taking the average number of inmates as 250, the cost per head would work out to £48. This approximates to the cost in the Swiss voluntary colony at Herdern. It may be mentioned that the accounts relating to Hadleigh show that there was a considerable loss on the farm, gardening, and industrial sections. The market and canteen sections show a profit.

267. The short period during which, on an average, a colonist stays at Hadleigh, and the absence of any power of detention militate against the possibility of financial success. During the first few months the man's labour is of little, if any, value, and as soon as he becomes useful he probably wishes to leave. On the other hand, the colony has a good market close at hand at Southend, where the produce can be disposed of at fair prices. The opportunity offered to the colonists of earning wages up to 2s. per week is of great assistance in encouraging them to work. Part of these earnings is retained until discharge, but part of them may be expended on extra articles of diet. The buildings at Hadleigh have been erected economically; they are mostly one-storey buildings and are largely constructed of wood, but they seem quite adequate for the

Appendix XXIV. present purpose, and have already been in existence some ten years. The diet given at Hadleigh is extremely liberal; it is set out in the Appendix. In a labour colony to which habitual vagrants are committed the diet should, in our opinion, be much less costly.

268. Lingfield.—This colony, like Hadleigh, is founded on a religious basis. It is the chief colony of the Christian Social Service Union, and is essentially a farm training colony. Two-thirds of the inmates are sent by boards of guardians, the remaining third being private cases, mostly inebriates. Men are trained in farm and dairy work, their average length of stay being over a year. It is stated that about 40 per cent, of the colonists go to Canada and get independent positions there. As at Hadleigh the buildings that have been erected for the purpose of the colony are comparatively inexpensive, and have cost only about £66 per head. Including farm stock, buildings and freehold, the total capital cost was £160 per head. The average annual cost per man would appear to be about £33. The diet is lavish, but it was explained to us that many of the colonists are in a debilitated condition on arrival and require plenty of good food. On the other hand the cost of the staff is comparatively low. Statements as to accounts, dietary and colonists are printed in the Appendix.

Appendix XXVI.

269. The work is wholly farming; in particular, men are taught to look after horses and to milk cows, a knowledge which renders them valuable in Canada. But, as might be anticipated, the experience here shows that, in proportion as more training is given, so the colony becomes more expensive. Thus it is found that good cows, which would afford a considerable return, cannot be used for the purpose of teaching milking as they would suffer at the hands of the novice. Again, fruit trees would be damaged by the unskilled man. As to the work of a colonist, Mr. Brooks, the director, said :—

Brooks, 5081.

270. Hollesley Bay.—This colony is intended for men of an altogether different type from those we have to consider, and it has been established so recently that its experience is of little assistance to us. But the impression we derived from a visit to the institution strengthened our belief that agriculture can only be carried on in a labour colony at a loss. The cost of food for the inmates has varied from 6s. 3d. to 7s. 1d. per head per week.

271. Laindon.—This is an agricultural colony of about 100 acres which was established in Essex by the Poplar guardians in 1904 as a branch workhouse for able-bodied male paupers. The buildings used are of a temporary nature and accommodate about 150 men; in February, 1906, the colony was practically full. The colonists receive a diet considerably better than that given in an ordinary workhouse, the weekly cost per head being 5s. 8d. The men are employed chiefly in spade labour. The cultivation of the land belonging to the colony cannot afford profitable employment for so large a number of men, and in the circumstances the work can only be regarded as a labour test.

Carlile, 8209. Newdigate.—The Church Army have established a small farm colony at Newdigate, Surrey; but this is intended mainly as a test for emigrants, and we have not considered it necessary to visit it for the purpose of the present Inquiry.

Results attained by Labour Colonies.

272. We do not find much evidence of the reformatory effect of labour colonies abroad. It appears that as a general rule the same individual returns to the colony again and again. In Germany there has been created the type of man known as the "colony loafer" who frequents the voluntary colonies. Indeed the experience of all the colonies where there is no power of detention is that they would be of no use in dealing with a class of men like the habitual vagrant.

Lamb, 6292.
Loch, 8716.
Dawson, 3732.

273. Professor Mavor's opinion of the Belgian colony at Merxplas is as follows:—

"The Belgian institution seems to me to be simply punitive. The men remain there for a term of years under strict discipline, and in a position in which they are as nearly as possible prevented from doing any harm to themselves or society; but when they emerge their record precludes their being employed in ordinary industry, and they again fall into the hands of the police, to be sent back to the colony to harder work and a longer term of imprisonment than before."*

Again, referring to Merxplas and the Dutch beggar colony at Veenhuizen, he says that a colony of this type

"would be a prison to which vagrants would be committed by the magistrates for specific periods. The only difference between such a colony and a prison would lie in the character of the labour performed, and in the nature of the restrictions upon the liberty of the prisoner. The evidence seems to me to be wholly against the supposition that such institutions are reformatory; they form merely a receptacle for those who, if they were free, would prey upon society, and render means for relieving the deserving poor almost wholly futile."

His general conclusion was as follows:—

"If the intention is to suppress begging, to clear the tramps from the highways and the beggars from the streets, to hide them away out of sight, to keep them out of mischief, and to compel them to work, then the labour colony may be a means of accomplishing this. If it is intended to provide a refuge for those who have been in prison, and who for that reason are unable to obtain employment, the labour colony is also a means of accomplishing this. It may be worth inquiry whether for these two purposes alone it were not well to establish labour colonies in England."

Mr. Willink in his report on the Dutch colonies says:—

"Inefficient work, safe board and lodging, free intercourse night and day with hundreds of others of the same almost hopeless class, nothing to gain by improvement, nothing to lose by stagnation. What is there in this to raise a man? . . . The best that can be said for such an institution is that it keeps decently out of sight and in a condition of animal well-being a class of men who, if not in its keeping, or under some other kind of restraint would, as in England, be a public disgrace and shame, and would also be raising up children to succeed them."

Willink, 8957.

274. We obtained the opinion of two eminent judicial authorities in Belgium as well as of the chief of the police of one of the largest cities in that country as to the effect of Merxplas. Their opinions coincided with that of the director of that institution that little reformation was to be hoped for from the treatment there. At the same time it appears that both in Holland and Belgium the compulsory labour colonies have had a considerable effect in clearing the streets of beggars and tramps. The greatest success appears to have been obtained in Switzerland, and Mr. Preston-Thomas says that it is the opinion of the colony authorities that many of the colonists are reformed to a certain extent. This is probably due in a large measure to the fact that the institutions are small and the men receive more individual treatment than elsewhere. And it appears to be the case that vagrants are now seldom to be seen in Switzerland.

Preston-Thomas, 8375, 8412.

275. In England, the institutions of the labour colony type have no power of keeping a person for any long period against his will, and in most cases the colonist is in them for a comparatively short time. The Salvation Army claim a percentage of success, but, as we have already pointed out, it is difficult to obtain figures that can be tested. In many of such cases the most that can be said is that the men do not come again. A difficulty that is experienced in the case of every labour colony is that the men who have got on do not wish to keep up their connexion with the colony. On a small scale the Lingfield farm colony has had some success, but the men sent there remain rather longer than at Hadleigh and are not of the vagrant class.

276. Generally, then, the information we have points to the fact that the existing labour colonies, whether voluntary or compulsory, exercise but little permanent reformatory influence. There is evidence too that a man coming from a labour colony finds it difficult to obtain work, as people shrink from employing him. With hardly an exception, however, the witnesses we have examined have expressed themselves strongly in favour of habitual vagrants being sent to labour colonies where they can be detained and made to work. There is a consensus of opinion that the evil resulting from the present conditions is so great that it is worth while going to the trouble and expense of making the experiment.* We consider that the need of some power of keeping habitual vagrants in detention for long periods is clearly proved, and in view of the impossibility of making a prison serve the purpose, we feel we have no alternative but to recommend that compulsory labour colonies should be established in this country. Even if they are not successful in achieving greater reformatory effects than the existing labour colonies abroad, we think that at least they may clear the streets of the habitual vagrant and loafer, may make him lead a more useful life during his detention, and may offer a real deterrent to those starting on a life of vagrancy.

Scheme for Labour Colonies.

277. The first question that arises is whether the labour colonies we recommend should be provided by the State, or by local authorities, or whether they should be left to philanthropic agencies. It is considered by many that the State is the proper authority to provide for the compulsory detention of any portion of His Majesty's subjects. Mr. Preston-Thomas said :—

Preston-Thomas,

"It seems to me, personally, that interference with the liberty of adult and sane persons is the function of the Government alone; you cannot depute it to the best managed philanthropic society I do not believe that any civilised Government delegates the charge of its prisoners to an irresponsible body."

He admitted, however, that he would not feel the same objection to putting the colonies under local authorities. Many persons are of opinion that the labour colony must be in effect a prison, and that it should be provided and managed in the same way. Abroad, the compulsory labour colonies are managed and conducted either by the Government or by the local authorities. We consider, however, that there are many reasons why in the first instance the State should not be called upon to provide the institutions which we recommend.

Carlile, 8230.

278. We think it probable that Government institutions for the detention of the more difficult cases will eventually be found necessary, but in our opinion in starting a new scheme it is a sound principle to trust in the first instance to the enterprise of local authorities, voluntary associations, or individual philanthropy under strict supervision by the State and assisted financially from the rates or the national exchequer. There are no means of estimating approximately the number of tramps who might properly be committed to labour colonies, and it is even more impossible to estimate how many would actually be committed if provision were made by law for the purpose. The result of any Government Department undertaking to supply sufficient accommodation for all the vagrants committed by the magistrates would either be that the accommodation would be wholly inadequate for the requirements, or, as is perhaps more probable, that public money would be wasted in establishing and fitting up institutions in which for at all events some years the provision made would be altogether disproportionate to the number of inmates.

Willink, 8914.

279. Again, the success of a labour colony would mainly depend on finding a thoroughly competent staff, and to do this all at once for a sufficient number of colonies would be a matter of very great difficulty. There are in this country no doubt a sufficient number of men fitted by their character and experience to undertake work of the special kind that the management of a compulsory labour colony would require, but it would be a matter of no small difficulty to select them. Probably this could only be done after a period of training and probation.

Brooks, 5232.

280. Further, we consider that for any purposes of reformation the influences that a voluntary philanthropic agency can bring to bear are likely to be more effective than those that could be exercised under an official system. Mr.

Fleming, 500.

* The Departmental Committee on Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, etc. (Scotland), 1894, recommended that labour settlements should be established to which offenders who had already been imprisoned three times within twelve months might be sent by the sheriff for detention for not less than twelve nor more than thirty months. The object of the labour settlements was to be reformatory, and the inmates were to be put to such labour as they were capable of, and as would give them the best prospect of employment after liberation.

Lamb justified his preference for voluntary as opposed to official agencies by remarking that men whom it is hoped to benefit fight shy of officials:

"At Hadleigh, I have seen the men who come down regard us in exactly the same way as other officials, as though we were paid for the work, but when they realised that we were not paid for the work, then their prejudices vanished, and we secured this influence over them that was helpful."

Lamb, 7098-9.

The difficulty, he said, was in persuading the man that you want to benefit him. We think that the best chance of any reformatory effect would be from that personal supervision and care which can only be expected from those who are actuated by religious or charitable motives, and we are strongly of opinion that advantage should be taken as far as possible of all religious influences that can be brought to bear on the vagrant. There is no doubt that this could be done more effectively and with less risk of friction in institutions under private management than in those managed by the State.

Torr, 10289.

281. There is another consideration to which we attach great weight, and that is that labour colonies established by the State would inevitably have to be all of the same type, and we have at present no sufficient knowledge to determine exactly what that type should be. The general principle of a compulsory labour colony for habitual vagrants may be borrowed from abroad, but the essential details must be worked out at home. The necessary proportion of staff to colonists, the best forms of employment, the diet, the most suitable inducements to industry that can be held out—these and a number of other questions can only be settled by reference to the character of the persons to be kept in detention, and in this respect there is probably a very considerable divergence between the English tramp and his Continental confrère. The establishment of compulsory labour colonies would be an experiment, and the conditions under which the experiment should be made could be better supplied by a number of institutions managed by local bodies or private agencies than by one institution, or even by several, under a uniform State control. As Sir John Dorington observed in his evidence, a public department is not very well qualified for making an experiment of this kind.

Torr, 10175.

4371-9, 4433.

282. The foregoing considerations lead us to the opinion that, in the first instance at any rate, the State should not be required to provide the labour colonies, though as we state on page 82, we think one State colony may be required. We realise that if such institutions are established and are utilised very extensively, it may hereafter become necessary that the State should intervene and assume control, but in our view it is not the State that should try the experiment. In this the precedent of inebriate reformatories would be followed. In the establishment of these institutions private or local bodies took the initiative, and it was not until the system had been in working for some considerable time that the State undertook the management of an inebriate reformatory. Now, there are reformatories under private management, under local authorities, and under the State. Our proposal also follows the system under which reformatory and industrial schools were established and are now worked, and this seems the proper course, for in our opinion the labour colonies we suggest should in character really be industrial or reformatory schools for adults rather than penal establishments. Moreover, it should not be forgotten that prior to 1877 local prisons were in the hands of local bodies.

Fleming, 4970.

283. Of the many schemes which have been put before us we would draw special attention to that contained in a Bill which was introduced in the House of Commons by Sir John Gorst during the Session of 1904, with the support of a number of members on both sides of the House. Its main principles have received wide approval. We understand that it was prepared at the instance of the Salvation Army and represented their views at the time. The Bill, following very closely the lines of the Inebriates Act, 1898, would permit of the committal of habitual vagrants for a period not exceeding three years to any place certified by the Secretary of State as a labour colony. It provides for the Secretary of State making regulations for the management of labour colonies and the treatment of their inmates, and for a contribution being made from the Exchequer towards the expense of maintenance, while certain local authorities may contribute towards the establishment or maintenance of a colony and may defray the whole or any part of the cost of any individual inmate's maintenance. The analogy between the institutions contemplated by the Bill and the existing inebriate reformatories is complete, except that no provision is made for a labour colony established and managed by the State. In providing for the compulsory detention of persons on their own application the Bill follows the principle adopted in the case of licensed retreats under the earlier Inebriates Acts.

Lamb, 6189.

Appendix XXVII.

Simpson, 1274.

284. With certain modifications we are prepared to recommend the scheme suggested in that Bill. We agree that each labour colony should be certified by the Secretary of State, should be managed in accordance with regulations issued by him and should be subject to inspection by officers appointed by him. It would be open to him to certify a labour colony established by private philanthropy, or by a religious or charitable society, or by a local authority. We think generally it should be for the council of a county or county borough to make arrangements for the provision of a labour colony to which habitual vagrants committed from their area might be sent. This they might do either by contributing towards the maintenance of a certified labour colony established by the council of some other county or county borough or by a philanthropic body, or by establishing a labour colony themselves. We do not contemplate that there should be a separate colony for each county.

285. Where an institution established by private philanthropy or by a charitable body is certified by the Secretary of State as a labour colony for vagrants, we think that the local authority might come to an agreement with the managers for the reception of either a specified number, or an unlimited number, of habitual vagrants at a fixed rate of maintenance, and it would then be open to the quarter sessions within the area of the local authority to commit to that colony any persons coming within the definition of habitual vagrant. In the early working of the system there would no doubt be counties which had made no arrangements for the reception of cases in a labour colony. In making our proposals for the committal of habitual vagrants to labour colonies we have considered this point, and we have suggested that the power which already exists of sending an incorrigible rogue to prison for a period not exceeding twelve months should be retained and applied to persons who under our scheme would be sent to a labour colony, if there was one available.

287. Contribution towards Cost.—As it is clear that the internment of a number of vagrants in labour colonies would materially reduce the prison population, it is right that the State should pay a substantial part of the cost; and it is also in our opinion right that local rates should pay a part, in consideration of the relief afforded to the locality by the removal of the vagrants, who, if they were not in the labour colony, would probably be frequenting casual wards and cadging on the people of the locality. If the local authority themselves establish the colony and maintain it, some proportion of the cost of maintenance should be repaid from the Exchequer.

288. We feel that the question of the proportion which should be paid by the Exchequer is one for the consideration of the Treasury and the Home Office; but it may be of assistance hereafter if we express our opinion on the point. It seems to us that the simplest arrangement would be for these Departments to settle on a fixed sum per week, which would represent a fair contribution in respect of maintenance in a labour colony. In arriving at this sum consideration should be paid to the dietary which the Central Authority prescribe for labour colonies and the value of the work likely to be done by the inmates. In our view it would be equitable that where the colony is under private management the State and the local authority should each bear one half of this contribution, and that the State should pay the same amount when the local authority itself manages the colony. We think that the contribution should not be so large as to cover the gross cost of maintenance ; for instance, a margin should be left to be made up by the colonist's labour ; this would be an inducement to the authorities of the institution to keep the men fully employed and to get the best work out of them. We would suggest that where a private colony receives contributions from public funds there should be some official audit of their accounts relating to the disposal of the money.

Carlile, 8109.

Lamb, 6358.

289. Incentive to Work.—It is an essential condition that the utmost care should be taken to prevent the life in a labour colony holding out either for the tramp or the working man such attractions as might encourage the latter to embark on a career of vagrancy or the former to continue in it. As we have already remarked, the vagrant's standard of comfort is lower than that of any other class of the community ; and it falls far below the standard reached by the majority of criminals when at large. No doubt the prospect of real work for perhaps two or three years would in any case be some sort of deterrent to the vagrant whose whole object now seems to be to avoid work, but we also consider it very desirable that the diet should not form an attraction. The dietary in some rate-aided institutions is often much superior to that which can be obtained by the independent labourer. An institution intended for habitual vagrants should not be open to this objection.

290. In the next chapter we make definite recommendations, to which we attach great importance, as to the diet in labour colonies. If these are adopted, the dietary will afford a means of encouraging or inducing the colonist to work and conduct himself properly. We realise the futility of establishing labour colonies for the reformation of the habitual vagrant unless some means can be devised of making him work : and it would be undesirable to have to resort to constant punishment to enforce the performance of the daily task. The punishments too would be limited ; bread and water diet could not be given continually, and confinement to a cell would probably soon lose its effect. Compulsion, therefore, would in some cases be impossible, and the inducements to good conduct and industry which are held out to the inmates of prisons, such as letters or visits from their friends, classification indicating superiority of some kind and so on, would scarcely appeal to the majority of the inmates of a vagrant colony. We believe that the best and simplest method of securing the desired end would be to allow the colonists to earn by industry and good conduct small sums of money, a portion of which should be retained until their discharge, and a portion handed over to them weekly to spend, if they like, at the canteen of the colony in the purchase of extra articles of food, tobacco, etc. ; and the accumulation of a certain amount of earnings might afford an opportunity for earlier discharge. This system works well at Merxplas, and we see no reason why it should not have a similar effect in this country. It may be possible also, as we suggest later, to encourage workers by some system of grading or classification. The knowledge that only by industry and good behaviour can any privilege be obtained can hardly fail to be beneficial.

Torr, 10219.

291. Economy.—Another point to which we attach great importance is that in the establishment and management of labour colonies any tendency to extravagance should be avoided. A voluntary agency would of course have a free hand in the establishment of a labour colony, as the expense would be payable by them, and their receipts from the public funds would be limited to the contribution paid in respect of vagrants committed to their colony. But where a local authority seek to establish a labour colony they should be required to show that it is necessary and that adequate arrangements cannot be made with some existing colony. The Central Authority, before giving sanction to the proposal, should also be satisfied that the site proposed is a suitable one and that the price to be paid for its hire or purchase is moderate. Where possible, waste lands should be utilised. Again, in the erection of buildings and in the general conduct of the colony all unnecessary expenditure should be avoided.

292. Labour colonies for vagrants should be organised on a far cheaper scale than, for instance, existing prisons are. Both the cost of erecting and the cost of maintaining prisons depend largely on the necessity of making escape impossible. In the case of labour colonies much expense in the way of buildings and staff can be saved by adopting the view accepted at Merxplas, that it is not worth while to go to great expense in preventing the escape of the inmates. If a colonist escapes and is able to support himself without coming within the reach of the law, his escape from the colony is no matter for regret ; if he breaks the law and comes again before a magistrate a proper system of identification will insure his being sent back to the colony. If the detention is intended not so much as a punishment, but rather as a means of restraining the vagrant from his debased mode of life, the risk of his escaping need not be regarded so seriously as in the case of a criminal committed to prison to expiate his crime. The object of having a detachment of soldiers at Merxplas is, as we understood, not to prevent escapes, but to deal with any outbreak which might occur among the 5,000 colonists. At the same time we think that reasonable precautions should be taken to guard against escapes, and we suggest that, as in the Swiss forced labour institutions, the colonist should be required to wear a dress which is distinctive, even if not conspicuous. In our opinion it would probably be sufficient if the dormitories were enclosed by a wall : the escape of colonists while working on the land could usually be prevented by the assistants. We deal in Chapter IX. more fully with the question of buildings, but in matters of staff also and the general arrangements of the colony we think that economy should be studied, and we suggest generally that some effective checks should be imposed to prevent any waste of public money in connection with the labour colonies.

293. Number and Classification of Inmates.—The Swiss colonies are generally small, the number of colonists in the largest colony not exceeding 200. In Merxplas the inmates number over 5,000, but it should be remembered that this institution is difficult of access and remote from any centre of population. We are strongly of opinion that for a labour colony in this country such a number of inmates would be too large for efficient administration. The massing together of so many men of a low class would constitute a public danger, and render classification difficult and the work of reformation almost impossible. We think that, as a general rule, the number of inmates of a colony should not exceed 500 : with a larger number the difficulties of management and classification would be very great. On the other hand, very small colonies would be more costly, and it is not desirable that these institutions should be unnecessarily multiplied. The number, however, in any one colony must depend on the particular circumstances. We would suggest that the Secretary of State before issuing his certificate should require to be satisfied of the number of inmates for whom provision could be made.

294. Some witnesses have suggested that the colonies should be graded so as to afford an opportunity for the improving man to be moved into a higher class, where he would receive extra privileges, and that there should be classification of inmates according to character. We agree that any measures that would help in the reformation of the men should be adopted, and if it is likely that the moral training would be furthered by having a series of grades in which a man can rise by good conduct and fall by bad conduct, we are of opinion that so far as possible grades should be introduced. Similarly, we think that some system of classification is clearly desirable so as to prevent the improvable cases mixing with the hardened vagrant or criminal. It seems to us, however, that at the start it will be difficult to lay down any definite rules on this point. When labour colonies have been in working for some time and experience has been obtained, it will be more easy to decide to what extent definite grades and classification can be required ; but we deem it essential that the managers of a labour colony should be left to a considerable extent with a free hand at the commencement of the new system.

295. Value and Character of Colonists' Work.—The opinion is held by many that a labour colony can be made a paying concern. It is frequently urged that if able-bodied paupers, unemployed men or even habitual vagrants, were put on the land they could easily pay for their maintenance, and even perhaps afford a profit.* It is as well to say at once that so far as we can judge there is no justification for this opinion. The evidence and information before us point strongly the other way. Mr. Brooks, manager of the Lingfield colony, admitted that a considerable amount of harm may be done by the suggestion that profits can be made from labour colonies, and he said that a farm training colony would not pay its way "under any management in the world," and that all reformatory work must be costly. Speaking of gardening work he said, "it is very difficult to make it pay by skilled labour now, and by these men it could not possibly be made to pay." He agreed that a plough and a couple of horses would probably do more work in a day than all his colonists in a week. The farm colony at Lingfield is well-managed and is worked on strictly economical lines, but it shows considerable loss. So does the Salvation Army colony at Hadleigh. Abroad, as we have already indicated, the experience is much the same except perhaps in some colonies in Switzerland; and the general conclusion at which we have arrived is that no agricultural labour colony could be managed in this country except at a considerable loss, though in proportion as the industrial work is developed it may be possible to reduce the loss. At Merxplas and in some of the German "workhouses," where the work is largely industrial, the net cost per inmate is, as we have already shown, very small.

296. The question as to what would be the actual value of the work done by the inmates of a vagrant labour colony in this country is a very difficult one. The experience of the prison authorities is not of much assistance. On the one hand, as a worker, the average vagrant must no doubt be of less efficiency than

* The Select Committee on Distress from Want of Employment (1895-6) took a good deal of evidence on the subject of farm and labour colonies as a means of dealing with the unemployed. The Committee considered that such colonies under State guarantees would not afford a remedy for the evils resulting from want of employment. The main considerations that influenced them in this opinion were:—

1. Want of employment, which can be provided for with difficulty, generally occurs in large centres of population amongst men who know little of country life, and who would for the most part be inefficient workers on the land. Such persons would probably have great objection to take up work of this description. Your Committee have been informed that not more than 25 per cent. of the unemployed would be suitable for agricultural labour.

2. It could not be expected that a farm colony manned by persons of this class could be carried on except at a loss. Financial failure is not uncommon in farming carried on under skilful management and with efficient trained labour. The losses upon a farm colony recruited from the ranks of the unemployed would probably be heavy and continuous.

3. Experience shows that farm colonies tend to become the resort of the idle and vicious, to the exclusion of the efficient and deserving. In the German free labour colonies 76 per cent. of the inmates have been at one time or other in prison on charges of begging, vagabondage, and drunkenness. The respectable unemployed workman will not associate with these persons, and therefore avoids the colonies.

4. In the winter, when the demand for employment is usually greatest, comparatively little labour can be applied to the land, if, indeed, frost does not render it entirely unworkable.

5. In order to furnish work for the colonists during the winter and inclement weather industrial pursuits other than agriculture must be undertaken in the colony. Owing to the relative inefficiency of the persons so employed it is improbable that their labours would prove a source of profit.

6. It would be difficult to make a farm and labour colony self-supporting, and independent labour might reasonably complain if the produce of such a colony supported by rates or Imperial funds were placed upon the market in competition with the products of their own industry.

7. It is difficult to deal with the unemployed married man in these colonies. To separate him from his family has obvious disadvantages, while the difficulties of administration would be considerably increased if the families of colonists were accommodated in the colony.

8. The better class of unemployed who would make the best colonists would naturally avail themselves of the earliest opportunities to return to their own employment. For the most part such persons would remain but a short time in the colony. Again, unsettled and shiftless persons of the class known to Poor Law administrators as "the ins and outs" may be expected frequently to seek discharge and re-admission. These changes would tend to increase the cost of management.

9. Notwithstanding the establishment of farm and labour colonies on the largest scale in Germany and Holland, the municipal authorities experience a demand for employment. In Mr. Llewellyn Smith's words: "The German labour colonies have not practically touched the question of fluctuation of employment in Germany."

the average prisoner, as he will usually have been inured to a life of idleness and shiftlessness, while many prisoners are excellent, and some quite first-rate, workmen ; but, on the other hand, there would be the advantage that the inmate of the labour colony would be under detention for at least six months at a time. The great difficulty in the way of obtaining useful labour from prisoners in local prisons is that 94 per cent. of the males and 98 per cent. of the females are under sentences not exceeding three months, the average length of sentence being thirty-four days for males and twenty-four for females. This does not, of course, apply to convicts under sentence of penal servitude, but in their case the admixture of men of exceptionally violent or determined character raises difficulties in the way of the organisation of prison industries which would hardly exist in the labour colonies. The Report of the Prison Commissioners for the year ended 31st March, 1905, shows that the average annual earning of an inmate of a local prison is £11 16s. 5d., and of a convict prison £24 18s. 11d.

297. The other institutions with which the proposed colonies have been compared, namely, inebriate reformatories and reformatory and industrial schools, can scarcely be taken as a guide in this respect. The latter are schools of apprenticeship for the young. With regard to the former it must be remembered that most of them are still in their infancy, and the managers have not yet had sufficient experience to guide them in turning the capacities of the inmates to the best advantage ; that the largest has an average daily population of less than 200, and most of them have less than 100 inmates ; that the majority of persons committed to them are women, and that all have impaired their powers of work by persistent drunkenness. In none of these institutions therefore can it be reasonably expected that the work done by the inmates will ever go far towards paying the cost of their maintenance.

298. It is impossible to ascertain with accuracy what is the money value of the work done by men at the existing colonies in this country. But even if this were known, no comparison could usefully be drawn between philanthropic institutions to which selected cases are sent for the purpose of reformation and which have no legal power of compulsion, and places to which habitual vagrants would be committed under sentence by courts of law. We do not suggest that the success of a colony should be estimated solely by the money value of the work done there ; but though we place the training of the "work-shy" loafer in habits of industry as the most important object to be aimed at, we think that in a well-managed colony a not inconsiderable percentage of the inmates might, after a short period of detention, be made to earn a substantial part of the cost of their maintenance.

299. Apart from the fact that agriculture alone would not pay, the experience of labour colonies is that agriculture could not be relied upon as the sole employment for the colonists : on wet days throughout the year, in frosty weather, and, indeed, during a great part of the winter, but little farm work could be carried on ; again, some of the colonists would be quite unfitted for work of this character ; and, lastly, there would be difficulty in disposing of the surplus agricultural produce without affecting outside industries.

300. Everywhere the managers of colonies have found it necessary to establish workshops and various kinds of indoor industries in addition to work on the land, and it seems clear that the organisation of indoor industries must take the foremost place in a colony if employment has to be found for a large body of colonists all the year round. It is of course desirable that a colony should be as far as possible self-supporting ; that is, it should erect its own buildings and produce all the things it requires. If a colony produces goods in excess of its own requirements it must dispose of them outside, and then comes in the question of competing with independent labour. It is expedient as far as possible to avoid such competition ; but if the colony does not compete with outside labour, then it is only fair that outside labour should not provide goods or do work for the colony.

301. Mr. Torr, who has carefully investigated the working of the Belgian colonies, stated his views on this question as follows :—

‘My point is that you must either isolate outside labour as a whole, and let the colony provide for itself entirely, in which case you may rightly say, ‘You must not sell anything in the outside labour market’; but you have no right—as is being done now—to say to the colonists, ‘We will do a lot of work for you, in the shape of making your clothes, building your house, grinding your corn, and sending it in as flour, but you must not do any work for us.’ If the outside labour sends into the colony, the colony must send out to pay for its purchases, but if, on the other hand, you start the colonies, or develop them, on what you may call a communistic basis, so that they do everything for themselves, then you may quite easily insist that they shall sell nothing outside I should like to see them entirely cut off from the open market, and be entirely self-supporting communities, subsisting by their own exertions . . . if they can produce more than they consume, they are more than self-supporting; the whole mischief of these places is that they cannot produce as much as they consume, and that is why the outside world has to help them.’

“However you start these colonies, however much they produce, outside labour will always have to pay something for them.”

302. We think that conflict with outside industries might be avoided to a large extent by one colony supplying another with goods which it was specially fitted to produce. For instance, one colony, on account of the soil might be able to make bricks cheaply, and in sufficient quantities for all the other colonies. Again, proximity to a stream might enable another colony to establish mills of various kinds. And it might be possible to start new industries which would not interfere with existing interests. This was done at Merxplas, where the button-making industry was started for the first time in Belgium. Mr. Preston-Thomas in his evidence suggested the making of straw cases for wine bottles as a useful occupation for men who were not able-bodied, which would affect no English industry, and no doubt others could be discovered. For instance, the sorting of rag and paper from refuse heaps would be a remunerative occupation. Possibly certain goods required by the Government, such as boots for the Army, might be made in labour colonies. Care must be taken that when goods are produced by a colony for sale, the independent producer is not undersold. It is important that industries of a useful kind should be established in the colony so that the work might be an encouragement to the colonists and that there might be work for all. Land reclamation and the erection of buildings would provide a useful occupation at first, but after this had been accomplished there would be the greater necessity for other industries.

Preston-Thomas, 8331.

303. Cost of Maintenance.—The net annual cost of prisoners in this country (including staff, maintenance, and buildings) after making allowance for labour is about £23 in local prisons, and £27 in convict prisons; at Hadleigh and Lingfield the cost is greater, but in these institutions there is no power of detention. In many of the forced labour institutions abroad the net cost per inmate, as we have shown, is very small; and we think that under the scheme that we have suggested, if due regard is paid to economy, it will be possible to maintain the habitual vagrant at an expenditure but little exceeding that incurred abroad. At present pauper cases are sent to Hadleigh and Lingfield at a charge of 10s. 6d. per week, which is reduced after three months to 7s. The dietary we propose in the next Chapter should effect a saving of about 3s. or 4s. weekly on what has hitherto been thought possible in this country; and this, coupled with the fact that the colonists will be detained for a considerable time and made to work, justifies us in the hope that the net cost of a colonist—and on this the contributions should be based—should not in the long run exceed 4s. or 5s. weekly. In considering the question it is necessary to remember that at present the habitual vagrant, whether as beggar or as inmate of casual wards or prison, is a continual source of expense to the community. It is at least possible that the scheme which we propose for the detention of this class may be found on the whole less costly than the existing system.

304. Inspection.—We have recommended that labour colonies for habitual vagrants should be subject to inspection by officers appointed by the Secretary of State. We attach great importance to this inspection ; it should be regularly carried out and there should be an opportunity for the colonists to appeal to the Government Inspector much in the same way as in prisons. But we do not wish that these inspections should result in the labour colony being regarded in the same light as a prison ; it would be essential for the success of the new institutions that the managers should not be crippled by too restrictive regulations, but that they should be judged by results rather than by incidental details, and it is especially desirable in the interests of economy that the cost of administration should be reduced to a minimum.

305. State Colony.—Although we have recommended that labour colonies should be established and managed by county councils and voluntary agencies rather than by the State, we are of opinion that it may be necessary to have at least one institution under State control. It will no doubt be found that certain of the habitual vagrants will not be amenable to the discipline of the ordinary labour colonies, or from their repeated escapes and recommitments will need a more severe treatment. We would suggest that instead of sending such cases to a prison, a labour colony of a penal type should be established by the State. This State labour colony should be conducted generally on the lines of the ordinary labour colony, except that the discipline enforced should be more severe and that escapes should be more carefully guarded against. It would also be necessary to secure that it did not possess attractions over the ordinary colonies, either in diet or other respects.

CHAPTER VIII.

DIETARY FOR CASUAL WARDS AND LABOUR COLONIES.

306. On the general question of dietary we have received valuable assistance from Sir Michael Foster, late Secretary of the Royal Society, whose great authority in such a matter will be recognised on all hands, and from Dr. Hopkins, Reader in Physiology at the University of Cambridge. The latter in his evidence described to us the principles governing food standards, and Sir Michael Foster has supplied us with a Memorandum on this evidence. Some notes on this subject by Dr. Downes are also printed in the Appendix.

Appendix
XXVIII.
XXIX.

307. It appears that our knowledge of actual food requirement is at present in a somewhat transitional stage. Recent studies by careful and competent observers indicate that the standards hitherto laid down by science are in excess of actual needs and should accordingly be re-considered. Dr. Hopkins, indeed, thought that the recent work in this field may render expedient some re-consideration of prison and workhouse dietaries generally. As regards certain of the more costly constituents of food there is reason to believe that a considerable diminution from the accepted standards may be effected not only without harm but with distinct gain in physical efficiency. With a further increase of exact knowledge it may be possible to define more closely the requirements of dietaries for the purpose we have in view, but for the present we think that the standard proposed by Sir Michael Foster may be adopted as a guide to the average allowance of food which should be given. This requires a daily amount of food equivalent to about 2,500 calories * in heat-producing value and containing about 55 grammes of proteid, or nitrogenous constituents, as a minimum for a man doing "a fair day's work," but Sir Michael Foster in considering more particularly the case of a labour colony suggests that it would be politic to increase this to, say, 70 grammes or more of proteid, and 3,000 calories. On this basis we will proceed to consider the diet necessary for use in casual wards and labour colonies.

Hopkins

Casual Wards.

308. In Chapter IV. we have referred generally to the dietary at present in force in casual wards, and we have indicated that there is considerable variation in different unions. In the Appendix details are given as to the various alternative diets now allowed by the Orders of the Local Government Board, and it will be seen that these diets differ widely in attractiveness and in nutritive value. We have shown elsewhere our views as to the necessity for consistent treatment of the inmate of the casual wards, and we think that the same principle should apply to matters of diet. We therefore recommend that there should be one uniform and definite diet for this class laid down and adhered to throughout the country. If our proposals for the transfer of the management of casual wards to the police are adopted, the question of the dietary would become a matter for determination by the Home Office. The actual scale would, no doubt, be fixed on expert advice, but we think it right to state our views on the subject and to indicate the general considerations which, in our opinion, should govern the allowance of food.

Appendix XXIX.

309. The food given should be simple, unattractive and cheap; and it should be such as may readily be stored and issued for the use of daily fluctuating numbers or may easily be prepared and served. These conditions are essential to facility and economy of management. The necessity for cooking should be reduced to a minimum, and to this end we suggest that porridge and gruel which are now largely given in casual wards should be omitted from the dietary, but we think some hot food should be given with at least the evening meal. It is important that the diet allowed to the man who uses the casual wards should be sufficient and complete in itself, so that on this score there should be no excuse for begging or for casual almsgiving, and for this reason we consider that the man leaving the casual ward in the morning should be enabled to obtain a mid-day meal. We suggest in Chapter V. that the holder of a way-ticket should be supplied with his ration of bread and cheese on leaving the casual ward in the morning, while the man who has no way-ticket should receive an order which would enable him to obtain his bread and cheese at some specified place (preferably a police station) in the direction towards which he states he is travelling. In the Appendix will be found details of a dietary prepared by Dr. Downes, which seems to us to meet the conditions we have mentioned. Under this dietary the food would be the following :—

* This is the 'large calorie' (kilo-calorie) or the measure of heat required to raise a litre of water 1° Cent.

Breakfast.—Bread, 8 oz. ; margarine, $\frac{3}{4}$ oz. ; cocoa (made with cocoa husk), 1 pint.

Dinner.—Bread, 8 oz. ; cheese, $1\frac{1}{2}$ oz.

Supper.—Bread, 8 oz. ; margarine, $\frac{3}{4}$ oz. ; potatoes (cooked), 6 oz.

Salt, 1 oz. per 5 men daily.

The food in the above dietary would at present contract prices cost about s. $7\frac{1}{2}$ d. per week, and would provide in food-value 2,500 calories with 63 grammes of proteid daily. By using porridge or gruel it would be possible to supply this value at a lower initial cost for food, but this would involve increased cost and difficulty in preparation and service. To meet the varying requirements of different men, we recommend that arrangements should be made as far as possible for the service of a portion of the bread according to appetite, as is now the practice in workhouses, and some discretion might be allowed to the superintendent of the wards to issue extra bread if necessary.

310. We have suggested that women and children on tramp should be received into the workhouse instead of the casual wards. In that case we think they should receive the ordinary workhouse diet. In cases where the arrangements for the reception of women and children in casual wards are temporarily continued, a diet similar to that prescribed for men should be given to the women, but they would ordinarily need about 4 oz. less bread daily than men. Young children received in a casual ward should be given a milk diet as at present, while older ones should have a diet similar to that for women.

Labour Colonies.

311. We attach great importance to a carefully devised scheme of diet in labour colonies. In fact we regard this as a keystone of the system for the initiation and maintenance of habits of industry and of discipline. We recommend that a dietary should be settled by the Home Office which should apply, with such variation as different circumstances may require, to all labour colonies for habitual vagrants whether managed by voluntary associations, by local authorities or by the Prison Commissioners. We contemplate that the men will be actively employed on productive labour, in the open as much as may be possible ; that each man will have direct and tangible advantage in proportion to his industry ; and, further, that healthy recreation will be provided and loafing prevented. In such conditions the depressing influences of loss of liberty may be minimised or avoided, and the dietary may be considered from a different standpoint from that of ordinary places of detention. The public may rightly demand that the habitual vagrant shall be maintained at as low a cost as possible. But apart from the question of cost, it is necessary that the ordinary diet should afford no attraction to the vagrant.

312. The system we suggest is that a diet of very plain food should be allowed to each man, and that it should be open to him to supplement this by means of work and good conduct ; thus, alternative rations of a more attractive kind might be given to those who work well, or a canteen might be provided at which, with tokens earned by the colonist, purchases might be made of articles such as bacon, cheese, dry fish, dripping, jam, tea, tobacco, etc. These should be obtainable at cost price, and arrangements should be made enabling a man to have cooked, or to cook for himself, any extra food purchased by him. The portion of a man's earnings which would be requisite for this purpose need be very small. We consider some arrangement of this kind indispensable as an inducement and stimulus to good work. On the other hand, exclusion from privileges of this kind as a punishment, would be an effective instrument of discipline; while, as an auxiliary of diet, the canteen would be of real benefit to the worker.

313. The diet which the colonist should receive, apart from what he could earn by his work, should in our opinion be simply sufficient for subsistence. Particulars are given in the Appendix of a dietary which we consider would be suitable. The cost of the food would, at present contract prices, be about 1s. 4½d. per head weekly. The diet would be as follows:— Appendix XXIX.

Breakfast and supper:—

Bread, 8 oz.; cocoa (made with cocoa husk), 1 pint.

Dinners for a week:—

Two days—Bread, 8 oz.; pea (or lentil) soup, 1 pint.

Two days—Bread, 6 oz.; cheese, 2 oz.; potatoes (cooked), 6 oz.

Two days—Bread, 2 oz.; broth, 1 pint; suet pudding, 12 oz.

One day—Bread, 8 oz.; stew, 1 pint.

Salt for table: 1 oz. per 5 men daily.

314. This diet would furnish a daily allowance of about 2,236 calories with 66 grammes of proteid. The substitution of a pint of oatmeal gruel for the cocoa-husk drink at supper (which would cost an additional 1d. per week) would raise the diet to a value of 2,500 calories, with 73 grammes of proteid, which is in excess of the minimum standard allowed by Sir Michael Foster. It would be well that the men should learn to live thriftily, and to show how little need be expended in order to supplement the minimum diet, it may be mentioned that 2 oz. of good cheese, which at 6d. per pound should cost ½d. at the canteen, would afford about 240 calories and 15 grammes of proteid; and for ½d. a man should be able to purchase 2 oz. of dripping, with about 500 calories of food-value. That is to say, the very moderate outlay of 1½d. per day would suffice to secure additions which would bring the diet up to a value of 3,000 calories with 80 grammes of proteid.

The regular meals should ordinarily be served in one or more common dining-halls, and a portion of the bread should be served according to appetite. The dietary of the sick should be left to the discretion of the medical officer, and it would be desirable that he should also have a discretionary power, as in workhouses, in exceptional cases or circumstances.

315. In some of the existing farm colonies in this country the cost of food is estimated at from 4s. 6d. to 7s. per week. It will be seen that the dietary we propose will cost about 1s. 6d. per week, and we recommend that in any grant or payment from public funds in respect of the maintenance of habitual vagrants in a colony the proportion allowed for food should not exceed the cost of the amount actually required for the subsistence diet. It is not only important that the expense of the labour colony should be kept low, but by a careful limitation of payments from public funds the management should be stimulated to watchful regard for productive industry in order that their work may be conducted on sound principles.

316. The outstanding feature of the dietary we suggest is that while it is sufficient, it is cheap and unattractive. By means of it labour colonies could be managed in this country on less expensive lines than has hitherto seemed possible, and with a far greater chance of success in obtaining work from the inmates. Similar systems are in force abroad and have been found to answer.

CHAPTER IX.

COST OF BUILDINGS.

317. Casual wards.—In the course of our Inquiry we have had our attention drawn to the question of the cost of buildings. As regards the existing casual wards which have been built by boards of guardians at the cost of the poor rates, we have been furnished by Mr. Kitchin, the Architect of the Local Government Board, with particulars as to expenditure incurred in recent cases. We have been struck with the great diversity in the expenditure; in many country districts the cost is comparatively small; for instance, at Tavistock and Horn-castle the cost of the casual wards per head in accommodation provided, was only £33, at Kettering the cost was £48 per head, at Farnham £55, and at Warwick £52. But in some instances in London, and in a few of the larger towns, the cost has reached a very high figure. Thus at Leeds it was £154 per head, at Newcastle £145, and at Stockton £163; while in London, the Paddington casual wards cost £195 per head, Poplar £219, and Hackney no less than £346, the total cost of the wards in the last mentioned case being £36,710. The estimate of the proposed wards for Bethnal Green, of which the plans have recently been approved by the Local Government Board, works out at £261 per head. Mr. Kitchin puts the average cost in the country at £60 and in London at £150. No doubt the expense of building is necessarily higher in the larger towns than in country districts, and in London the stringent requirements of the London Building Act as to fire precautions and drainage are responsible for an increase in expenditure; but, giving all due regard to these points, it seems to us that in certain cases the cost incurred is excessive and altogether disproportionate to the objects intended to be secured.

318. In London the cost of the casual wards is a charge on the whole Metropolis, and, subject to the sanction of the Local Government Board, the expense is paid out of the Metropolitan common poor fund. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that this system is an inducement to extravagance. The Local Government Board, it appears, carefully watch expenses chargeable to the fund, but there is a difficulty in restricting the expenditure of any particular board of guardians. Mr. Kitchin admits that the provision for vagrants in London is enormously costly, but he points out that it is not the requirements of the Local Government Board which are the reason of the large cost, as the Board have been satisfied in several cases with buildings which have cost less than £50 per head, and they have constantly made efforts to secure less expensive buildings. These efforts have failed, and it seems to us that the system under which sanction is given for expenditure of this kind in London needs reconsideration. We are of opinion that it is most important that where one district has the power of spending money raised by other districts, there should be ample checks to prevent extravagance, and that, generally, restrictions should be applied more stringently than when it is a question of expenditure falling only on the particular district for whose benefit it is incurred.

319. It will be seen, however, that it is not only in London that the cost of casual wards is excessive. The sanction of the Local Government Board is required to all expenditure on such buildings, but Mr. Kitchin says: "it is much easier to make out a case for expenditure than to make out a case for economy," and if the local authority want to spend money it is difficult to check them. We are informed that it is the practice for the architect to a board of guardians to be paid a commission of 5 per cent. on the expenditure on buildings; the greater the expenditure therefore, the greater is his commission, and it does not seem to us that this system is an inducement to economy. Mr. Kitchin stated his views as to the position of the ratepayers as regards expenditure on poor law buildings as follows:—

"I think the ratepayer is in a very obscure position as regards the cost of buildings that he has got to pay for, and I do not think the ratepayer is fairly treated in many respects. These schemes are very often undertaken merely on architects' estimates. The local authority has sufficient money sanctioned to proceed with the scheme, and by the time the scheme is finished perhaps there is an increase of thirty or forty or even fifty per cent. on what the ratepayer supposed he was in for."

320. If our proposal for the transfer of the care of vagrants to the police authorities is adopted, the erection of any new casual wards in the future will be a matter for standing joint committees and watch committees. But whatever body is concerned we consider it important that the Central Authority should do all in their power to secure that no unnecessary expense is incurred, and that only buildings of a simple kind are erected. The suggestion that some limit of expenditure in the case of casual wards should be fixed seems to us to be worthy of consideration, and we think that the Central Authority, whether it be the Home Office or the Local Government Board, might also exercise an effective control by refusing loans for expenditure which appears at all excessive. Kitchin, 10136-9.

321. Labour colonies.—In Chapter VII. we have already touched on the subject of economy in the labour colony. In the case of labour colonies established by a local authority, we think it very desirable that economy in buildings should be practised by the local body and enforced by the Central Authority. The experience of the Hadleigh and Lingfield colonies, as well as the Laindon colony of the Poplar guardians, shows that it is not necessary to incur a large expenditure in order to provide adequate accommodation. We consider that the initial buildings of a labour colony should be of a cheap and temporary character ; later on, more permanent accommodation might be provided by the labour of the colonists, when it is seen how the colony is likely to develop. At Merxplas all the buildings have been erected by the colonists. Brooks, 5129-45.
Crooks, 5481.
Carlile, 8115,
Torr, 10274.

322. In a labour colony it is necessary to avoid the heavy expense which is now often incurred in the provision of public buildings. Mr. Kitchin has furnished us with a sketch plan of buildings for a labour colony to accommodate 119 inmates at an approximate cost of £6,396. This provides ample accommodation at a cost of about £53 per head, even if it is necessary to call in outside labour for the purpose. But in our view permanent buildings should not be erected at the start, and as much work as possible should be done by the colonists themselves. It may be necessary in some cases to remove the colony to another place, and this is an additional reason for having temporary buildings. It would seem desirable that buildings for a labour colony should be exempt from the operation of the local bye-laws, so that any unnecessary expense in order to comply with restrictive conditions might be avoided. Preston-Thomas, 8476.
Kitchin, 9899.
Appendix XXXI.

323. At present it seems to be the tendency on the part of local authorities, generally, to erect elaborate and costly buildings without due regard either to the class for whom they are intended or to the burdens already borne by the class on whom the cost will fall. Whether the buildings are paid for out of loans or not, the rates have to bear the burden. Mr. Preston-Thomas says :— Lamb, 6379.

“Everything in England is done at such enormous expense. Things are done here on such a lavish scale ; whether it is spending money subscribed by the charitable, or money raised from the rates, or raised from the taxes, there are so many people whose great object seems to be to spend as much as possible and to do the work in as costly a way as possible. In Switzerland they are a thrifty nation, and I think they are thrifty in spending public money, just as much as they are in spending their own money.” Lockwood, 10461.
Preston-Thomas, 8439.

We are strongly of opinion that, as regards any buildings coming within our proposals, means should be adopted to protect the ratepayer from any expenditure that is not really necessary for the object in view.

324. The general question of the control of common lodging-houses goes beyond the scope of our Inquiry and we are concerned with them only in so far as they are used by persons of the vagrant class ; but in the course of our Inquiry our attention has been drawn to certain matters in connection with these houses which call for notice. In another place we refer to the question of what proportion of the inmates of common lodging-houses are vagrants, and it is shown that a greater number of vagrants resort to common lodging-houses than casual wards. Some of the witnesses draw a contrast between the accommodation in the two institutions, from which it appears that while the casual ward is much cleaner and better conducted from a sanitary point of view, and provides free food and lodging, the common lodging-house is more popular with the tramp on account of the lack of restrictions and the fact that there is no task of work. In some districts it is the practice, if the casual wards are full, to give a vagrant who applies for relief a ticket on a common lodging-house. It seems to us that a system of this kind can hardly fail to be an encouragement to vagrancy. If at any time the accommodation in the casual wards is insufficient, we think that provision of a temporary nature should be made which will ensure that the relief given is accompanied by adequate restrictions.

Appendix II.

325. Outside London the law as to common lodging-houses is contained in the Public Health Act, 1875. Under this Act a house has to be approved and registered by the local sanitary authority before it can be used as a common lodging-house, and the authority has considerable powers of control, including inspection and the making of bye-laws as to the management of the house. The bye-laws can deal with the following important matters :—

- (i.) the regulation of the number of lodgers to be received into a common lodging-house, and the separation of the sexes ;
- (ii.) cleanliness and ventilation ;
- (iii.) precautions in case of infectious disease, and
- (iv.) generally the good management of the house.

Loch, 8637.

326. In London and some thirty other towns power has been obtained by local Acts to require an annual licence to be taken out. This requirement affords an opportunity for enforcing such improvements as the authority consider necessary, and we think it would be a great advantage if the provision applied to the whole of the country. In London the county council, who are the authority under the Common Lodging Houses Acts, 1851 and 1853, exercise an effective control, and the general standard of cleanliness and decency in the houses has been improved. Outside London, the control which sanitary authorities exercise over common lodging-houses varies greatly. In some districts the houses are not registered, and in many districts there is no inspection by the authority. Again, many authorities have not availed themselves of the extensive powers of control which they could obtain by means of bye-laws ; more than one-fourth of the urban districts and three-fourths of the rural districts, in fact, are without any bye-laws at all on the subject.

James, 7735.

327. In the following chapter we deal with the question of common lodging-houses as affecting the spread of disease by tramps, but speaking generally we think that local authorities should exercise a more efficient sanitary control over common lodging-houses. If the existing powers were used, and the power of annual licensing obtained, a much needed improvement in the condition of the houses could be secured. We also think there would be advantage in the police having access to the common lodging-houses. In London the right of entry is conferred by special provision and we suggest that this power should be made universal. Such a measure would greatly assist the general scheme which we propose for the control of vagrants by the police.

It is in London that the lodging-house system is most highly developed, and it may be useful to give some details of the conditions prevailing there.

The London Vagrant.

328. A considerable portion of the vagrant class in London frequent common lodging-houses and shelters. Detailed information regarding common lodging-houses in London will be found in the valuable memorandum prepared by Sir Shirley Murphy and in the evidence given by him and Mr. Jury. It will be seen that the charge for a night's lodging for single men is from 3d. to 1s., the most usual charge being 4d. to 6d.; the charge for single women is 5d. to 1s.; and for married couples the charge is generally 1s. The number of common lodging-houses in the county of London in 1904 was 451, with an authorised accommodation of 28,896 beds; in 1894 the number was 654, and the accommodation 29,827. The reason for the decrease in the number of houses is said to be that in recent years large houses have been erected in place of small ones; and the decrease in the number of beds is possibly due to the increase of tenement houses. As we have stated, the common lodging-houses in London are under the inspection and control of the county council* and appear to be excellently managed. Among them is a lodging-house which is the property of the council; this is rather a better class of house than most, and the charge is 6d. per night. At this house food is provided on the premises at a tariff approved by the council, and at many of the other houses, also, food is sold on the premises, the prices being extremely moderate. Appendix IX.

329. A considerable proportion of the inmates of the common lodging-houses are men who earn wages as dock labourers, porters, newsvendors, and occasionally artisans; their employment is intermittent, but many of them are permanent residents and cannot be regarded as vagrants in any sense. These regular inmates are, of course, preferred by the keepers of the houses; their beds are retained for them and they make the lodging-house their home. The occupants of the common lodging-houses are mostly males. Out of 23,381 inmates on the 17th February, 1905, only 1,935 were women; there were only 34 children. Murphy, 5645.

330. In addition to the ordinary common lodging-houses there are 23 "shelters" managed by charitable societies. They provide accommodation for 2,849 males and 453 females, at less than the ordinary rates. A few of these shelters are free; some belonging to the Church Army exact a task of work from the inmates instead of payment, and others which belong to the Salvation Army provide shelter and two meals for 4d. In the shelter the inmates, as a rule, are turned out in the morning, while in the common lodging-house they can remain all day. Mr. Loch says that the common lodging-houses exist on a demand, while the shelter creates a demand. Sir Shirley Murphy thus distinguishes the shelters from the common lodging-houses:— Loch, 8636.

"I think the difference between the shelter and the common lodging-house is that the common lodging-house keeper professedly carries on his business for the purpose of profit, and the shelter has been provided by people who put to the forefront a philanthropic object. Then again, the use of the house is a different one, because the philanthropic person provides poorer accommodation than the ordinary lodging-house keeper does who has to depend upon the attractions of his house for his success in his business. This is most conspicuous in the bed accommodation that is provided. In the ordinary common lodging-house the bed consists of a small iron bedstead, a straw mattress, palliasses, blankets, sheets, and a pillow. In the shelter the accommodation is very often very inferior. It consists of a wooden bunk lying upon the floor; the lodger sleeps on a mattress covered with American cloth, and has an American cloth apron to cover him, and sheets and blankets are not provided." Murphy, 5664, 5835.

* Previous to 1894 the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis acted as the local authority. In that year his powers were transferred to the London county council by Provisional Order; but it was provided that any police officer of the Metropolitan police was at all times to have free access to a common lodging-house or any part of it.

Murphy, 5670. 331. An objection to the bunks is that the persons using them sleep in their ordinary clothes. Sir Shirley Murphy does not entirely base his objection to bunks on the grounds of health, but urges that those using them "ought to be taught, as far as it is practicable to teach them, to adopt habits and methods of life that are, under ordinary conditions, deemed to be proper for human beings." Another objection is that it is difficult to detect vermin in a bunk.

Jury, 5691. "It is a black bunk: on a white sheet you could see the vermin, but this is a black mattress; they wash it with some disinfectant, for they know there is vermin on it, and they scrub the floors with disinfectant. Of course they do cleanse the place, but at the same time a man goes away with the majority of the parasites on him, and he is still a pest and a nuisance to anybody he comes in contact with."

Murphy, 5669. Some of the shelters are fitted with what are known as "multiple bunks," which are bunks in tiers one over the other. These are considered open to objection as not affording sufficient means of ventilation.

Lamb, 7031.7186. 332. The Salvation Army shelters provide accommodation for about 2,400 persons. The charge for the night varies from 2d. for a bed only, or 4d. with supper and breakfast, to 6d. for the bed only. Each shelter is supposed to pay its own working expenses including the rent, and Mr. Lamb says that the shelters do pay as a whole. Where money has been borrowed or given to establish the shelter the rent charged against the shelter is fixed at a certain percentage on the loan or gift. It is stated that one of the objects of the shelters is to afford an opportunity of selecting men to be sent to the Salvation Army workshops or "elevators," and the colony at Hadleigh, and there trained for some useful work. During the two years ended September, 1904, only 137 persons were sent from the shelters to the colony; so that it would not appear that as feeders to the colony the shelters are of much value. We have no information that any considerable number of men were sent to the workshops from the shelters.

Carlile, 8014. 333. The Church Army deal with large numbers of the vagrant class by means of shelters (e.g., the King's tent), receiving homes and labour homes. Mr. Carlile told us that for five months in the winter of 1904-5, 2,000 men were nightly received in the Church Army shelters, and in return for three hours' work were fed and given a bed. The cost to the Church Army per head was 4d. for a bed and 2d. for food, while the value of the work done was $\frac{1}{2}$ d. or 1d. The usual method of operation of the Church Army is through "receiving homes" and "labour homes": in the former a destitute person can receive relief on condition that he does some work, but he can leave when he likes. Selected cases are sent to the labour home on undertaking to stay for a certain time. They can have work for four months and can receive pay for three months. Adjoining the labour homes, the Church Army usually have a lodging-house at which the charge is 5d. or 6d. a night. These lodging-houses have accommodation similar to the ordinary 6d. common lodging-house, and are under the supervision of the county council.

8023-69. 334. There are several free shelters in existence, chiefly in the east end of London. The largest of these is Medland Hall, which is managed by the London Congregational Union. During the year 1904, the total of the admissions here came to 123,702, or an average per night of 339; an average of 93 per night were turned away on account of insufficient accommodation. During the year employment was found for 75 men. Bread and butter is given to each inmate of the shelter. On an average each inmate is admitted eleven nights in the year.

Crooks, 5465. 335. Vagrants who frequent shelters and the cheaper lodging-houses appear to belong to a lower class than the casual pauper and are much less clean. We may mention here that under the Cleansing of Persons Act, 1897, the borough councils in London are empowered to provide, free of cost, means for the cleansing of persons infected by vermin, but it appears that only three of the councils have made any special provision under the Act. In one of these cases, St. Marylebone, the cleansing station is near a shelter and has been largely used. Other borough councils appear to have made arrangements for persons desiring to be cleansed to go to the casual wards, but the applications for this purpose have been few. There is no power to require the cleansing of a person who is definitely recognised to be verminous. Many of the persons who frequent shelters or sleep out are a distinct nuisance and source of danger on account of their filthy condition. Murphy, 5692-3.

Mulvany, 9645.

336. In Sir Shirley Murphy's memorandum will be found some interesting particulars as to the cost of living of the poorer inmates of common lodging-houses. It appears that a man can obtain lodging and food for less than a shilling a day, including a fair proportion of meat. Meat which is known in the East End as "block ornaments," that is to say, the outside pieces or trimmings which are cut off by the butcher when he wants to produce a more attractive surface, can be bought at 2½d. a pound. In the Victoria Homes, which are rather superior lodging-houses managed by a philanthropic society in the East End, a man can obtain a comfortable lodging and three good meals for 1s. a day.* The clothing worn by this class is also almost incredibly cheap. The following was the price of reasonably good clothes which were produced to us by Sir Shirley Murphy and Mr. Jury, viz., man's coat 8d., trousers 9d., shirt 3d., waistcoat 2d., socks 1d., cap 2½d. Boots can be bought from 8d. to 9d. per pair, but odd boots cost only 4d. or 5d. for a couple. Women's clothing, it appears, is equally cheap. Appendix IX.

337. Existing conditions all help to make the life of a man of the vagrant class cheap and easy, so long as his standard of living is low. He can get a good or clean bed at a common lodging-house for 4d. or 6d., and three meals for another 6d. Or he can get a lodging of some sort and two meals at a Salvation Army shelter for 4d., or at certain times at a Church Army shelter for three hours' easy work. Or he can go to a free shelter and save his lodging money. His clothing, as we show, costs but little, and in a great town a shilling a day can easily be earned by cab-running, newspaper selling, begging and so on. 5900.

Effect of Shelters and Free Food Distributions.

338. Many persons who are convinced that it is morally wrong to give indiscriminate alms to a beggar are yet prepared to defend the distribution of free food or the institution of a free shelter. They do so apparently on the ground that the man who will seek a scanty allowance of free food at night must be in a condition of extreme poverty, and that the man who frequents a free shelter is without question destitute, and therefore a fit object of charity. It is not for us to discuss the ethics of the question, but we may safely affirm that the weight of evidence given before us points irresistibly to the conclusion that both free food and free shelters are demoralising to the recipients and a source of danger to the community. The harm that such institutions cause may be stated in various ways:—

1. That they encourage vagrancy by making it possible for men to lead an idle life;
2. That they attract vagrants into the towns and render the question of unemployment more difficult to deal with; †
3. That they demoralise the recipients and lower their standard of living; †
4. That they are a source of positive danger to the community.

* The tariff at this institution is as follows:—

Roast beef & potatoes	3d. & 4d.	Haricot beans	... ½d. & 1d.	Macaroni	... ½d. & 1d.
" mutton "	4d.	Various vegetables	½d. & 1d.	Fruit pie	... 1d.
Boiled beef	3d. & 4d.	Basin of soup	... ½d. & 1d.	Mug of tea	... ½d.
Steak pudding	3d.	Plum pudding	... 1d.	" " coffee	... ½d.
Irish stew	2d. & 3d.	Collage	... 1d.	" " cocoa	... ½d.
Meat pie	2d. & 3d.	Rice	... ½d. & 1d.	Pot of tea (fresh made)	1d.

Plate of cold meat, bread and pickles, 3d.

† Evidence was given before a Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1846 to the effect that night asylums attracted vagrants to the Metropolis and were otherwise demoralising (see para. 27).

The question is so important that it seems desirable to quote some of the witnesses on these various points.

Crooks, 5452-3.

339. Encouragement to Vagrancy.—Mr. William Crooks, M.P., was of opinion that the cheap or free shelters were an encouragement to the vagrant, and he said that under a better system of society he would like to abolish them. Sir Shirley Murphy and Mr. Jury were of opinion that the distribution of free meals attracted many of the ordinary inmates of the common lodging-houses. Mr. Jury said :—

Jury, 5731-2.

“The inducement of the free meal in the early hours of the morning will cause them to clear from the common lodging-house about half-past twelve or one o’clock . . . they simply walk out, and go to one of the depôts at Stepney, have some food, come back to Whitechapel in time and have some more, and then they will roam aimlessly about talking to one another or sitting in doorways until they are again entitled to go into the lodging-house, being old lodgers. They will stop out two or three nights and then stop in two or three nights.”

He thought, however, that a large percentage of those who receive the free meals are not common lodging-house or homeless people, but persons who stay out in order to get the soup :—

5735-7.

“they are perhaps hobbledehos who have just got out of the control of their father and mother . . . young fellows about twenty years of age, really over-grown boys who have simply got into the bad habit of stopping out; they get in company with other young fellows of the same age and decide to go and have some soup. It is part of the inducement to stop out that they can get some supper.”

Barnett, 5914,

340. Canon Barnett, who has had many years’ experience in Whitechapel, said :—

“Vagrants accumulate there because of the temptations of the shelters and the common lodging-houses . . . we count it as one of the great difficulties of poor law work in Whitechapel. . . . I think the shelters do encourage the class of vagrants at present.”

Motion, 6467-9.

341. The Scottish witnesses we examined agreed as to the effect of shelters and free food. Mr. Motion, parish clerk and inspector of Glasgow, said that the one free shelter in that city was always full, and added :—

“I have complained about that place frequently, and I have declared more than once that it should be burned to the ground because it creates a class.”

He said that in Edinburgh the same complaints had been made as to the soup kitchens creating tramps. As to the class of men who partake of the soup he said :—

6612.

“they are just the ordinary ins and outs, the tramp class, and not working men at all.”

In Scotland there is no system of casual wards, and in certain places it is the custom for the police to give accommodation to destitute wayfarers in the police cells. Mr. Stevenson, chief constable of Glasgow, during a conference with certain members of our Committee, stated that his experience in Glasgow was that shelters and charitable institutions attracted large numbers of the vagrant class to the city who came in and “dried up the charity.” He said that, if a man found he could come to a shelter night after night, he earned just enough during the day to provide food. His view was that shelters did harm economically and were the wrong way of dealing with people of this class.

Lamb, 7444-8.

342. Mr. Lamb agreed that the provision of easy shelters and free meals made it possible for the sleeping out class of vagrants to continue their existence, though he thought that shelters and free meals must continue under existing conditions.

Mr. Peacock, chief constable of Manchester, agreed that the provision of free shelters and free food makes things easier for the loafing class; and he said that it was proved beyond a doubt that a free shelter opened in that city with accommodation for 300, where food was given, took the people out of the common lodging-houses;

"they turned hundreds away every night from there. Now it is found that when that shelter was opened the people came from the common lodging-houses—men who had previously paid for their lodging . . . I advised them to close it; it was not fair to be getting subscriptions and allowing men to come there free who had previously paid for their lodging elsewhere.

Question: Was it closed?—Yes.

Question: What was the result of that?—They went back to the lodging-houses."

343. Mr. Loch showed that the shelter system had not prevented begging or sleeping out, as, in fact, the numbers had gone up. He said "the shelters tend to attract a particular class which do not want them . . . in the case of a shelter you simply create demand." Again he said: "I wish to speak as strongly as I can against the indiscriminate shelter. The indiscriminate shelter plays into the hands of the indiscriminate soup kitchen, and the two help to create the pauper: he begins by being in trouble, being vicious or something, and they help him to live just as he is." His view was that the shelter system shows a man how to live without doing any work.

344. Police-superintendent Cole of the Holborn division, in whose district there are several charitable institutions, says with regard to free food:—

"however well intended, it is a mistake; it is so much abused. I am afraid some of the genuine working men go there and they find that they can get food cheap, and then they mix with these habitual vagrants, and so they drift into their ranks. It tends to make them become idle; there is not the slightest doubt about that."

Police-superintendent Mulvany, of the Whitechapel division, gave evidence of the large amount of free meals which were given in that district during 1904, and showed that it is easy for the loafer to live by means of the free meals and free shelter he can get.

345. Mr. Vallance said that:—

"these shelters are places to which certain classes resort as a matter of course. They can lead an idle life in the day time, pick up a few pence which is quite sufficient, and then they can get into the shelter at night. They are thereby attracted to an idle life."

He added that there are many men and women who habitually use the shelters in Whitechapel night after night. "They might use the shelters night after night for ten or twelve nights and ring the changes—go to others."

346. Attraction to the Towns.—We received strong expressions of opinion to the effect that shelters and free food distributions attract vagrants to London and other large towns. Sir Shirley Murphy urged that announcements of charity attract people to London from the country. "We never seemed to have so many of these night-walkers before the soup-giving commenced," and he thought the shelters and the distribution of soup had increased the trouble. Mr. Jury said:—

"During the winters that the soup has been given away there is not the slightest doubt we have had a very large influx from the provinces, and I think they have come here attracted by this sort of thing."

347. Mr. Peacock said it was proved beyond a doubt that the free shelters and free food caused the vagrant class to flock into Manchester. Referring to the opening of a new shelter, he says:—

"The existence of this free shelter became speedily known amongst the tramp fraternity generally, with the result that tramps flocked into the city in greater numbers than ever previously."

Mr. Motion said that the advertisement of relief for the unemployed in Glasgow "brought hundreds, indeed thousands, into the city," and Mr. Ross expressed a similar view as to the effect in Edinburgh. Mr. Simmons said that vagrants were brought into London by the Lord Mayor's fund.

The Rev. W. Carlile, of the Church Army, said as regards the distribution of free food:—

Carlile, 8056.

"To us that system is immoral; we think it is against the Bible, and likely to attract from the provinces. If men get word that there is free food, however small the amount is, it brings people up."

Lockwood, 10550. 348. Mr. Lockwood, Local Government Board Inspector for the Metropolis,
Simmons, 3457. said there was no question that the shelters act as feeding houses for the workhouses or casual wards. This seems to have been notably the case in Whitechapel, and Mr. Loch quotes the clerk to the guardians as showing that the shelters in that district had attracted large numbers of vagrants, and rendered necessary increased accommodation at the workhouse. The views of the Whitechapel guardians were expressed in the following resolution passed by them in 1895 :—

Vallance, 9701. "That apart from the injurious results to the district of large incursions of casual poor attracted from all parts of the country by advertised provision of cheap or free shelters, the moral and physical results to the poor themselves are still more disastrous. No organisation, however complete, can carry out a work of restoration and redemption in perpetually moving crowds of squalid poor, while the shelters themselves make more easy an idle vagrant life, and offer no real solution of the problem of labour and relief."

9704-15. 349. Mr. Vallance stated that he was satisfied that shelters "add to the congestion and difficulties of a very difficult district by attracting the country loafer. . . . In the absence of the shelters we should not have the same migration of these classes and the congestion of these classes in London; they would be dealt with in the districts from which they come in a much more effective way by the general operation of the ordinary Poor Law."

Buchanan, 11105. Other witnesses refer to the attraction of vagrants to towns as rendering difficult the treatment of the unemployed question. Sir Eric Buchanan thought that "free shelters for food and lodging do a great deal more harm than good, and are to a great extent responsible for the great influx of unemployed and unhelpable cases from the country districts."

350. Demoralising Effect.—The demoralising effect of the shelters on the people who frequent them is brought out in the evidence of numerous witnesses who came before us. However low a man has sunk, the shelter life keeps him from rising, and in most cases still further demoralises him. Of the frequenters of the Medland Hall shelter, Mr. Crooks said :—

Crooks, 5454. "If you and I went down there this afternoon, and walked down the whole row of men, there would be scarcely one amongst them that you would take out and give a penny an hour to. Well, what happens? The poor chaps have become degenerate; they cannot work; they have got quite past work; they can hardly beg; they go in and have a meal, good sound food, stop all night and come out in the morning. What do they do in the morning? All life is objectless; they have nothing to do; they have simply to loaf away another day without any object in life at all."

Murphy, 5669. Sir Shirley Murphy referred to the demoralising conditions of life in some of the shelters: the objection to the bunk and the fact that the inmates sleep in their clothes. Of the inmates of the Salvation Army cheap shelters he says:

5680. "It is my own belief, from what I know of the circumstances of those people that many of them would be able to pay more; indeed, I think that if a still inferior class of accommodation were provided at a lower cost, people in the existing shelters would avail themselves of it and go down to that lower standard."

5718. 351. In many cases it appears that where a cheap or free shelter has been opened the inmates of common lodging-houses in the neighbourhood have flocked there. The opening of the Salvation Army shelter at Westminster resulted in a reduction in the number of inmates in the better class lodging-houses. In fact, the cheap or free shelters are always full. Mr. Jury said :—

Jury, 5683-5. "if the Salvation Army or the Church Army or any institution chose to provide sufficient accommodation at 2d. a night, I think they would take most of the population of the lodging-houses in London. . . . My impression is that the greater number of the lodgers in London, if they had the opportunity of getting their bunk for 2d. in preference to their bed for 4d. or 6d., would take it; I feel quite certain about that."

The opening of a shelter in Manchester had a similar effect ;

"the common lodging-houses which had previously been patronised by some of the tramps as long as they had sufficient money to pay for a bed were now almost empty, and the proprietors of the common lodging-houses affected protested to the lodging-house inspector against the establishment of this free shelter. An inspection of the common lodging-houses by the police proved the statements of the proprietors that in some instances they had considerably less than their usual number of beds occupied, and an inspection of the free shelter convinced the police that a large number of applicants for the free shelter were men whom they knew to habitually stay in the common lodging-houses." Appendix XXXII.

352. Sir Shirley Murphy agreed that if enough shelters were provided the tendency would be very strong in the direction of the common lodging-houses ceasing to exist. He also agreed that a degraded style of living at night tended to lower the standard all round, and make a man a worse man during the day ; and he said :—

"I think the conditions under which a man is living have an effect upon his character, and I am sure that it is a very desirable thing that there should be a minimum standard fixed . . . they are just keeping body and soul together living in this way . . . I think that the conditions of life are lower than should be found in a civilised community." 5895, 5900.

353. Mr. Lamb said that the objection to free shelters was that under certain circumstances they might be very demoralising. Lamb, 7431-2.

Mr. Carlile agreed that it was essential that the lodging and bedding should be up to a certain standard of comfort, and that sheets should be provided for all beds. He said that sleeping in a bunk, covered with a bit of cloth in a room heated up to 60° does not improve the standard of living. Carlile, 8163.

354. Mr. Loch was of opinion that a man who habitually uses free shelters becomes hopelessly demoralised. He referred to the labour tent which the Church Army opened in Clare Market, called the "King's tent," where three hours' labour secured a meal and a bed, and said that it was found that many of the regular lodgers at the county council lodging-house at Parker Street left and went to the tent instead ; Loch, 8660.

"Many of them would have been quite able to pay for their beds. . . . The light work for three hours was an easy bargain, and he kept his money, for he had nothing to pay ; he got a day's shelter and food, and for that he had to give three hours' light work." 8649, 8786.

355. Superintendent Mulvany told us of the effect of shelters in the White-chapel district in attracting men to the idle life ; once associating with the shelter class a man would soon be dragged down to their level. He thought that many of the men who frequent shelters would not go to a casual ward if they could help it, on account of the task of work required and the bath to which they would have to submit, and that they were a worse class of vagrant than the men who use the casual wards. We have received other evidence to this effect. Mulvany, 9590-8. 9656-64. Jury, 5703. Simmons, 3369.

356. Danger to the Community. Some witnesses drew attention to the danger arising from the existence of free shelters. There is first of all the spread of vermin and disease. The unclean conditions under which the vagrant lives in the shelters are described in the evidence given by Sir Shirley Murphy and Mr. Jury :—

"if he goes into a bunk he can sleep there week in, week out, and never undress. A good many of these shelter men sell newspapers ; that is the sort of occupation they are employed in, and many much need cleansing. It is only when they fall sick and go into the infirmary that they get a proper cleansing." Jury, 5690-1.

Murphy, 5697-8.

"a man who is in a verminous condition is a nuisance to other people He may easily infect them with vermin, and that is a disgusting condition that I think the State has a right to prevent."

It should be remembered too that this class largely use the seats in public places, and one witness considered that on this account they are a source of danger to the public. Mulvany, 9599.

Peacock, 7836. 357. Mr. Peacock thought that shelters which attracted persons of the vagrant class to a town might be a public danger by reason of the number of these persons which it brought together.

Carlile, 8157. Mr. Carlile considered that free food and free shelters are a mischief to the State and to the community: "They manufacture the article that we try to cure."

Loch, 8608. Mr. Loch thought that by fostering vagrancy the shelter fosters crime, "because the vagrant is in part criminal."

Vallance, 9709. 358. Against this array of adverse evidence we have received scarcely any in favour of shelters. Mr. Vallance indeed said:—

"a shelter is a very useful provision in connection with any philanthropic effort on behalf of what has been termed the submerged tenth. A man or woman can be received temporarily, pending arrangements to get them on to their own feet. If it is part of a system of reclamation, then nothing in the world can be said against it, but if it is to be merely a cheap casual ward or a cheap lodging-house, well, then, it is not an unmixed good."

Loch, 8659. And Mr. Loch said that the only way of getting rid of the misuse of the shelter is "by having a thoroughly trained expert in charge and by causing every case to be thoroughly investigated, and an endeavour made to help the man afterwards."

Cole, 9394, 9450. Superintendent Cole defended shelters from the police point of view by saying that they keep persons from remaining in the streets, but we are almost inclined to think this would be the lesser evil, for then they could be dealt with. Mr. Lamb maintained that in the present condition of things shelters were necessary, and that under certain circumstances "their lack may be a very great hardship and a very great danger."

Lamb, 7431-3.

359. Having regard to the evidence we have received, we can come to no other conclusion than that free or cheap shelters, coupled with the indiscriminate distribution of free meals, constitute a serious evil. We are convinced that if it were possible to close most of the present shelters little harm would be done, but on the contrary with less facilities for an idle loafing life the persons who now use the shelters would, in most cases, provide for themselves, and where they could not do so they would be fit subjects for some public institution. The maintenance of shelters as at present conducted and the free distribution of food to all comers simply perpetuate the evil conditions and in no way remedy the disease. If the public could be brought to realise that these institutions do not help the deserving man, but tend rather to debase him, and that they enable the idle man to continue in his idle, aimless life, it might be possible to hope for their abandonment.

360. We think that the public distribution of free food should be subject to control by the local authority of the district. Their consent should be required to the use of any building for the purpose, and it should be open to them to withdraw their consent if at any time this seemed necessary in the interests of the community.

Regulation of Shelters.

361. Shelters are not at present subject to control by the local authority except so far as they come within the Acts relating to common lodging-houses. There is no exhaustive definition in these Acts as to what is included in the term "common lodging-houses." In 1896 the London county council caused an inquiry to be made as regards the shelters in London where lodgers were received without payment or for nominal payment, or in return for work. As a result of this inquiry, it was considered desirable that these places should be brought under control. In the case of Booth v. Ferret (25 Q.B.D. 87; 59 L.J., M.C., 136) it was held that a shelter which was intended for the reception of the poorest persons only, who slept in one common room and were charged a small sum for bed, breakfast, and supper, was not a common lodging-house within the meaning of the Acts, on the ground that it was not carried on as a business for the sake of profit, but as a humane or charitable enterprise, and that it was not open to all comers as (it is stated) is the case with a common lodging-house.

362. This decision was over-ruled in 1899 by the High Court in the case of Logsdon v. Booth (1900, 1 Q.B. 401), in which it was held that a Salvation Army shelter must be considered to be a common lodging-house, and that the fact that it was carried on for charitable objects and not for gain would not take it out of the measure of sanitary supervision provided for by the Common Lodging Houses Acts. The decision in Logsdon v. Booth was followed in the case of Logsdon v. Trotter (1900, 1 Q.B. 617), and it was decided that a lodging-house carried on by a philanthropic body was a common lodging-house within the meaning of the Acts, although the men received as inmates were of rather a better class than the "dossier" inhabitant of the ordinary common lodging-houses, and were accommodated in separate cubicles for which they paid 6d. or 8d. per night.

363. Under the decision in the case of Logsdon v. Booth, the London county council have exercised a sanitary control over the various shelters of the Salvation Army in London, and also over certain free shelters carried on by religious or philanthropic bodies. Their inspection has resulted in the abatement of overcrowding, and in improved conditions as regards the sanitary arrangements, ventilation, and the general good management of these institutions. "Multiple bunks" have been almost altogether abolished, and the council are also endeavouring to secure the substitution of proper beds for the bunks with waterproof coverings which are at present used; but, in accordance with the hope expressed by Lord Russell of Killowen, in giving judgment in that case, that the decision would not seriously interfere with the work of the shelters, and that the council would avoid anything like harshness or unreasonableness in enforcing the law, a period of grace has been allowed before the desired improvements are carried out.

364. In August last, in the case of Gilbert v. Jones (1905, 2 K.B. 691), the High Court considered the case of the Providence Row night refuge and home, a free shelter carried on by a charitable body, where no charge of any kind is made for bed or lodging, and affirmed the decision in Logsdon v. Trotter. The Lord Chief Justice, in giving judgment, said:—

"I cannot see any distinction in principle between a charitable house which is carried on for a very small payment—it may be only for the purpose of keeping some check on the people who come in, but not a payment which is to go into the pockets of the people who carry on the institution by way of letting lodgings—and a house where no payment is made."

365. In the foregoing cases proceedings had been taken by the London county council for the recovery of penalties for non-registration under the Common Lodging Houses Acts, and cases were stated by the Metropolitan police court magistrates for decision by the King's Bench Division of the High Court. But after the decision in Gilbert v. Jones, proceedings were commenced in the Chancery Division in which the question of the exemption of the Providence Row night refuge was again raised. The county council were not parties to these proceedings, and it was held by the Court of Appeal that this institution was not a common lodging-house (Parker v. Talbot—1905, 2 Ch. 643.) The decision was based on a repealed statute, the Common Lodging Houses (Ireland) Act, 1860, which extended to Ireland the provisions of the Common Lodging Houses Acts, 1851 and 1853, and provided that—

"For the purposes of the execution of the said recited Acts and of this Act in Ireland certain words and expressions used in the said Acts are hereby declared and explained to have been intended to bear the following meanings."

And among others the following definition was included:—

"The term 'Common Lodging House' shall mean a house in which persons are harboured or lodged for hire for a single night or for less than a week at a time, or any part of which is let for any term of less than a week."

In view of these provisions, the Court of Appeal held that the term "common lodging-house" in the English Acts meant "a house in which persons are harboured or lodged for hire," and the effect of this decision is that certain shelters will be exempt from the inspection, supervision and control which the county council exercise in the case of common lodging-houses. It was pointed out by Lord Russell in the case of Logsdon v. Booth that the provisions in the Common Lodging Houses Acts must be regarded as measures of sanitary protection, and he said :—

“If large numbers of the most wretched class are lodged in common sleeping rooms insanitary conditions are, in the absence of inspection, supervision and control, likely to arise, and it was the object of the law to secure that inspection, supervision and control.”

366. Members of our Committee have made several inspections, both by day and night, of shelters in which persons of the vagrant and loafer class are received, and we are convinced of the absolute necessity of some sanitary control over such institutions. If this control is necessary on sanitary grounds in the case of common lodging-houses, it is more necessary in the case of shelters where persons of an even lower class are received. We therefore recommend that measures should be taken by legislation to remove any doubt as to the existing law and to bring these institutions throughout the country under at least as strict supervision and control by local authorities as is at present exercised in the case of common lodging-houses.

367. Further, in view of the strong opinions expressed by the witnesses quoted above, we submit that charitable shelters do in fact require a more effective control than could be exercised under the existing law as to common lodging-houses. We are of opinion that in the case of these shelters a minimum standard of comfort should be required which should not be lower than that found in the cheaper common lodging-houses, and we suggest that whenever it appears to the local authority that a shelter or similar institution is causing or likely to cause real harm to the public, they should be empowered, after consultation with the police authority, to close it. We think, too, that an annual licence should be required from the sanitary authority in all cases, and that, before a shelter or similar institution is opened, the authority should be satisfied that it is necessary and is not likely to cause harm.

CHAPTER XI.

SPREAD OF DISEASE BY VAGRANTS.

368. Our attention has been drawn by several witnesses to the question of the spread of disease by vagrants, and we have been furnished by the Local Government Board with numerous extracts from the reports of medical officers of health containing references to the subject. The information before us is practically confined to smallpox, and we have accordingly limited our consideration to that particular disease.

369. Reports were issued in 1894 and 1904 by Dr. Armstrong, medical officer of health for Newcastle-on-Tyne, on "Smallpox in relation to Vagrancy." These show that in epidemic times the vagrant is one of the chief carriers of this disease. It appears from the earlier report that as regards 63 large towns in 1893 smallpox was first introduced by vagrants into 58 per cent., and was carried sooner or later by the same class of persons into 72 per cent., and on an average about five times to each, and that the disease was taken in this way to 30 workhouses and about 70 common lodging-houses. In the later report the statistics extend to 126 districts each of over 20,000 population. In 111 of those districts invaded by smallpox in 1903 the disease was in 57 instances first introduced by vagrants, and in 58 districts it was introduced by vagrants 305 times subsequently to the first outbreak. In each year the publication of Dr. Armstrong's report was followed by a conference of representatives of county councils and urban sanitary authorities of the whole country, at which a series of resolutions were passed with regard to the spread of disease by vagrants.* Dr. Armstrong attended before us and gave valuable evidence on the subject. The conference of 1904 had appointed a committee to wait upon the President of the Local Government Board and give evidence before us, but we were informed that Dr. Armstrong had represented to us the views of the conference. Preston-Thomas, 530.

370. The dissemination of smallpox by vagrants mainly occurs as a result of the comings and goings of persons of this class who are suffering from a modified form of the disease. It is, however, important to remember that persons who are not vagrants in the ordinary sense, such as navvies and other workmen travelling across the country, carry infection in the same way. Armstrong, 3182-6.

*At the conference held in 1894, the following resolutions were passed :—

2. That there should be power to the local authority to require medical examination of all persons entering common lodging-houses and casual wards, and that each inmate of a common lodging-house or casual ward should, on admission, have a bath of fresh water.

3. That the local authority should have power to order the keeper of a common lodging-house, in which there has been infectious disease, to refuse fresh admissions for such time as may be required by the authority.

4. That the local authority should be empowered to require the temporary closing of any common lodging-house in which infectious disease has occurred.

5. That the local sanitary authorities should have power to require the detention of any inmate of a common lodging-house or casual ward, who may reasonably be suspected of being liable to convey infectious disease.

6. That means should be provided for the detention and isolation of any vagrant found wandering in a public place, if reasonably suspected of being liable to convey infectious disease.

7. That the local authority should have full power to require the disinfection of the person and clothes of any person in a common lodging-house or casual ward, whether infected or exposed to infection.

8. That arrangements should be made by which the occurrence of infectious disease in common lodging-houses or casual wards should be made known by the local authority of the district to the local authorities of other districts.

9. That local authorities should be empowered to require the vaccination or re-vaccination of persons in common lodging-houses or casual wards, who are exposed to the infection of smallpox.”

The second conference was held in 1904 when resolutions generally to the effect of those above-mentioned were passed. Recommendations were also made as to matters dealt with in this Report, such as labour colonies, labour bureaux and the control of children of vagrants, and as to certain other points which are outside the scope of our Inquiry. The resolutions passed in 1904 are set out in full in the Appendix. Appendix XXXIII.

371. Opportunities for checking the spread of infection by vagrants are to be found chiefly at the common lodging-houses and casual wards where they spend the night. As we have indicated, the former receive a far greater number of vagrants than the casual wards, and Dr. Armstrong shows that smallpox was traced to them more frequently than to casual wards.

372. The casual ward system affords considerable means of protection against the spread of infection by vagrants. Thus, a man is bathed on admission and his clothes are taken away from him for the night and disinfected. The bath is of great value in providing an opportunity of detecting any outward signs of disease. In case of illness the man would be attended by the medical officer; if found to be suffering from smallpox he would be isolated, and detained until he could leave with safety to himself and others, while precautions would be taken as regards any inmates of the wards with whom he had been in contact. In epidemic times special precautions are taken. Circulars issued by the Local Government Board advocate systematic medical inspection of the inmates of the wards and the vaccination of those who are not already sufficiently protected. There is no power to enforce vaccination or even medical examination in the case of an inmate of a casual ward, but as a rule the medical officer experiences no difficulty in these matters. It will thus be seen that in ordinary times as well as in times of epidemic the present casual ward system, if efficiently carried out, is of great value in dealing with any case of disease. In many unions, however, the necessary precautions are not observed, and it is the lack of uniformity in this as in other matters that constitutes the weak point in the practice.

Appendix
XXXIII.

Murphy, 5847.

373. In a common lodging-house a vagrant is not bathed; he need not wash, and as a rule he is not subject to any medical supervision or control. Moreover, in most cases no register is kept of the inmates. But in times of epidemic smallpox medical officers of health usually take special care to watch common lodging-houses and their inmates. By energetic formal or informal action they often succeed in enforcing a variety of sanitary precautions, and in promoting vaccination of persons who have been exposed to infection. In this way much has been done in many districts successfully to prevent or to limit the spread of the disease.

Armstrong,

374. Dr. Armstrong made various suggestions to us with a view to the prevention of the spread of smallpox by vagrants. In the first place he advocated the establishment of labour colonies for the detention of vagrants; we have made recommendations on this point. His other suggestions included :—

- | | |
|-------------|--|
| 3126. | (1) medical examination of vagrants on entering casual wards ; |
| 3208. | (2) compulsory vaccination of vagrants in common lodging-houses and casual wards ; |
| 3155, 3205. | (3) general adoption of the bye-laws as to common lodging-houses ; |
| 3205. | (4) constant watching of common lodging-houses by sanitary inspectors ; |
| 3150. | (5) provision of baths in common lodging-houses, and |
| 3086, 3157. | (6) provision of separate lodging-houses for vagrants by the sanitary authority. |

375. With suggestions (3) and (4) we entirely agree. We have referred in the preceding chapter to the bye-laws which can be made by sanitary authorities for the regulation of common lodging-houses, and it will be seen that these provide valuable powers in case of disease; but, as we have observed, there are many districts in which these bye-laws have not been adopted. It appears, too, from the reports of the Medical Inspectors of the Local Government Board that even where adopted the bye-laws are often not enforced. It is evident that any system which brings sanitary inspectors into systematic and frequent relation with the common lodging-houses and their management must also afford valuable opportunity for the detection of infectious disease among their inmates and enable prompt action to be taken by the medical officer of health when emergency arises. The information before us shows that in most cases there is no systematic inspection of this kind, while in some towns the sanitary inspectors have in practice no concern with common lodging-houses. As regards suggestion (5) we agree that increased facilities for ablution should as far as possible be encouraged, but we are doubtful as to the expediency of suggestion (6).

376. Suggestions (1) and (2) raise important issues. The conferences of 1894 and 1904 went indeed further: in addition to the compulsory vaccination of vagrants in common lodging-houses and casual wards who have been exposed to infection, they suggested powers for the medical examination of all inmates of common lodging-houses or casual wards, and for the detention and isolation of any such inmate, or of any vagrant found wandering in a public place, if reasonably suspected of being liable to convey infectious disease. We do not feel able to endorse these proposals. In Germany, where the whole population is efficiently vaccinated, smallpox is practically non-existent, and it seems to us that it is to general vaccination and re-vaccination that the public should look for effectual protection against this disease, rather than to the compulsory medical examination, vaccination, and detention on suspicion of one section of the community. There would, however, no doubt be considerable advantage in the adoption of the suggestion made to us on behalf of the workhouse masters' association that there should be a periodical medical examination of inmates of casual wards. Armstrong,

Howe, 2078, 2308.

377. By a stricter enforcement of the existing law as regards common lodging-houses and casual wards, and, in times of epidemic, by more general action of a formal and informal kind such as we have referred to, much may be done by way of preventing infection. We think also that as suggested by the conferences provision might be made for securing better notification of cases of smallpox occurring in common lodging-houses and casual wards. It seems to us that reform in these directions, coupled with the adoption of the general scheme we have suggested for dealing with vagrants, should suffice to secure to the community a more effective and uniform protection than has hitherto existed against tramp-borne disease, and in particular should afford a more satisfactory safeguard against the spread of smallpox by vagrants among persons inadequately protected by vaccination.

CHAPTER XII.

SLEEPING OUT.

378. The law as to "sleeping out" is contained in section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, in which it is provided that:—

(a) Every person wandering abroad, and lodging in any barn or outhouse, or in any deserted or unoccupied buildings, or in the open air, or under a tent, or in a cart or wagon, without visible means of subsistence, and not giving a good account of himself; and

(b) every person found in, or on, a dwelling house, warehouse, coach-house, stable, or outhouse, or in enclosed premises, for any unlawful purpose, is to be deemed a "rogue and vagabond" and is punishable upon summary conviction with imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for not more than three months.

379. "Sleeping out" and begging are the typical offences of the vagrant class. "Sleeping out" is not punishable unless the offender has no visible means of subsistence, or is in enclosed premises for an unlawful purpose. If a man is found in an outhouse or other premises mentioned above, the police may take him into custody for being on the premises for some unlawful purpose; but, if satisfactory explanation is given on this point, he can only be charged with "sleeping out," and then it becomes necessary to prove that he is without visible means of subsistence. A difficulty is experienced in proving that a man has no visible means of subsistence, as some magistrates hold that if a man has only a penny in his possession he is not without means of subsistence; and we are informed that this is the reason that so few persons are charged in London with "sleeping out." Vagrants are said to provide themselves with a penny, so as to be able to sleep out without fear of being taken into custody. Mr. Fenwick thought that this matter could safely be left to the discretion of the magistrates. He admitted, however, that it was seldom that adult men were prosecuted in London for sleeping out.

380. Figures and charts printed in the Appendix give particulars as to the number of prosecutions for sleeping out during a series of years. The average annual number of persons prosecuted in England and Wales for the years 1859-1863, was 3,521. In each subsequent period of five years the average rose, and in 1899-1903 it reached 9,003. The amount of sleeping out varies greatly in different districts. It would appear that the actual number of prosecutions in a county depends not so much on its size or its population or the total number of vagrants, as on the practice of the police in the enforcement of the law. Many magistrates appear to treat the offence of "sleeping out" as a trivial one, and discharge the man on his promising to leave the district; this procedure can hardly fail to result in the police showing less activity in prosecuting. In some places, indeed, "sleeping out" appears to be indulged in with scarcely any interference on the part of the police. In London many persons sleep nightly on the seats on the Embankment, in the parks, under arches, and on the staircases of tenement houses. Superintendent Cole of the Holborn division said that according to the census taken on the night of 7th July, 1905, in his district, the vagrants consisted of 1,055 males and 176 females, who "were principally found on the Embankment, the larger number of them on the seats."

381. A census taken in certain parts of London at the instance of the county council showed that on the night of 29th January, 1904, 100 males and 68 females were found sleeping on staircases, in doorways, or under arches; while 1,463 men, 116 women, 46 boys, and 6 girls appeared to be spending the night in the streets. On the night of 17th February, 1905, another enumeration was made by the council's officers, who were assisted by officers of a few of the borough councils. As a result, 1,869 men and 312 women, 2,181 in all, were found in the streets, or on staircases, or under arches. Of these 827 men and 39 women were found in Wych Street, Strand, and 161 men and 60 women in Whitechapel Road, at both of which places food was being given away by the Salvation Army. It is remarkable that in the year 1903 only 303 persons were prosecuted for sleeping out in the whole of the county of London. The chief constable of the Manchester police also stated that the police would not apprehend men who were found sleeping on public seats, and that every night there was "sleeping out" in one of the main streets of that city. Peacock, 7754.

382. Although "sleeping out" cannot be considered in itself as a serious offence, we feel that it is desirable that it should be prevented as far as possible. In the first place, it renders a life of idle vagrancy easy; the tramp, whether in town or country, can get food without difficulty, and with the power to sleep out unmolested he is enabled to live without trouble. Secondly, the conditions under which persons "sleep out" are often such as cannot fail to be demoralising to them. We have visited, on certain occasions, districts in the east end of London where "sleeping out" is prevalent, and have satisfied ourselves of the truth of reports which we have received as to the degrading conditions under which many of the vagrant class nightly sleep. We have seen on the staircases of some tenement houses—staircases which are dark and disgustingly filthy—men, women, and children sleeping together. The police do not interfere, unless they are called in by the residents in the tenements, as the staircases are considered private property, but nevertheless do not come within the words of the statute. We think it important that power should be given to deal with cases of this kind. We are informed that many of the persons who sleep in this manner avail themselves of the free food distributions in the neighbourhood. They have sunk so low that the facilities of free food and accommodation of this kind are sufficient to encourage them to continue in their miserable mode of existence. Mulvany, 9568-73.

383. Another reason for dealing with the matter is the suggestion made by some witnesses that the sleeping out class constitute a source of actual danger to the community. Again, it must be remembered that the class who sleep out are unclean in their person and verminous, and their occupation of public seats is a means of spreading vermin and disease, a danger from which, as it seems to us, the public ought to be protected. Moreover, they are often filthy in their habits, and many complaints are made of the nuisances committed by them in public places. The man who is homeless can obtain clean accommodation and wholesome food in the casual ward, and if he refuses to use the casual ward, it seems to us that the law should be applied both to defend the community and to protect the man himself. We do not anticipate that in practice much difficulty would be experienced in providing for those who now "sleep out." The enforcement of measures against them would rapidly reduce the class, and, what in our opinion is a more important consideration, would deter others from sinking to it. Peacock, 7826. Cole, 9518-23. Vallance, 9846. Cole, 9454. Murphy, 5750. 5870, 5759. Vallance, 9727.

384. We suggest, therefore, that the law should be altered so as to make "sleeping out" an offence whenever it occurs under circumstances which may render it a nuisance or source of danger to the community, and that it should be unnecessary to prove absence of means in any such case; and that the law should be applied to persons sleeping on the staircases of tenement houses and similar places, as well as to those sleeping in barns, outhouses, and unoccupied premises.

CHAPTER XIII.

BEGGING AND INDISCRIMINATE CHARITY.

385. Indiscriminate almsgiving* is the main support of vagrancy. It is clear that the vagrant must depend largely on doles ; in most cases he does no work, and his visits to the casual wards only provide for a portion of his time. It is the ease of obtaining charity that enables him to continue in his life of vagrancy. "Beggars with a plausible tale find it easy to live without work, aided as they are by the indiscriminate charity in the day and a night's lodging at the ratepayers' expense." The evidence we received was strongly to the effect that vagrancy would cease if it were not for almsgiving. The following were some of the statements made by witnesses :—" If we could only once stop the giving, we could stop the vagrancy " : " Indiscriminate charity . . . is one of the things you will have to stop if you are going to stop vagrancy " : " The great difficulty undoubtedly is the indiscriminate alms which are given by the public " : " If we could secure the stopping of gifts on the part of the thoughtless so-called benevolent people, tramping with a child for the purpose of gain would soon die out " ; and other witnesses express views to the same effect.

386. It is important to remember that money given to a beggar is almost invariably given to an undeserving object. The evidence of Sir Eric Buchanan, who, as secretary to the London Mendicity Society, has had exceptional opportunities of studying the question, is most striking on this point : " I regret to say that " my opinion after my seventeen years' experience at the Mendicity Society is " that the London beggar is quite unhelpable. My reason for making this statement is that seventeen years ago a system of food and inquiry tickets was " introduced, by which any case could be sent to Red Lion Square for very " prompt inquiry and very prompt relief, provided the case was deserving, or " rather provided the case was helpable . . . Many cases have been sent to " Red Lion Square by the inquiry tickets during the last seventeen years, but up " to the end of June, 1905, I have never known a single case that my com- " mittee were justified in giving money to after the prompt inquiry had been " made." He added, however, that one helpable case had been found since that time. He expressed the opinion that at least £100,000 a year was given away in London to street beggars, and that a successful street beggar can collect 5s. a day, and said : " It would be no exaggeration to say that probably 90 per cent. " of persons who pity the lot of the street beggar simply give him money to " relieve their personal feelings, without troubling themselves whether the case " is helpable or unhelpable."

387. Tables and charts printed in the Appendix give particulars as to the number of prosecutions for begging in this country. It will be seen that this is the most frequent of vagrancy offences. There is abundant evidence that the vagrant commits this offence continually and is undeterred by any punishments that he may receive. Sir E. Buchanan produced to us records of certain men who had received repeated convictions for begging. His view was " once a beggar, always a beggar." The work of the London Mendicity Society has been most valuable in identifying beggars and obtaining longer sentences for them, but outside London there is practically no means of tracing previous convictions in other districts, and the beggar usually escapes with a nominal imprisonment.

388. In Tudor times attempts were made by Statute to check almsgiving, and at the present time there is a law in force in some parts of Germany and

* " But, first and foremost, the most prolific root of all this [vagrancy] stands that mean and slovenly, disloyal and pernicious vice (for such I have not hesitated to call it), variously characterised as indiscriminate almsgiving, indiscriminate, promiscuous or bastard charity, and dolegiving ; the standing temptation and main support of the mendicant and vagrant community. It is this pernicious practice that attracts the imbecile populations of foreign and home growth, and the less insane people who have an innate indisposition to work, an innate fondness for a roving and reckless life ; and it is the experience of it that supports these people and keeps them idle." (The Original. By Thomas Walker [ed. 1875]).

Switzerland which imposes a penalty on those who give alms to beggars. We do not, however, think that public opinion in this country would now support a measure of this kind, and consequently if such a law were passed there would be no chance of it having any effect. Neither do we imagine that it will be possible to convince the public of the harm that is done by indiscriminate almsgiving. "It has been said that anyone giving to a street beggar Buchanan, 11103.
"without inquiry not only demoralises the beggar by teaching him that money "can be got without working for it, but demoralises the giver by teaching that
"the pleasure of a philanthropic emotion can be obtained without the trouble
"of even writing a cheque or getting a postal order, or by spending more than
"6d., or even a penny."

But if our recommendations are carried out there will be less excuse for casual almsgiving, and we hope that when the public learn that sufficient provision has been made for the bona fide workseeker there will be less disposition to give to unknown wayfarers.

CHAPTER XIV.

VAGRANTS WANDERING TO THEIR OWN HURT.

389. There is a numerous class of vagrants who wander aimlessly from tramp ward to tramp ward to their own injury. Many of these unfortunate persons suffer from sore legs, and many are, in fact, weak-minded, but as a rule they strongly object to remaining in the workhouse, and prefer to keep to the road while they have any strength left. When such persons are apprehended for begging or sleeping out it is a common practice for the magistrate to discharge them on a promise that they will go into the workhouse, but the promise is seldom kept even if a constable is sent to escort the offender to the gates. The general opinion of the witnesses who came before us was that the workhouse was the best place for this class of vagrant, and some advocated that there should be a power of compulsory detention for an indefinite period. In extreme cases where a vagrant might be considered to be not strictly speaking compos mentis this might be a solution of the difficulty. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the purely voluntary nature of the present system of admission into and discharge from the workhouse is a cardinal principle of the Poor Law, and to give magistrates the power to order the detention of adult persons in a workhouse might have an effect on the whole system of relief altogether out of proportion to the advantages which might be derived from it. Many paupers who receive out-door relief because they refuse to enter the workhouse give rise to a similar difficulty as in the case of the old and infirm vagrants.

390. In some foreign countries the law is that no one shall be entitled to discharge himself from any institution maintained out of the public funds without the consent of the governing body, and there can be no question that such a law must remove many difficulties of administration which are felt here. But where the governing bodies of public institutions have this power the inmates are paid, by way of mark money, a small sum per day, and a part of this sum is kept in hand for their benefit. When the accumulated sum is sufficient to defray the cost of maintenance for a short time, the pauper is entitled to claim his discharge, and thus is given another chance. The question whether such a system could or ought to be adopted in this country is one which will no doubt be considered by the Royal Commission on the Poor Laws. The subject must be dealt with on general grounds, and regarded from other standpoints than that of the expediency of remedying the present method of dealing with vagrants who wander to their own hurt.

391. We are, however, of opinion that every facility should be given to vagrants of this class to go into the workhouse when they wish to do so; and that no question as to their place of settlement should be raised prior to their admission. We have heard of instances where admission to the workhouse has been refused on the ground that the person was a vagrant and did not belong to the union, and we think there should be no chance of such cases occurring. With regard to those vagrants who wander by reason of mental weakness we agree that it would be well if such cases could be detained under suitable treatment. We understand that the Royal Commission on the Feeble-Minded are giving the question careful attention, and we can only express a hope that in the result some means may be found for preventing half-witted mendicants from wandering at large, a source of difficulty to the police, a danger to themselves, and a nuisance to the public.

CHAPTER XV.

DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

392. The belief is widely prevalent that among vagrants are a considerable number of discharged soldiers. It should be observed, in the first place, that information on this subject is mostly based on the statements made by vagrants themselves who have various reasons for falsely representing themselves as old soldiers. There has always been this tendency, and after the battle of Waterloo so many beggars claimed to be old soldiers that the London Mendicity Society was started in part for the express purpose of checking them. 393. Many witnesses who have come before us have referred to the large number of army men found in casual wards. Thus, the master of the Sheffield workhouse stated that in 1902 out of 6,111 vagrants passing through the casual wards, 200 were men who had been in the Army. In 1904, 13 per cent. of the inmates of the King's Norton casual wards claimed to have been soldiers, and at the census taken by the chief constable of Northumberland last year of vagrants in that county, 15 per cent. described themselves as having been in the regular Army or in the Militia. One witness stated that in Wiltshire 10 per cent. of the tramps are supposed to have served in the Army. We understand, however, that it is very seldom that a vagrant in the casual wards has in his possession his parchment certificate of discharge. Burgess, 2518.

394. In 1897 and 1898 Parliamentary returns were obtained as to the number of Army reservists, discharged soldiers and Militiamen in casual wards in England and Wales. These returns related to the nights of 8th May, 1896, and 20th December, 1897. The results were as follows :— Appendix V.

—	Total number of inmates of casual wards.	Army Reservists, Discharged Soldiers and Militiamen.
		Men substantiating claim.	Men unable to substantiate claim.
8 May, 1896 -	8,209	444	1,540
20 Dec. 1897 -	7,494	351	1,320

From these figures it appears that only about 5 per cent. of the vagrants in casual wards on the nights in question were able to substantiate their claim to be Army reservists, discharged soldiers or Militiamen.

395. Some witnesses refer to the practice of certain Army pensioners of squandering their pension, and then relying on the casual wards or the workhouse until the next instalment is due. It has been frequently proposed, as a means of checking this practice, that pensions should be paid weekly or monthly instead of quarterly, and it seems to us that the adoption of this course would be attended with considerable advantage. Roberts, 5594.

396. The suggestion is often made that the short-service system is partly responsible for the number of army men on the road, but this is largely a matter of opinion as to which no definite evidence is to be obtained. Mr. Preston-Thomas expressed his views as follows :—“ As to the short-service system, it has very often been alleged that it has a considerable effect in increasing vagrancy. On the other hand, it has been urged, with a good deal of force, I think, that it is the man with a wandering turn of mind that enlists. If he did not enlist he would be on the roads for his three years, or his five years, or his seven years, and at any rate he is taken away from the roads for that time. I believe that this is so much gain, and that the habits of discipline that he acquires tend to keep him off rather than on the roads. The system of gratuities on discharge is often blamed. Some men are perfectly reckless; they spend in drink, however many pounds they Preston-Thomas, 594.

“get, then they go on the roads, miserable creatures, perhaps for the rest of their lives. But probably if they had not gone into the Army at all, although they would not have had this particular big drink, they would have been on the roads, they would have been living more or less on the public. I very much doubt whether the short-service system has any considerable effect in adding to the gross number of vagrants ; but that is a matter of speculation.” No doubt, in the late war, among the large number of reservists called up, were some who had taken to a vagrant life, and at the conclusion of the war it is probable that they again became vagrants ; but, on the whole, we see no sufficient reason for believing that at present there is any larger proportion of old soldiers on the roads than was formerly the case.

CHAPTER XVI.

GIPSIES, HAWKERS, PEDLARS AND HOP-PICKERS.

Gipsies.

397. We have had evidence on the subject of gipsies, and have received some representations to the effect that in certain districts they are a source of annoyance to the residents. We do not, however, consider that this class come strictly within the meaning of the term "vagrant." It is true that gipsies and dwellers in vans and tents who lead a vagrant or nomadic life are sometimes classed as vagrants, but, on the other hand, the gipsy usually exercises some handicraft or industry, and though he may be at times addicted to petty pilfering, poaching, and other like offences, he is often of a respectable character.

398. We were informed that in certain parts of Surrey and Berkshire, gipsies are a distinct nuisance, but it appears that in the latter county bye-laws made by the sanitary authorities are having a beneficial effect. In the Appendix is printed a memorandum prepared in the Home Office on the law concerning gipsies. Under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885, vans and tents used by gipsies are subject to control. Thus, if a structure of this kind is overcrowded, or in such a state as to be a nuisance and injurious to health, the local authority of the district can take proceedings for the abatement of the nuisance. Again, the local authority can make bye-laws for promoting cleanliness in and the habitable condition of such structures, for preventing the spread of infectious disease by persons inhabiting them, and generally for preventing nuisances in connection with them. Model bye-laws for the purpose have been issued by the Local Government Board, and bye-laws based on this model have been made by eighty-six urban authorities, fifty-seven rural authorities and two metropolitan borough councils. In addition to the above powers, the local authority can obtain an injunction to restrain the letting of land for the purposes of a gipsy encampment if it can be shown that such occupation is dangerous to the health of the neighbourhood. It may be mentioned that there is no provision in the English law similar to that contained in the Trespass (Scotland) Act, 1865, which makes it a criminal offence to camp out on private land without the permission of the owner or occupier.

399. As regards acts of theft, damage, intimidation, etc., which sometimes form the subject of complaint against gipsies, these, as pointed out in the Home Office memorandum, are already offences summarily punishable under the existing law. They may be harder to detect and punish in the case of a vagrant population, but there is no reason to suppose that they cannot be met by a vigorous enforcement of the law. On the whole, it seems to us that the existing powers are reasonably adequate for the purpose of controlling this class.

Hawkers and Pedlars.

400. Similar observations would apply to hawkers and pedlars. So long as they are acting under proper licence it does not appear that objection need be raised to them. The hawker, who travels with a horse and cart, has a £2 Inland Revenue licence, and the pedlar, or petty chapman, has to obtain from the police a certificate, for which he pays 5s. No doubt in some cases the pedlar's certificate offers facilities for begging and for small thefts, but we have little information on the point. It has been suggested that the pedlar's certificate is often given without due inquiry into the man's character and antecedents, and that it is renewed too easily. The certificate requires annual renewal and can be renewed by the police in any district. It is available all over the country. It does not appear that the practice as to the issue or renewal of certificates or the endorsement on them of convictions is uniform. We think that in all cases of conviction for offences affecting the man's honesty the certificate should be endorsed to that effect. It might be desirable that steps should be taken by the Home Office to secure this, and also to secure greater care in the issue and renewal of the certificates.

Hop-pickers and Fruit-pickers.

401. At certain times of the year casual wards in Kent, Herefordshire, and other parts of England are invaded by great numbers of fruit and hop-pickers who come from London and other large towns to gather the crops. To a certain extent this class consists of ordinary vagrants to whom occupation of this nature affords a pleasant change, but so far as they are engaged in the work they cannot be classed as vagrants, and moreover many of those employed are genuine workmen from the towns. They may make use of the casual wards on the way to their work or while waiting until the actual gathering of the crops begins ; but when in work they are housed by their employers in huts, booths, or tents. When making their way by road these fruit and hop-pickers are often a considerable nuisance to the inhabitants of the districts through which they pass, and in the casual wards they cause much inconvenience on account of their large numbers. Temporary arrangements can, however, usually be made for their reception, and when some uniform system of dealing with them is adopted it is generally found that the numbers resorting to the casual wards fall off.

Meats, 997.

Appendix XXXV.

402. Of recent years there has been a great improvement in this class, and it is becoming increasingly the custom for the employers to hire their labourers in the large towns beforehand and arrange for them to come by train when the crop is actually ready. The condition of the huts in which the workers are lodged has also greatly improved owing to the action of the local sanitary authorities and the efforts of philanthropic societies. In many districts bye-laws have been made by the local authorities for "securing the decent lodging and accommodation" of persons engaged in hop-picking or fruit-picking, and these have had a beneficial effect. Where action is taken on these lines it seems to us that the existing law is sufficient, and we have no recommendation to make for amending it in respect of this class.

CHAPTER XVII.

WOMEN.

403. At present separate accommodation, under the charge of female officers, is provided for women in the casual wards. The rules as to their detention are the same as in the case of men, and their diet is also the same, though less in quantity. The task of work which is prescribed for them by the regulations is picking oakum (half the quantity given to the men) or domestic work, such as washing, scrubbing, cleaning, or needlework. Oakum picking as a task of work for females, however, has been discouraged for some time by the Local Government Board, but it is still in force in many unions.

The number of female vagrants is comparatively small. Out of 9,768 vagrants relieved in casual wards in England and Wales on the night of 1st January, 1905, only 887, or 9 per cent., were women. On the 1st July, 1905, there were 813 female casual paupers out of a total of 8,556.

404. We have proposed that casual wards should be continued for the reception of male wayfarers, but we are strongly of opinion that women should be provided for elsewhere. Mrs. Higgs said :—

“I should propose that single women should be received into the workhouse proper. I Higgs, 1505. would do away with the casual ward for women. The reason of that would be three-fold. First of all, the woman, if she were admitted into the workhouse proper, would receive the workhouse clothes; therefore, she would not work in her own, and her own would not be destroyed. She would go out in as good a state of cleanliness as before. Besides that, I think it is altogether wrong to recognise a class of vagrant women at all. I think it is a great evil to recognise that a woman has the right to go about from place to place in that unattached kind of way. I think she should be received at the workhouse proper. . . . I think it is a great mistake for our country to educate any women into vagrancy.”

And as regards women who are tramping with their husbands, she said :—

“I think that women ought not to be allowed to travel about like that. I think it would be better if they were taken into the workhouse, and the husbands were made to pay for them. I think they could go out with their husbands, if there was a reasonable 1532. presumption that the husband was a working man travelling about for work, after the ordinary detention.”

405. We entirely approve of this suggestion. At present the treatment that female casuals receive is often unsatisfactory, and the complaints that Mrs. Higgs made of her experience in certain wards cannot be disregarded. But apart from this, we think it undesirable to encourage the female tramp. No similar provision is made for this class in other countries; and we feel that great advantage would ensue from the closing of the casual wards to women in this country. We gather from experienced officers that only a small percentage of the female tramps are with their husbands; temporary alliances seem rather to be the rule of the road. No doubt there may be exceptional cases, where a woman may have satisfactory reasons for tramping, but in any such case, if she is a decent person, she could hardly fail to prefer the accommodation of the workhouse to that of the casual ward. To a woman who 1539. is an habitual vagrant the workhouse would probably be a deterrent.

408. The removal of women from the casual wards will be of material assistance in connection with our proposals for placing the control of the wards in the hands of the police. It will greatly simplify the provision of the necessary casual wards, and there will be no need, as now, for a female staff. We think, however, that in the case of some of the larger casual wards now existing, where ample provision both in accommodation and staff has been made for the reception of female vagrants, it may be desirable, for some time after the transfer of the wards to the police authority, to continue to receive females in them. We do not contemplate that any such arrangement as this should be other than temporary, and we trust that it will be found practicable eventually to establish a uniform system throughout the country.

409. Apart from the reception of women into the workhouse, we do not propose that their treatment should differ materially from that proposed for men. The female habitual vagrant should, we think, be liable to be sent to a labour colony, which, of course, should be one appropriated to women only. We do not anticipate that there will be many cases which will need to be sent to a labour colony, and probably one or two institutions for the whole country would be sufficient. It seems to us that there would be special advantage in these being provided—at any rate, in the first instance—by private enterprise, and it is possible that there are institutions at present in existence which might properly be certified for this purpose. They should be subject, in so far as they are used for the compulsory detention of vagrant women, to the inspection and control of the Home Office.

410. We are inclined to accept the view that the question of female vagrants is comparatively unimportant and that if the men are removed, the women and children will soon disappear from the roads. Without the men, the women will find it easy to maintain themselves, and their case will present little difficulty.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CHILDREN.

411. One of the most important questions included within the reference to us is that of vagrant children. This question has largely occupied public attention during recent years, and many charitable societies and individuals are striving to improve the condition of these children. We do not consider that the mere fact of a parent being on tramp with his child is a sufficient reason for taking the child out of his control, and we have received evidence that in many cases the children of tramps are healthy, well-cared for and apparently happy. But we are fully aware of the harmful results to children of a life of habitual vagrancy, and we agree that as far as possible action should be taken to rescue them from such a life.

412. At the outset, however, it is right to say that the number of vagrant children has been greatly exaggerated; the mistaken idea on this point has no doubt arisen from the fact of the same children being counted over and over again. We are inclined to accept the estimate given by Mr. Parr, the director of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, that these children form but 3 per cent. of the total number of vagrants. The low proportion of children is confirmed by the figures published by the Local Government Board; thus, out of 9,768 vagrants relieved in casual wards in England and Wales on 1st January, 1905, only 188, or about 2 per cent., were children. The police census of the 7th July, 1905, showed that about $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the persons without a settled home or visible means of subsistence were children. There is evidence that there are fewer vagrant children now than formerly.

413. The principal statutes under which, at the present time, action can be taken in the interest of this class are as follows:—

- (a) Poor Law Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict., ch. 37).
- (b) Industrial Schools Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict., ch. 118).
- (c) Elementary Education Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict., ch. 79).
- (b) Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904 (4 Edw. VII., ch. 15).

414. Poor Law Act, 1899.—Under this Act, where a child is maintained by a board of guardians and its parents have either deserted it or are dead, or for reasons specified in the Act are unfit to have control of it, the guardians are empowered to assume all the rights and powers of the parent over the child.* So far as we are aware this power is but rarely exercised in regard to the children of tramps. If the guardians take action the child must be maintained by them, but as a rule they are not willing to throw upon the rates of their union the burden of the maintenance and education of children who are not settled there, nor to go to the trouble and expense which would be involved in an attempt to

“Where a child is maintained by the guardians of a poor law union, and

- (i.) the child has been deserted by its parent; or
- (ii.) the guardians are of opinion that by reason of mental deficiency, or of vicious habits or mode of life, a parent of the child is unfit to have control of it; or
- (iii.) a parent is unable to perform his or her parental duties by reason of being under sentence of penal servitude or of being detained under the Inebriates Act, 1898; or
- (iv.) a parent of the child has been sentenced to imprisonment in respect of any offence against any of his or her children; or
- (v.) a parent of the child is permanently bedridden or disabled, and is the inmate of a workhouse, and consents to the resolution hereinafter mentioned; or
- (vi.) both the parents, or in the case of an illegitimate child, the mother of the child, are or is dead;

the guardians may at any time resolve that until the child reaches the age of eighteen years all the rights and powers of such parent as aforesaid, or if both parents are dead, of the parents, in respect of the child shall, subject as in this Act mentioned, vest in the guardians, and thereupon those rights and powers shall so vest accordingly and shall continue so vested whether the child does or does not continue to be maintained by the guardians. Provided that the guardians may rescind the resolution if they think that it will be for the benefit of the child that it should be rescinded, or may permit the child to be, either permanently or temporarily, under the control of the parent, or of any other relative, or of any friend, or of any society or institution for the care of children.”

Parr, 10985-8. ascertain their place of settlement. The law of settlement is thus an obstacle to action by the guardians.

11010. 415. It is much to be desired that boards of guardians should exercise their powers under the Act referred to. They could then deal with the children by emigrating them, or placing them in homes or institutions suitable to their case. It is, however, hardly reasonable to expect boards of guardians to assume in all cases the cost of the maintenance of children not belonging to their union, and it might be desirable that power should be given to the county council to make a contribution from the county rate towards the cost of the maintenance of a vagrant child who may be adopted by a board of guardians; this would be an alternative to dealing with the case under the Industrial Schools Act. But we are not prepared to suggest that the charge should be thrown on the county in every case where the guardians adopt a vagrant child.

Appendix
XXXVI.

416. Industrial Schools Act, 1866.—Under section 14 of this Act, any person may bring before a petty sessional court any child, apparently under the age of fourteen years, “that is found wandering and not having any home or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence.” In such a case, the court, if satisfied that the child comes within the section and that it is expedient to deal with it under the Act, may order it to be sent to a certified industrial school. Doubt has arisen as to the meaning of the expression “not having proper guardianship” in this section, some magistrates apparently interpreting the section as only referring to a child under no guardianship, and others as if it referred to a child having an “improper” guardian. In 1869 the Home Office gave its opinion on the meaning of the section as follows:—

“The point left to the judgment of the magistrates in the sub-section of the 14th clause is not whether the child is or is not under any guardianship, but whether it is under proper guardianship. If the child’s parents are habitual drunkards, or of known vicious or criminal character, or tramps, or if they continually ill-use or neglect the child, and are thus the cause of its wandering and destitution, and are leaving it to grow up in the habits of vice and beggary, they cannot be said to be proper guardians to it, and it would be in full accordance with the intention and object of the Act, and for the advantage of the public, that the child should be withdrawn from their control and placed under the corrective training of an industrial school, the parents being ordered to contribute, in proportion to their means, towards the expenses of its maintenance.”

In a recent letter the Home Secretary expressed a general agreement with the above opinion, but added as follows:—

“He must not, however, be understood to hold that tramps are of necessity, by the mere fact of their being for the time without a home or settled place of abode, improper guardians of their children. The question of proper guardianship as well as the other questions involved in committing a child to an industrial school under the provisions of section 14 are matters to be decided by the magistrates in each case in the exercise of their discretion upon the particular facts placed before them and upon their available knowledge of the parent’s character.”

Simpson, 1170.

417. The late Sir John Bridge, chief magistrate at Bow Street police court, stated in his evidence before the Departmental Committee on Reformatory and Industrial Schools, 1895, that the law covered the case of a professional beggar who had his children with him on the road, and that it could take these children away from him and send them to an industrial school. This opinion was also held by the Liverpool stipendiary, Mr. W. J. Stewart. Professor Dove Wilson, professor of law at the Aberdeen University, said in a memorandum prepared for the Scottish Departmental Committee on Habitual Offenders, 1894:—

“I have heard it suggested that if the wandering child had any kind of parents it could not be said to be without ‘proper guardianship,’ but I do not think it can be so interpreted, and I have always held that, if the parents were drunken or ill-treated their children, those children if found wandering through the country, whether with or without the parents, came under the Act.”

418. But it is not clear that these opinions entirely cover the point. All tramps are not drunken people, and there are many who cannot be said to ill-treat or neglect their children in a criminal sense, however bad it may be for the children to be habitually tramped about. We have reason to believe that the opinion that the provision quoted does not apply to vagrant children is very prevalent among magistrates and others, and we think therefore that it is desirable either that the section should be amended so as to make it perfectly clear that it includes children of professional or habitual vagrants, or that magistrates should be generally informed of the view of the section taken by the Secretary of State. Simpson, 1173.

Legge, 4599.

419. We understand there is another difficulty in putting the Act in force for the protection of these children, and that is that some magistrates are loth to send children, against whom nothing but vagrancy is alleged, to schools which they think partake of a penal character. We do not think there is ground for this objection. We have been informed by Mr. Legge, the Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools, of the excellent results to children of this class from training in an industrial school. Statements which he handed in to us in proof of this are given in the Appendix. Other witnesses testified to the same effect, and from these, and the knowledge we have obtained ourselves from other sources, we feel strongly that so far as possible use should be made of industrial schools for dealing with vagrant children, who from their previous surroundings need training of a correctional nature. 4588-9.
4542-6.
Appendix
XXXVI.
Crooks, 5377-84.

420. It does not seem to us that any difficulty need arise as regards the maintenance of children, ordered to be sent to an industrial school. Unless a child is sent on the application of the parent or guardian, a contribution towards the cost is usually made by the council of the county or county borough and a fixed payment is made by the Treasury. If the parent or other person liable to maintain the child is of sufficient ability, he can be required to contribute towards the maintenance a sum not exceeding 5s. per week.

421. The Elementary Education Act, 1876.—Another provision under which vagrant children may be dealt with is section 13 of the Elementary Education Act, 1876. That section provides that:—

“Where the local authority are informed by any person of any child in their jurisdiction who is stated by that person to be liable to be ordered by a court under this Act to attend school, or to be sent under this Act, or the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, to an industrial school, it shall be the duty of the local authority to take proceedings under this Act or the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, accordingly, unless the local authority think it is inexpedient to take such proceedings.”

Difficulty here has arisen from the proviso, which leaves it in the discretion of the local education authority to take proceedings or not, as they may think proper. It is doubtful whether the section has been used to any extent in the case of vagrant children on account of the objection to putting the cost on a small area, but it will be seen that if it were acted on it would afford ample means for securing control of all children passing through a district who are not receiving proper education. Parr, 10982-8.
Barneby, 4205.

422. Mr. Parr has suggested that this provision should be made compulsory. We are not altogether satisfied of the necessity of this step, having regard in particular to the change in the law effected by the Education Act, 1902. The circular issued by the Home Office on the 30th December, 1903, which is printed in the Appendix, sets out in full the powers of the new education authorities as successors to the school boards with regard to industrial schools, and explains how those powers can be used for enforcing school attendance in the case of children on tramp with their parents. It seems to us that the transfer of responsibility in this matter from school boards and school attendance committees to bodies acting over a much wider area is likely to result in a more vigorous administration of the law as regards the children of habitual vagrants. Parr, 10987-8. suffering or injury to its health is guilty of a misdemeanour and liable on conviction to fine or imprisonment.*

424. Mr. Parr has described to us the valuable work done by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children under this Act. It appears, however, that they experience considerable difficulty in applying it to vagrant children, as it is necessary to prove an overt act of cruelty or something likely to cause the child unnecessary suffering, before the person having charge of it can be deprived of the custody. Mr. Parr said—"If the child had manifestly no sign "of ill-treatment or neglect, and was well-nourished, and clean and decently "clothed, we should have no opportunity of doing anything at the moment." And he added that the Society did not interfere unless they had good reason to believe that the child was actually suffering or ill-treated. Out of 105,926 children who were the subject of inquiries by the Society during 1904, only 375 were cases of children exposed for begging purposes, and only 6 of these were sufficiently grave to warrant prosecution.

425. It appeared from Mr. Parr's evidence that in certain cases the Society are met with the difficulty that they are not able to assume control of a child in respect of whom they have obtained a conviction under the Act of 1904 unless they undertake the cost of maintenance. The fact tends to cripple the Society in their good work ; and we think that in any case where the court decides that the child ought to be sent to an industrial school the cost of its maintenance there should be borne in the usual manner. But where the Society obtain custody of a child under the Act of 1904, it seems not unfair that they should be required to maintain it.

Howe, 2067.

426. We have heard from witnesses of the useful work done by the officers of the Society in co-operation with the workhouse officers ; the system generally adopted being that the latter give notice to the nearest officer of the Society when children are leaving the casual wards, and he is thus able to watch their progress and take action if there is any ill-treatment or cruelty. This action seems to have resulted in a diminution of the amount of child vagrancy. Mr. Parr described to us a scheme proposed by the Society for the registration of tramps and their children, which, in our opinion, will be of great advantage in facilitating the identification of vagrants and the operations of the Society.

427. Recent legislative proposals.—In consequence of the difficulty of taking action as regards vagrant children, and also because there was no provision for the punishment of the persons responsible for children being habitually tramped about, a Bill was introduced into Parliament in 1889 for the "further Protection of the Children of Vagrants." This Bill, which was re-introduced into the House of Commons in the following years and again in an amended form in 1904,† made it an offence for any person over the age of sixteen years to be found wandering in any street, road or public place with any child under fourteen years of age in his custody, charge or care, and without visible means of subsistence, if there is reason to believe that he has no home or settled place of abode, or is leading a vagrant life, and that such a child, if of school age, is not attending school. If convicted of the offence, he is subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, and the child can be dealt with under the Poor Law Act of 1899,

* Section 1 (1) of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, is as follows :—

"If any person over the age of sixteen years who has the custody, charge, or care of any child under the age of sixteen years, wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes such child, or causes or procures such child to be assaulted, ill-treated, neglected, abandoned, or exposed in a manner likely to cause such child unnecessary suffering, or injury to its health (including injury to or loss of sight, or hearing, or limb, or organ of the body, and any mental derangement), that person shall be guilty of a misdemeanor ; and

"(a) on conviction on indictment shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds, or alternatively, or in default of payment of such fine, or in addition thereto, to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years ; and

"(b) on summary conviction shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to a fine not exceeding twenty-five pounds, or alternatively, or in default of payment of such fine, or, in addition thereto, to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding six months."

This provision is the same as that contained in the Act of 1894, which was repealed by this Act.

or be sent to an industrial school, or committed to the custody of some relative or other fit person. If the guardians take charge of the child, and its settlement cannot be ascertained, it is to become a charge on the county up to six shillings a week. A similar Bill was introduced in the House of Commons in 1903 under the auspices of the State Children Association.* Both Bills made it an offence to keep these children outside the Education Act. The objection has been raised to these Bills that they proposed to create a new offence by punishing the person who is roaming about with a child, irrespective of there being an act of cruelty. We are inclined to agree with Mr. Fenwick and other witnesses that the mere fact of being on tramp with a child should not be considered an offence, and the provisions to which we have referred in this chapter seem to us to afford sufficient powers in this matter.

428. The proposals we make with regard to habitual vagrants will, we think, be of material assistance, and our view is that where the parent or guardian of a child is dealt with as an habitual vagrant there should be power to the court to order the child to be sent to an industrial school or to be dealt with in such other way as may seem expedient. As mentioned in the previous chapter, we suggest that women and children should be received into the workhouse instead of the casual wards, and we believe that this course will afford a further means of rescuing children from a life of vagrancy.

CHAPTER XIX.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS.

429. The following is a summary of the principal recommendations made by us.*

Casual Wards.

1. Wards to be placed under control of police authority (120-147).
2. Existing buildings, where required, to be rented or purchased by police authority (132-3).
3. Superfluous wards to be discontinued (130; 133).
4. Where practicable, existing officers of wards to be continued in office (135).
5. Where wards adjoin or form part of the workhouse, arrangements to be made with the guardians for supply of stores, heating, etc. (134).
6. Diet to be adequate, and provision to be made for mid-day meal on day of discharge (95, 181, 308-10).
7. Task of work to be enforced, and to be a time task (93, 148-9):
8. Detention to be for a minimum of two nights, except in case of men with way-tickets (151-2, 180).
9. Expenses of wards to be charged to the police fund (129, 136, 142).

Assistance to Work-seekers.

10. Tickets to be issued by the police to persons who are bona fide in search of work (178).
11. The ticket to be for a definite route, and available only for a month, with power to police to alter route if satisfied that this is necessary (179, 182).
12. The holder of a ticket to be entitled to lodging, supper and breakfast at the casual ward, and to be able to leave as early as he desires after performing a small task (179-80).
13. The holder of a ticket to have a ration of bread and cheese for mid-day meal given him on leaving the casual ward in the morning (181).
14. Information as to work in the district to be kept at casual wards and police stations for assistance of workseekers (184-5).

Vagrancy Offences.

15. Short sentences to be discouraged. Where the sentence is for less than fourteen days, it should be limited to one day, and the conviction recorded (196, 224).
16. Habitual vagrants to be sent to certified labour colonies for detention for not less than six months or more than three years (221-3, 286).

Labour Colonies for Habitual Vagrants.

17. Labour colonies for habitual vagrants to be certified by Secretary of State and generally to be subject to regulations made by him (284-5, 304).

* The numbers of the paragraphs in the Report referring to the particular recommendations are given in brackets.

18. Councils of counties and county boroughs to have power to establish labour colonies, or to contribute to certified colonies established by other councils or by philanthropic agencies (284-5, 287-8).

19. Exchequer contribution to be made towards cost of maintenance of persons sent to labour colonies (287-8).

20. Subsistence dietary to be prescribed. Inmates to have power to earn small sums of money by their work, and, by means of canteen, to supplement their food allowance (290, 312-5).

21. Discharge before the conclusion of sentence to be allowed on certain conditions (286):

22. Industrial as well as agricultural work to be carried on (299-302).

Economy in Buildings.

23. Buildings for casual wards and in connection with labour colonies to be erected cheaply (291-2, 317-23).

Common Lodging-Houses (outside London).

24. Common lodging-houses to be licensed annually by local authority (326-7).

25. Stricter supervision and control to be exercised by local authority (326-7).

26. Police to have right of entry (327).

Regulation of Shelters and Free Food Distributions.

27. Shelters to be licensed and regulated by local authority (366-7).

28. Free food distribution to be subject to veto of local authority (360).

Spread of disease by Vagrants.

29. Necessity of stricter enforcement of existing law (375, 377).

30. Notice to be given to neighbouring districts of smallpox occurring in common lodging-houses or casual wards (377).

Sleeping out.

31. Sleeping out to be an offence whenever it takes place in buildings or on enclosed premises, or is a danger or nuisance to the public (384).

Pedlars.

32. Practice as to issue, renewal and endorsement of certificate to be uniform (400).

Women.

33. Female vagrants to be received into the workhouse instead of the casual wards (405-8).

Children.

34. Children of persons dealt with as habitual vagrants to be sent to industrial schools or other place of safety (428).

35. Child vagrants to be received into the workhouse instead of the casual wards (406, 428).

36. Section 14 of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, to apply to vagrant children (418).

Conclusion.

430. It will have been seen from Chapter I. that previously to the 19th century Parliament attempted to repress vagrancy in this country by the enactment of a long series of measures of varying severity. It is doubtful to what extent they were enforced, but the result showed that isolated acts of punishment, however severe, did not prevent what was then, as now, a mode of life.

431. In the last century milder counsels prevailed, and a twofold method of dealing with vagrancy was instituted. On the one hand certain acts characteristic of the vagrant were defined as offences, and cumulative punishments were prescribed ; on the other hand the status of the vagrant was definitely recognised, and food and shelter were provided at public expense to assist him on his wanderings, though it was sought to prevent a too free resort to this assistance by surrounding the gift with irksome conditions. Any chance of success under this system lay in a consistent administration of the law throughout the country. But from the very start of the system—under which the vagrant ceased to be regarded simply as a criminal to be repressed, and became partly chargeable to the poor law authorities—his treatment has followed no general principles, but has been practically left to the whims and wishes of the local administrators. The Orders of the Central Authority which were issued to secure uniformity of treatment have wholly failed to do so ; and a similar absence of consistency in the enforcement of the law has characterised the action of the police and the magistrates. Between the Poor Law and the police the vagrant has flourished. It has been well said that the police authorities treat the vagrant as a criminal but do not punish him, while the Poor Law authorities treat him as a pauper but do not relieve him.

432. It is true that on the Poor Law side attempts have been made from time to time to discourage the vagrant ; Acts have been passed, new methods have been introduced and the Central Authority have issued numerous circulars with a view to rendering the grant of casual relief more deterrent. Statistics show that, as a rule, these changes have been followed by a temporary reduction in the numbers resorting to the casual wards. Whether any actual diminution in the total number of vagrants was caused does not appear, but it is certain that each change soon lost its repressive effect on the vagrant, and the casual ward figures quickly rose to the previous level.

433. But apart from the difficulty of securing uniformity, the great objection to the present system is that it makes no attempt to reform the vagrant ; he is encouraged to continue in his useless life by the casual wards established for his reception, while the short terms of imprisonment to which he is sentenced for acts of vagrancy have no effect in teaching him to amend his life.

434. The whole history of vagrancy in this and every other country indicates that the vagrant cannot be suppressed, but must be specially treated for his mode of life and his disinclination to do honest work. To apply this treatment it is essential that the habitual vagrant should be detained under reformatory influences for long periods. Under such influences it may be possible to instil into him habits of work ; but even if this should not be achieved by prolonged detention such as we recommend, there are other reasons which render his segregation necessary. To protect the public from the trouble and the nuisance which he causes, to prevent children being trained in his habits, and to deter others from adopting this life seem to us objects which amply justify the course proposed.

435. Our recommendations constitute a complete scheme of which the main feature is the establishment of labour colonies. We have considered that the casual wards cannot be dispensed with at present, but we suggest that the Poor Law authorities should be relieved of the care of the vagrant—a matter indeed which is outside, and interferes with, their proper functions. The natural authority for controlling the vagrant is the police, and under them we hope that a uniform system will be established throughout the country. For the bona fide work-seeker we have suggested means which should enable him to receive preferential treatment and real assistance when he takes to the road.

436. Lastly we would again draw attention to what, in our opinion, is the real cause of vagrancy, but which, unfortunately, is beyond the power of legislative or administrative action. Were it not for the indiscriminate dole-giving which prevails there would be little necessity for casual wards or labour colonies for the vagrant, and idle vagrancy, ceasing to be a profitable profession, would come to an end.

437. We wish, in conclusion, to record our deep sense of obligation to our Secretary, Mr. F. L. Turner. An immense amount of labour has fallen on him in the conduct of the Inquiry and in the preparation of the Report and Appendix. The Inquiry has been one of exceptional difficulty, and his knowledge of the various branches of the subject, and his general ability and business capacity have been of the greatest value to us throughout.

MEMORANDUM BY CAPTAIN EARDLEY-WILMOT.

1. Although I agree with every recommendation of the Committee, I regret that I cannot sign the Report without reservation on one point.

2. In the section dealing with the vagrant in prison (pages 54 to 58), stress is laid on statements of opinion made by certain witnesses, to the effect that recent improvements in prison dietaries, together with the abolition of the treadmill and crank in local prisons, are to some extent responsible for the increase in prosecutions for workhouse offences and the offences of begging and sleeping out which is noticeable since the year 1900. Statistics printed in the Appendix are quoted in support of this inference.

3. In the case of offences against the person and against property (i.e., ordinary crime) the number of prosecutions in succeeding years can fairly be taken to show fluctuations in the number of such crimes. In the case of vagrancy offences, however, it is notorious that the number of prosecutions depends almost entirely on the instructions given to the police and to the masters of workhouses in the various localities. This alone, in my opinion, nullifies the value of these statistics as a gauge of the increase or decrease of the number of offences with which they deal. But, apart from this, the point of these statistics rests on the extraordinary rise in prosecutions for vagrancy offences in 1901 and succeeding years. As, however, the alteration in the prison dietaries took place so far back as April, 1899, and treadwheels and cranks were done away with in only nine prisons before 1901, I cannot see how the increase in these prosecutions in that year can be attributed to the changes in prison diet or labour.

4. Supposing, however, for the sake of argument, that the opinions of these witnesses were well-founded, and an attempt were made to give them practical effect, one of two courses would have to be adopted: either the devising of a special treatment for vagrancy offenders, more severe than that of the casual ward; or, our penal system, which has been built up by experts on the experience of many years, would have to be re-cast. In the first case we should be treating a man convicted of begging or sleeping out with greater severity than, for instance, a thief or wife beater, and, in the second case, in order to satisfy what are suggested as the penal requirements of a comparatively small and unimportant section of the prison population—and that the least criminal in the strict sense—we should be reverting to the old system of treatment by cranks and treadwheels, and penal diets. This has been condemned by public opinion; and having been eliminated from prison Rules under Parliamentary sanction, a system would have to be re-established which has been deliberately and quite recently abolished. Such an expectation appears to me to be futile.

5. But we have no such dilemma to meet. Had an element of luxury, or even of comfort, been introduced into prisons for the benefit of short-sentence prisoners, the contention of these witnesses might be arguable, but such is far from being the case. I cannot accept the proposition that separate confinement in a prison cell on a dietary composed of brown bread and gruel for breakfast and supper, and brown bread together with either porridge, suet-pudding or potatoes, for dinner, even if there were no task of work to be done, can be so attractive as to increase the number of those hopeless ne'er-do-wells who spend their time between the workhouse, the casual ward and the gaol. When a man has reached such a state of degradation that it is a matter of indifference to him whether he is in prison or not, the conditions of his imprisonment are of small account.

6. The knowledge of men of this class which I have gained in my experience as governor of both convict and local prisons, and more recently as an Inspector, has convinced me that no alteration in treatment, within the limits that would be allowed in this country, could affect their number. Causes for increase must be looked for in the social and economic conditions of the period under discussion. I may add that this is the opinion of every thoughtful and experienced prison official with whom I have discussed the question.

C. EARDLEY-WILMOT.

MEMORANDUM BY MR. SIMPSON.

1. I much regret that I am unable to agree with the other members of the Committee in their proposals regarding London. Throughout the Metropolitan Police district the Secretary of State is the statutory police authority, as the standing joint committee is in other counties, and as the watch committee is in boroughs; the Metropolitan Police is managed as a department of Government, and I cannot think it would be right to cast on them a duty which has always hitherto devolved on local authorities, and which will in future, according to our proposals, devolve on local authorities everywhere else.

2. I can see no sufficient reason why the standing joint committees of Surrey, Kent, Essex, and Hertfordshire should not take over all the casual wards in their respective counties including those that lie within the Metropolitan Police district. In London and Middlesex the case is somewhat different, but on the whole the most convenient course seems to me to give the standing joint committees for those two counties the same functions as we recommend for standing joint committees elsewhere. It is true they will not have a police force under their control to utilise for this purpose, but I do not agree with my colleagues in considering that the control of the police is the main argument for transferring the casual wards to standing joint committees.

3. Indeed, it does not seem to me that the employment of police officers to inspect the casual wards is a really essential part of our scheme; in country districts it will no doubt be convenient to use the police rather than appoint a new staff for this purpose, but in towns the conditions are different. So far as municipal boroughs are concerned, it may not always be of advantage to employ police officers on such a service, while in London it seems to me that there would really be no reason to do so.

4. The strongest argument for the transfer of casual wards to standing joint committees is in my opinion that these committees act for a much wider area than the boards of guardians, and though the control of the police will undoubtedly give them great advantages in carrying out the policy we have recommended for adoption, there are other reasons apart from this which would justify the transfer of the London and Middlesex casual wards to the standing joint committees on exactly the same terms as we propose in other counties. In London, moreover, the staff employed in the inspection of common lodging-houses and shelters could be conveniently employed also for the inspection of the casual wards. It would indeed be of special advantage that the resorts of the vagrant class which are maintained from public funds should in London be under the supervision of the same staff of inspectors as those which are managed by charitable agencies or private enterprise, and I submit that the standing joint committee for London would, on the whole, be in no worse position than any other standing joint committee for discharging the functions assigned to them; or that at all events they would be in a better position to do so than either the Secretary of State or the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police. I would further venture to suggest that the staff at present appointed by the Local Government Board to visit the casual wards in London might also report to the standing joint committee quarterly, or at such other times as may be convenient; and that if the standing joint committees should find it convenient in the discharge of their duties in connection with casual wards to employ police constables, there would be no difficulty in obtaining the services of members of the Metropolitan Police force on the same terms as they are given for other work outside the regular police duty.

VAGRANCY COMMITTEE.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE THE

DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

APPOINTED BY

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD

TO INQUIRE INTO THE SUBJECT OF VAGRANCY.

FIRST DAY.

Tuesday, 25th October, 1904.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair.)

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.
Captain SHOWERS.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.
Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary).

Mr. H. PRESTON-THOMAS, General Inspector of the Local Government Board, called; and Examined.

1. (Chairman.) Mr. Preston-Thomas, you are, I believe, at present one of the Inspectors of the Local Government Board?—I am.

2. Have you been long in that position?—Since 1894, first in the Eastern Counties District and then in the Devonshire District.

3. Previous to that you were, of course, for a considerable period in the Local Government Board?—In the Local Government Board and previously in the Privy Council Office.

4. Then what is your present district?—My present district is Devonshire, most of Somerset, and Cornwall.

5. And before that you were in the Eastern Counties?—In the Eastern Counties, yes.

6. You are to-day kindly come to us to give evidence on behalf of the Local Government Board with reference to the subject that we are inquiring into, namely, the law relating to vagrancy and its administration, and whether any alteration in the law or its administration is desirable?—And to give an account of what has been done up to the present time.

7. You are going to give us some historical account of this question?—I may, perhaps, begin by saying that the early history of measures against vagrancy does not concern the grant of poor law relief at all, but the relief of begging.

8. When was the earliest record of the law being put in force with regard to begging?—As to beggars there was an Act of Richard II.; but in Tudor times there were very stringent laws indeed against them; they were imprisoned, they were branded, they were even hung; and Dr. Burn says, "This part of our history looks like the history of the savages in America. Almost all severities have been exercised against vagrants, except scalping, and as one severity fell short it seemed naturally to follow that a greater was necessary." Every Act recites in its preamble that previous punishments having been of no effect, therefore further (and still more barbarous) punishments are enacted.

9. Then, of course, in those days there was no legal relief whatever?—No legal relief at all; the support of the destitute was in the hands of the church.

10. I mean there was no system of public relief?—No system of public relief; the poor depended upon the church and the monasteries and so on.

11. Then when was the first Act in the way of relief passed?—There was an Act of 1536, which was an Act for relief, inasmuch as it provided for the compulsory apprenticeship of vagrant children by public authorities of cities and shires, and it is noteworthy that that Act prohibited giving alms to vagrants under penalty of ten times the amount given.

12. And after that Act?—Then we come to the great Poor Law of Elizabeth, which really does not seem at all to contemplate giving relief away from a man's own parish; it does not refer to vagrants.

13. Was there any Act from the time of Elizabeth up to the 18th century?—There were various local Acts in which municipalities were empowered to commit vagrants or sturdy beggars to workhouses. In the phrase usually employed they were to be "kept and set to work" for any period up to one year, sometimes (as in Exeter) even up to three years, but I do not find that this power was exercised to any considerable extent. Then there was in 1824 the Vagrancy Act.

14. Was there nothing else between the time of Elizabeth and 1824 ?—I know of nothing substantial. There were certain local Acts establishing industrial houses, poorhouses, workhouses, and houses of correction, more or less bearing on the subject, but nothing general.

15. Were they brought in as private Acts ?—Yes, they were brought in as private local Acts.

16. Were there no general Acts ?—No.

17. I suppose those Acts varied a good deal in their general effect ?—Yes. Of course, there were various general Acts as to the treatment of beggars, more or less modifying the barbarous Acts of previous times ; now a little more severity, now a little less severity, but there was nothing general as to relief.

18. All repression and no relief ?—All repression and no relief.

19. Then you come to 1824 ?—The Act of 1824 was a measure simply for the repression of mendicity, but the magistrates were authorised to grant vagrants discharged from prison certificates or passes to enable them to reach their places of settlement, and to obtain relief from parochial authorities on the way.

20. Was that compulsory, or did it give the magistrates permission only to do it ?—It authorised them ; it gave permission.

21. It gave permission ?—But I gather that practically a man on being discharged from gaol always had, if he liked, such a pass, with a claim to that sort of relief.

22. To enable him to get relief on the road ?—On his way ; and he got a certain sum also on leaving gaol. That is a different matter.

23. There was a Report of the Poor Law Commissioners of 1834, was there not ?—Yes, the Report on which the whole present Poor Law system is founded, and it is worth while, I think, to quote the passage in which they refer to vagrancy. They say that, "Feeling convinced that vagrancy will cease to be a burthen if the relief given to vagrants is such as only the really destitute will accept ; feeling convinced that this cannot be effected unless the system is general ; and also convinced that no enactments to be executed by parochial officers will in all parishes be rigidly adhered to, unless under the influence of strict superintendence and control—we recommend that the Central Board be empowered and directed to frame and enforce regulations as to the relief to be afforded to vagrants and discharged prisoners." But for many years the Central Board made no such regulation.

24. They made no Order ?—No.

25. Then was that Report followed by a public Act ?—It was followed by the Act of 1834, "The New Poor Law," as it was called, but there was no reference to vagrants in that Act at all. And it is rather significant that in the plans which the Commissioners shortly afterwards issued for new workhouses to be built in pursuance of that Act, there is no accommodation for vagrants at all.

26. Then, in fact, vagrancy was in no way dealt with under that Act ?—Not at all.

27. There was no provision with regard to punishment for begging ?—No, none at all.

28. (Sir William Chance). Some of those special Acts to which you refer, those local Acts, were still continuing ?—Still continuing at that time ; there was no general repealing Act.

29. (Mr. Davy). Could you give an instance ?—There was an Act at Exeter in 1697 enabling the committal of vagrants to the poorhouse there for a maximum term of three years ; that is the sort of Act I refer to.

30. (Chairman). There was a Circular in 1837 ?—In 1837, the Commissioners issued a Circular to guardians intimating that casually destitute wayfarers must be relieved by the relieving officer, and that beggars by profession must be dealt with by the constables under the Vagrancy Act of 1824. They tried to draw a distinction between the two.

31. Now, when was the first mention of any task being set to vagrants ?—The first that I have been able to find was at Hatfield where (without very much authority) a task was established. They relieved the casuals, and they made them do something in return, and Lord Salisbury then made a representation to the Poor Law Commissioners, suggesting that some task of the kind should be made universal.

32. Made general ?—Yes.

33. Do you know the date of that ?—That was about 1838 or 1839.

34. Up to that time, as far as you know, there had never been any system of making the vagrants do any work in return for relief ?—No general system at all, and that is spoken of in the literature of the time as an experiment which might be very well made general, and so on, but it is spoken of as a novelty and as an experiment.

35. The inception of this really was the act of the late Lord Salisbury ?—Yes, the Lord Salisbury of that date (who was a member of Lord Derby's Cabinet of 1858).

36. Then there was a public Act in 1842 ?—The Act of 1842 legalised the performance of a task. It authorised the guardians to prescribe a task of not more than four hours after breakfast on the morning succeeding admission.

37. By whom was that Act brought in ?—The Poor Law Commissioners, I think.

38. They were not then called the Local Government Board ?—No ; the Poor Law Commissioners. There were three developments of the Central Department : first the Poor Law Commissioners ; then the Poor Law Board ; then the Local Government Board. In 1842 the first of the three was in existence.

39. Was there any establishment of vagrant wards under the Act of 1842 ?—By a general Order of the Commissioners in 1842 it was first required that casuals should be kept in a separate ward, dieted and set to work under regulations framed by the guardians and approved by the Commissioners.

40. Was that followed up by action ?—In a Report shortly after that the Commissioners called attention to the reduction of vagrancy between 1842 and 1844, and they attributed this result partly to the establishment of a task and partly to the opening of refuges in London, which they thought had relieved them of part of their casuals in London.

41. Was the reduction considerable ?—Yes, certainly.

42. Was there not a Report of the Poor Law Commissioners in 1844 ?—Yes, and they commented on that reduction of vagrancy. Then the Poor Law Act of 1844 authorised the combination in London and certain large towns of unions or parishes for the provision of casual wards or asylums for casuals, and the Commissioners put forward a proposal founded on this Act dealing with London. They were going to put casual wards all about London for the reception of London vagrants, but this met with so much Parliamentary opposition, I think on the ground of economy mainly—Mr. Hume, the economist, stoutly opposed it in Parliament—that it had to be withdrawn.

43. As to the cost of casuals ; was that made a union charge ?—It was. It had been a charge on the particular parish in which the workhouse was, an arrangement which was, of course, grossly unfair, and the parishes which had many applicants complained very much indeed ; so under the Poor Law Act of 1848 the cost of relieving casuals was made a union charge.

44. (Mr. Davy). Was there not a Circular from the Poor Law Board threatening officers with dismissal if they refused relief to destitute casuals ?—I am not sure if there was a Circular, but there was a case where the officer was dismissed for refusing relief to a casual, and that created such a stir that relief was given generally to every casual on application without his showing his destitution in the least.

45. (Chairman). Was there any special circumstance in 1848 which added to the number of the destitute ?—Yes ; owing to the Irish famine there was an enormous increase of vagrancy. Mr. Boase was appointed to inquire into the whole question, and the statistics collected by him were very remarkable. They showed the number of casuals on a particular day in December to be 1,791 in 1845 ; 2,224 in 1846 ; 4,508 in 1847 ; and 16,086 in 1848. This enormous increase was mainly due to the incursion of Irish people in consequence of the famine, and also partly to an assumption which had been generally read into the Commissioners' Circulars that every applicant must be relieved. Mr. Boase stated that the number of vagrants really destitute was only about one-tenth of the whole; and that lodging-house keepers complained that the workhouse casual wards were taking away their customers. He considered that most of them ought to be dealt with by the police, while uniformity of treatment was essential.

46. Was there a Circular in 1848?—Mr. Charles Buller, who was the President of the newly constituted Poor Law Board, issued a Circular to guardians calling attention to the fact that all vagrants applying for relief had been admitted to the workhouse, whereas the officers ought to "discriminate between the treatment of the professional vagrants and those really in distress," the former class being characterised as "the thief, the mendicant, and prostitute who crowd the vagrant wards." The Circular suggested uniformity throughout England in (a) refusal of relief to able-bodied men not actually destitute; (b) the imposing of a sufficient task; (c) the employment of police officers as relieving officers for tramps; and (d) some system of passes or certificates to be given by some (unnamed) authority to persons actually in search of work.

47. Was that acted upon to any great extent?—It was very widely acted upon by boards of guardians, and the result was that the total number of vagrants relieved on the 1st July, 1849, was only 5,662, as compared with 13,714 on 1st July, 1848; but an increase was shown in some unions which had not established casual wards.

48. Then from what you say the effect of casual wards was already successful?—Yes; owing to the special considerations that Mr. Buller had placed before the guardians, to the effect that they need not relieve every one, but might hesitate and make inquiries as to whether there was need of relief.

49. (Mr. Davy.) Putting the responsibility on the workhouse masters of discriminating?—It would certainly fall on the masters.

50. (Chairman.) What was the next important fact in sequence of time?—The proposal of the Poor Law Board in 1857 with regard to casual wards in London. They again put forward their scheme of 1846, of dividing the Metropolis into a few districts for the establishment of casual wards, each to treat vagrants in a uniform manner, but this scheme again had to be dropped as it had been dropped before.

51. Was that owing to Parliamentary opposition?—I am not quite sure whether it actually got into Parliament, but there was such a storm of opposition of some sort that it had to be dropped.

52. Was there any provision made about that time to make the police relieving officers for vagrants?—On the 28th December, 1863, the Poor Law Board issued another Circular recommending the appointment of police as relieving officers for vagrants in London.

53. What was the effect of that; did the police take up the duty?—The proposal was generally adopted; the police took up the duty, though with some reluctance, and after a time, as I will show you later, they raised such objections against it that they ceased to discharge it and special officers were appointed. But for the time the police undertook the duty the arrangement seemed to act well.

54. That would not be under Act of Parliament but simply by agreement between, I suppose, the Local Government Board of the day and the Commissioners of Police?—The Central Department apparently acted through the individual unions which made arrangements with the police.

55. (Sir William Chance.) By acting well, do you mean that it caused a reduction of vagrancy in London?—For a time the vagrancy went up and down so much that it is very difficult often to trace cause and effect.

56. (Chairman.) How long did the police perform this duty before complaint was made and they abandoned it?—Several years; I think till 1872.

57. Now was there not a Select Committee followed by an Act in 1864 dealing with Metropolitan vagrancy?—Yes. The Select Committee recommended that vagrancy in London should be a common charge, and hence the Houseless Poor Act of 1864, which was amended in 1865.

58. When you say a common charge, do you mean that it was made a charge on the whole of the rates of London without going into the various districts?—Yes, under those two Acts the expenses were to come out of the rates levied by the Metropolitan Board of Works over the whole Metropolis. Every London union was required to provide casual wards to the satisfaction of the Poor Law Board, who were to have a quarterly inspection of each.

59. There were Circulars in 1864 and 1865 as to the Metropolitan casual wards, I think?—Yes; the Board specified the requirements for casual wards, which they thought should have sleeping platforms or barrack beds; and they recommended, but they did not then prescribe, a task and a bath for each tramp; and they announced that they had made arrangements with the Commissioners of Police, by which the superintendents would inspect the casual wards in London and would make quarterly reports on them.

60. That I think was followed in 1866 by a volume of reports by the Inspectors. Was that for London alone?—No, it was for the whole country. It is a big volume of reports, some of which were very curious in their statements about vagrancy and the different sorts of people that resorted to the casual wards. They showed the greatest diversities as to the treatment of tramps. Of 619 unions 86 had no casual wards at all; many others had quite unsuitable accommodation; 195 imposed no task of work, but 292 employed the police as assistant relieving officers. It is noticeable that of the whole number of vagrants relieved on a particular day in 1865, more than one-third received the relief, not in casual wards but in the form of out-relief tickets for common lodging-houses or something of this sort, and that shows how deficient the accommodation was in connection with workhouses.

61. (Mr. Davy.) Those were tickets given by the relieving officers?—Those were tickets given by the relieving officers, because they had no room at the workhouses.

62. They entitled a man to a night's lodging?—Yes.

63. (Chairman.) Then about that time was there anything done in the way of further enforcement of tasks for vagrants?—Well, it was represented very strongly in these reports by the Inspectors that workhouse masters would not enforce the tasks. Their great idea was to get rid of the vagrants as soon as possible; so they did not wish to bother about supervising their task, and that is a difficulty which has continued to the present day.

64. And that was referred to in the volume of reports?—That was referred to prominently.

65. I suppose pointing out the variety of treatment by the various workhouse masters?—That is so.

66. Now we come to what you have already referred to—the police as assistant relieving officers?—That system in some counties seemed to act exceedingly well, but in others it failed, owing to the police giving orders without inquiry, or to some friction between the police and the workhouse officials. Essex was the one county where vagrancy was reported to have been practically abolished by the arrangements established about 1848 by the chief constable, Admiral McHardy, who was specially keen about vagrants in Essex. The one thing that everybody said was so admirably done there was Admiral McHardy's suppression of vagrancy.

67. (Sir William Chance.) When did he first take action?—Somewhere about 1848 or a little earlier.

68. Did he institute the system of employing the police as assistant relieving officers at that time?—I think so. There were two or three places where it was done about the same time; but he was the most prominent about it, and it was done more thoroughly and more extensively in Essex than at any other place.

69. And in consequence vagrancy decreased in Essex?—Up to the present time Essex has been a county in which you would expect to get a large number of vagrants, and yet year after year there have been extraordinarily few.

70. Do you wish to refer to the opinions of the Inspectors given in that volume of reports?—Yes, especially to those of Mr. Doyle, who wrote what has always been a sort of standard report as to mendicity and casuals. It has been more quoted than almost any other blue-book that I know of. He gives extracts of tramps' writings on the walls of the workhouses, by way of showing their general character as what he calls "vagabonds of the lowest class," and he gives a great deal of information about them. He recommends that a vagrant ward should be attached to every police station with means of setting professional vagrants to work, and that the wards at workhouses should be utilised for men genuinely in search of work who have obtained from the authorities credentials showing the object of their journey. Other Inspectors considered that the whole treatment of vagrants was a matter for the police. All were apparently agreed that uniformity was essential.

71. (Mr. Davy.) Is it in that report that objection is taken to the police acting as assistant relieving officers for the reason that they would be apt to pass the man who had committed an offence against the Vagrancy Act on to the workhouse, instead of dealing with him themselves?—Yes.

72. That is to say, that the weak point of the system was that there were two authorities?—Yes, there was a good deal of friction.

73. Is that point brought out in all these reports?—Yes.

74. (Chairman.) That, I suppose, has been the difficulty from the very earliest?—I think so.

75. Then there was the objection of the London police to act as assistant relieving officers?—Yes; in their Report for 1866 the Poor Law Board comment on the considerable increase of vagrancy, particularly in London, and say they have approved tasks in nearly all unions in the country. As to the question of the police acting as assistant relieving officers in London, there is a letter from Sir Richard Mayne stating that the police greatly dislike the duties, and complain of the filth and vermin brought to the police station by applicants for relief. But although he objected then, the actual change was not made until some six years later, as you will find.

76. Did they continue to act?—They continued to act up to 1872.

77. (Mr. Davy.) Was there a prohibition by Sir Richard Mayne?—Not exactly a prohibition. In the first instance he encouraged the system warmly, then gradually he got all these complaints apparently from his superintendents; and finally, I suppose, his representations to the Central Department became so strong, that although this first one was disregarded and nothing was done on it, yet in 1872 it was found that the police would not do the work any longer.

78. What I want to get at is, did he, or did the Poor Law Board prohibit the police being employed as assistant relieving officers?—Well, there was a conference apparently between the police and the Poor Law Board.

79. There was joint action?—Yes. It was agreed that the system should be terminated.

80. In London?—Yes.

81. (Chairman.) What took the place of the police with regard to relief to vagrants?—Special officers were appointed by the various boards of guardians as assistant relieving officers in place of the police, and instead of the inspections and quarterly reports by the superintendents of police, central supervision was provided for by the appointment of four officers by the Local Government Board on the 1st July, 1872. They began to act then, and have acted ever since; and I believe you are going to have before you one of those appointed on that date.

82. There must have been a very considerable number of men appointed?—Yes.

83. In lieu of the Metropolitan police?—Yes.

84. Have you any idea of the number?—I think about one in each union, the total number being between thirty-five and forty.

85. That would be a comparatively small number in comparison with the police?—There were only one or two of the police in each union who were designated specially to give orders of admission. It was not the police generally, but one or two officers selected to give orders of admission at each police station.

86. They would be the actual relieving officers; the other members of the force would work with them?—No doubt.

87. What was the action on the part of other members of the police force; they would, I suppose, assist these new relieving officers to the best of their ability?—Yes, and there was a special clause in the Act which we shall come to—the Act of 1871 I think it was—under which any constable might, without an order of admission at all, take a destitute wanderer to the casual ward, and the superintendent of the casual ward was bound to receive him if brought in by a policeman.

88. Well, then, the general body of police continued to assist the officer?—Certainly.

89. Only the officer was appointed by the union instead of being a police officer?—Ordinarily the applicant, instead of going to the police station for orders of admission went to an officer of the guardians, who made such inquiries as he chose and who gave orders for admission to the casual ward.

90. (Mr. Davy.) This part of your evidence applies only to London, does it not?—Only to London.

91. Were the casual wards quite separate from the workhouse?—Yes.

92. In the country you still have assistant relieving officers who are police constables?—Yes, a good many.

93. (Chairman.) In 1866 there was a somewhat important Order with regard to diet, was there not?—As regards London again, which seems to have been the great field for experiments, the Poor Law Board prescribed a uniform diet of six ounces of bread and a pint of gruel for breakfast and supper for adults in all Metropolitan casual wards.

94. Had any diet been prescribed at all before that?—No diet had been prescribed before.

95. It was left, I suppose, to the workhouse masters?—I think so.

96. There was a Poor Law Board Circular, I think, in 1868, as to the treatment of vagrants generally?—The Poor Law Board issued a Circular to guardians, generally recommending the appointment of police as assistant relieving officers, suggesting that a register of applicants for admission should be kept; that they should be searched, that they should be bathed, and that they should be made to perform a task of not more than four hours. The Circular commends the system of separate cells which had been introduced in a few places, and also the "Berkshire system" of way-tickets, which is mentioned as dispensing with any task if a tramp has walked a sufficient distance from another workhouse; that walk was supposed to take the place of a task.

97. Now, is that Circular in force still?—No, it has been practically superseded.

98. Has another Circular been issued?—There have been many Circulars.

99. Dealing with the same subject?—Dealing with the same subject, and each one more or less superseding the previous ones.

100. Was there not a local report of Mr. Wodehouse in 1871 with regard to vagrancy in Kent?—Yes, that dealt with the question especially at hop-picking time. Then, he said, the system quite broke down, and he quoted the chief constable as considering it absolutely impossible to carry out the Vagrancy Act, and as declaring that if he had attempted to carry it out, if the magistrates would convict—which they would not—the prisons would be a great deal more than full, and the staff could not possibly deal with the matter; in fact, at hop-picking time the Vagrancy Act was practically suspended there.

101. That was, of course, purely a temporary difficulty?—Yes, but one recurring every year. Mr. Wodehouse thought that there ought to be co-operation between the guardians and the police, that there should be detention, task, and separate cells, and that the Act should be enforced more thoroughly; but that was all.

102. Then in 1871 was there not a Bill introduced providing for tasks?—Yes. Lord Kimberley on behalf of the Government introduced a measure dealing with the whole question of the discharge of paupers from workhouses, providing that a casual pauper should not be allowed to discharge himself before 11 in the morning after his admission, or before 9 a.m. on the third day if he had been admitted more than twice within a month to the same casual ward. Lord Kimberley said then that it had been suggested that the relief of vagrants should be placed entirely under the control of the police, but the Government objected to this, because it would take the police away from their proper functions and would necessitate the building of casual wards at police stations. It had also been suggested that the way-ticket or "Berkshire system" should be made universal, but this proposal was discarded, as it might encourage persons to subsist by that means, and might lead to the grant of tickets to any persons likely to fall on the rates, and to the forgery of tickets. Accordingly the Bill provided for the amendment of the existing system by securing longer detention, with uniform diet, lodging and work. Then this Bill became law as the Pauper Inmates Discharge and Regulation Act, 1871, and is still in force. It is noticeable that it required guardians to provide such casual wards as the Central Department should consider necessary, although this requirement has always been left more or less optional with boards of guardians. The Central Department has preached to them very much as to the necessity of providing proper casual wards, but does not absolutely require them to do so against their will.

103. Was there any reason given for detaining a man as late as 11 o'clock; suppose a man wished to be on his way to another place?—Well, that was the first establishment of a system of tasks; he was only detained one night; he was not detained a second night; and it was thought that if he had his supper and his bed and breakfast he must do work for them, and that the only chance of securing that was to keep him four hours next morning before he went away.

104. Is there anything else with regard to the Act of 1871?—Yes, in an Order of the 22nd November, 1871, the Local Government Board made regulations under the Act; but both as regards dietary and task, the alternatives made uniformity out of the question. The Board stated their intention of requiring proper accommodation for vagrants in all cases, and again commended separate cells as being preferred by honest wayfarers, but very much objected to by habitual tramps. It has been found over and over again that, whereas your decent working man, when you get him on the road, is very glad to have a separate place, where he has a hammock, and where he is shut off from all the professional beggars, the professional beggars dislike it very much indeed. They enjoy an opportunity of concerting plans with their pals as to what houses are good to beg at. After that sort of association they do not like the separate system at all. Then the Board referred with approval to a plan at Bath where all casuals applied to the police, and only the able-bodied were sent to the workhouse to perform a task, while the old and infirm men and the women and children were sent to a refuge. They also mentioned a plan at Corwen by which wards for vagrants were to be constructed at the police station. However, the Bath system has long ago been obsolete; and as to Corwen I do not know.

105. (Mr. Davy.) It was never carried out?—No.

106. (Chairman.) At the present time is there any special accommodation for tramps at any of the police stations, or are there only the ordinary police cells?—I do not know of any casual wards except under the control of the guardians.

107. (Mr. Davy.) There are none in England?—No.

108. (Chairman.) There was a Report, I think, of the Local Government Board in 1872; did that give the result of the Act of 1871?—Yes, the Local Government Board in their Report commented with some pride and satisfaction on the reduction of vagrancy, which they attributed mainly to that new Act, but as a matter of fact they were rather hasty, because the statistics show that although the numbers were very high in these years—1868 to 1870—they dropped by about one-third in January and July, 1871, before the Act came into operation.

109. The reduction was not due to the Act?—The reduction, whatever cause it was due to, was not due to the Act.

110. Was there any great reduction between 1871 and 1872?—No, the numbers had dropped before 1872.

111. Then there was another Circular with regard to Metropolitan vagrancy and the appointment of identification officers; what was the date of that?—30th May, 1872. As the Metropolitan police complained of their duties in connection with vagrants, the Local Government Board issued a Circular to the effect that their services should be dispensed with. The Board also announced their intention of appointing a staff of identification officers to visit wards at admission times, and to point out to the workhouse officials the habitual casuals liable to detention, because under the Act I have just quoted they were liable to detention for two nights. Those officers were appointed on the 1st July, 1872.

112. And then in 1873, I think, there was a Report as to the result of that identification?—Yes, the Board referred to the success of this identification, and the reduction of the average number of casuals in London by nearly one-half. They added that the number of habitual vagrants identified "suggests whether some further measures should not now be adopted for dealing effectively with those paupers who are evidently not to be deterred by the existing discipline from passing their lives in casual wards."

113. Had any method of punishment been adopted with regard to these habitual vagrants?—Only the detention for two nights instead of one if they had been in the same casual ward within a month.

114. It had not been brought up at the Metropolitan police courts?—Not particularly; there were some prosecutions even in those times, as there are now, for refusal or neglect to work, insubordination, and so on, but there was not any large number.

115. I rather meant, was the effect of the identification officers to bring any of the men so identified up to the police court to be dealt with there?—That might have been so to some extent.

116. (Sir William Chance.) And in London does not your expression "same casual ward" mean any casual ward in the Metropolis?—Any casual ward in the Metropolis.

117. (Chairman.) This large reduction in habitual vagrants pointed to something being done of a preventive character?—Yes.

118. (Mr. Davy.) What it comes to is this, is it not, that in the country a man may sleep night after night in casual wards and yet not be subject to the extra detention?—Yes.

119. Whereas, if during any month he slept in two casual wards in the Metropolis, never mind how wide apart, he might be identified and would be subject to the extra detention?—That is so. He might sleep at Islington one night and Southwark another, and if caught by the identification officer at Southwark, who knows him as having slept at Islington, he would be subject to the extra detention.

120. (Chairman.) Then in 1875, I think, there was a Local Government Board Report as to the reduction of vagrancy and its cost in London?—Yes, the reduction of vagrancy is again commented upon as surprisingly large, and it is stated the vagrancy expenses have been reduced from £12,047 in 1868–1869 to £6,791 in 1874–1875. I do not know exactly what those figures include; but that is given as the cost of vagrancy.

121. Do they suggest any reason for that reduction?—The general measures that have been taken as to identification, and so on, and as to increase of cells;

122. (Dr. Downes.) Does the reduction referred to only relate to London; was there a reduction as well in the country?—I am speaking only of London now.

123. Was there a reduction in the country corresponding with that in London at that period?—I think not in the country. Taking just the 1st January figures, there had been a reduction after 1869. In 1869—that was the end of a period, by the way, of great depression—the figures were very high indeed in the country generally, the total being 7,000. In 1870 it went down to 5,400; in 1871 it was 3,700, and after that it steadily went down till 1875. From that point the figures went up again.

124. (Sir William Chance.) Those are the 1st of January figures?—Yes. I have a diagram here that we will come to presently. I will put it in. (Diagram handed in—see Appendix VI.) It shows the ebb and flow of vagrancy in the different years; generally with an upward tendency. And below, the figures as to general pauperism are shown.

125. (Mr. Davy.) But your answer, as far as it goes, shows that the decrease in the country was at least as great as the decrease in the Metropolis?—Almost.

126. Am I right in saying that after every one of those Circulars, the Poor Law Commissioners, the Poor Law Board, or the Local Government Board, always claimed a great reduction of vagrancy?—Oh, yes.

127. In every case?—I believe so.

128. Then vagrancy goes up again?—Yes.

129. And then there is another Circular and vagrancy comes down again?—Yes.

130. That has been going on since 1834?—That has been going on with remarkable regularity.

131. (Chairman.) Was there any general action in the country with regard to identification such as you state there was in London?—No, none.

132. Then, if it was owing to identification that the numbers decreased in London, one would naturally suppose there would not be a similar decrease in the country?—Of course, the numbers in the whole country at that time were very small, 2,000 or 3,000 only. It is very hard to draw any deduction from any ebb and flow in such small numbers.

133. Were there not some subsequent Reports of the Local Government Board as to the increase of vagrancy?—Yes. In their succeeding Reports the Local Government Board refer to the increase of vagrancy, which they attribute to depression in trade and (in 1878–9) a very severe winter. It is noticeable that in 1879–80, the numbers for the whole country were more than double those in 1872, although in London there was not much increase. 1879 was, I suppose, one of the worst years we have ever had industrially.

134. What special industrial difficulty was there at the time?—The iron strike, the big strike in Lancashire; and it was one of the worst years for farmers into the bargain; everything came together.

135. Then the cause of that increase was obvious?—Yes.

136. There was a Bill introduced by Mr. Albert Pell in 1882. Did that Bill become an Act?—Well, it did in a much modified and altered form. The Bill he introduced was to abolish the distinction between casual and ordinary paupers, requiring that no pauper should be discharged without reasonable notice, and no notice should be given before he had appeared before the guardians. The effect of that obviously is that where guardians meet fortnightly a man might have to stop there for a fortnight. That was substantially imprisonment for any time up to a fortnight. This provision was struck out of the Bill, which, however, was passed as the Casual Poor Act, 1882, and gave power to detain casuals till 9 a.m. on the second day after admission, and in the case of those admitted twice during the same month, authorised detention till 9 a.m. on the fourth day. That is the Act under which we are at present working.

137. Was any reason assigned for detaining a man for four days?—Only to make a distinction between the habitual casual (known by the fact that he had been there repeatedly) and the man who was only the chance casual, who was to be detained for two nights.

138. Then the detention was practically an imprisonment?—It was.

139. Of course there was a task to be done in the meantime?—There was.

140. (Mr. Davy.) Previously, the detention up to 11 o'clock was to enable a man to do work to pay for his night's lodging?—Yes.

141. Mr. Pell's Bill went further; it imposed a longer period of detention and a further task to meet the case of extra compulsory detention?—Well, I cannot be sure as to the reason; there are the two facts that the detention was made longer and the task increased.

142. As a deterrent?—Yes.

143. (Chairman.) Then were there a Circular and an Order following that?—A Circular was issued with the Order which, no doubt, the Committee have before them. Perhaps it might be convenient if I gave a summary of the Order.

144. If you please?—On the 18th December, 1882, the Local Government Board issued an Order making regulations under this Act. Article 3 provided for admission to casual wards by an order signed by a relieving officer, assistant relieving officer or overseer, but requiring admission without order in case of urgency. Under Article 4 (3) admission was to be after 4 p.m. in winter and after 6 p.m. in summer. Under Article 5, vagrants were to be searched and their money taken away. Under Article 6, they were to have a bath; under Article 7, they were to have their clothing dried and disinfected and a nightdress supplied; under Article 8, an admission and discharge book was to be kept, but it is perhaps worth noticing that this contains no columns for description of vagrants. In some of the old registers adopted in particular unions, they have columns with a view of identifying vagrants; the colour of their hair, special marks on them, height, and so on; but no particulars of that sort were required. It was merely a register of the casual's name, age, calling, previous sleeping-place, task and time of discharge. Then under Article 9, the casual was to be detained until the performance of the prescribed task, and till 9 a.m. on the second day or, if previously admitted within a month in the casual ward of the same union (all the Metropolis to be treated as one union), till 9 a.m. on the 4th day; and Sunday was not to be reckoned. But (and here comes the proviso which has prevented uniformity all over the country), the guardians were empowered to give directions for the earlier discharge of any class or classes of paupers; while workhouse masters or ward superintendents were empowered to allow earlier discharge in any individual case to be afterwards reported to the guardians. Therefore the guardians could not only make exceptions as regards any case or any particular class of cases, but they might make exceptions as regards all classes. In point of fact, many boards of guardians now make the exception the rule by not detaining anybody for two nights. There was also the power of the workhouse officers to discharge individual vagrants earlier than the time specified.

145. (Sir William Chance.) Was that discretion given by the Order of 1882?—Yes.

146. (Chairman.) Then to continue?—Article 10 of the Order prescribed dietaries, but made them variable by the guardians with the approval of the Local Government Board. Article 11 prescribed a task, but made it similarly variable, and provided that any task previously prescribed should remain in force till revoked. Article 12 made regulations as to language, conduct, smoking and so on. Article 13 provided that casuals should be attended by the medical officer of the workhouse, if sick, and, if this was necessary, should be transferred to the workhouse hospital. Article 14 provided that the wards should have proper sleeping accommodation, and that means of communication at night with the officer in charge of the wards should be supplied. That, I think, is a summary of that Order which now governs the procedure.

147. That is in force still?—Yes.

148. (Mr. Davy.) Under Mr. Pell's Act, the guardians were authorised to detain for two days, were they not?—Yes.

149. Then under the Board's Order it was made compulsory on them to detain?—Yes.

150. So that what is a mere authorisation to detain in the Act of Parliament, is made compulsory in that Order of the Local Government Board, subject to the exceptions which you set out?—Would you put it so strongly as that? The words of the Act if I remember rightly are "a casual pauper shall not be entitled to discharge himself." I do not know whether you would regard that as merely authorising the guardians to detain him.

151. And the Order says that he must be detained?—That is so.

152. (Mr. Simpson.) But the Order gives the guardians power, does it not, to except any class or classes of casual paupers?—Yes, that I mentioned just now.

153. (Mr. Davy.) Might they in your view except all classes; I mean to say all persons under seven feet high for instance?—Yes; many of them do exempt everybody from detention.

154. Then as to the register of vagrants, whatever information you get beyond identification must be obtained from the tramps themselves?—Yes.

155. Is information so obtained worth anything at all in your judgment?—Not if it is verbal.

156. Is it not a fact that a tramp will give one name in the night and another in the morning?—Yes, that is a common practice.

157. (Chairman.) I understand you to say the workhouse masters have discretion as well as the guardians in regard to discharge, and so on?—Yes.

158. (Captain Showers.) They have that now, have they not?—Oh, yes.

159. (Mr. Davy.) So that, on the whole, that Order does not insure uniformity?—Does not insure uniformity at all.

160. Either in diet or in detention, or in task of work?—Not at all.

161. It is intended to do so?—Over and over again the Board have issued Circulars as to the importance of uniformity, but they have not been able to suggest, or at any rate have not suggested, in what way that uniformity should be secured.

162. Do you yourself think it is possible to secure uniformity?—In diet, yes.

163. In work?—In work, to a larger extent than at present.

164. In detention?—In detention; well, I cannot answer that in a word or two, and perhaps you will allow me to comment on that when I come to the particular place.

165. (Chairman.) Was there a decrease of vagrancy immediately after 1882; and a subsequent rise?—That is so. There was a further large drop in vagrancy immediately, but for a very short time indeed, and then it went up more or less steadily till 1889.

166. Well, is that accounted for by trade conditions as far as you recollect?—I cannot answer that. I am sorry to say I have tried to get some statements as to years in which the trade conditions were adverse and in which there was special depression, and so on, but I could not get anything that would be worth putting before you.

167. Then there was a Circular of the Local Government Board as to day rooms and way-tickets?—Yes, I only mention it because it was one of the series of Circulars.

168. Have you the date of that?—It was issued on the 16th January, 1883, and the Local Government Board suggested the importance of tramps, especially when there were cells, having day rooms also. They mentioned, further, that the system of way-tickets had been established in some places with apparent success, but they did not go into details on the subject.

169. You might explain in a word or two what is meant by day rooms?—They are rooms in which meals are taken and which casuals use when they are not occupying their cells for working or sleeping.

170. Would those day rooms be apart from the ordinary day rooms of the regular inmates of the workhouse?—Yes, all casuals may be roughly stated to be quite apart from the general workhouse.

171. (Mr. Davy.) A day room would be for the greater comfort of the casuals?—That is so.

172. (Mr. Simpson.) When you say casuals are quite apart, do you mean there is a separate building for the casual wards?—Well, of course, in some of the old workhouses adaptations have had to be made and a bit of the buildings has been taken for the casual wards. The population of the general wards having decreased and there being a good many casuals, the guardians, not being inclined to spend money on bricks and mortar, have appropriated a disused portion to casuals; but in all new workhouses it is the custom to build a separate block of cells for casuals.

173. (Mr. Davy.) And the casuals are kept separate, or should be?—The casuals are separate, and in my experience almost everywhere they are now kept so.

174. (Captain Showers.) To pick oakum, four or five tramps will sit in one room?—Yes.

175. Do you think that is really a good system; does it not afford an opportunity for the men to arrange plans together?—Yes, but of course, unless you have enough cells in which to make a man do his work, it is very difficult to avoid having some arrangement of the kind. Oakum picking is getting less and less used as a task in casual wards.

176. They say the oakum is bought at a higher price than it fetches when picked; therefore it is actually a loss, not a paying thing at all?—Yes.

177. (Chairman.) As regards the Trafalgar Square gatherings of 1887, what was their effect on casual wards in the Metropolis?—In 1887 some kind-hearted persons provided coffee, and others gave money to the assembly of unfortunate people who congregated in Trafalgar Square and slept on the stones and seats. That got noised abroad in the papers; more persons came to give money away; more were attracted by the money and the coffee. The result was that the casuals flocked there and became such a nuisance that the police cleared the Square, and then the casuals thronged to the wards in the neighbourhood, especially to those of the Strand union. The accommodation, which had been calculated for ordinary times and not for a sudden influx of this sort, became quite insufficient. The guardians did not know how to deal with it. They gave away as many as 500 common lodging-house tickets in a single night, and it became known that any man could get a common lodging-house ticket there, and thus might save the price of his lodging; so every man who wanted an extra pint or two of beer, instead of going to the lodging-house, went to the casual ward at the Strand workhouse, and as they could not take him in they gave him a ticket for a common lodging-house and he saved his 3d. or 4d., or whatever it was. This went on until the guardians got additional premises, but it is rather significant that while the Strand wards were overcrowded in this way, those in Islington and Lambeth and some others were only half full. It just shows how that sort of so-called charity simply attracted everybody and caused a public nuisance.

178. Then there were Circulars in 1887 and 1888 as to the time of discharge of vagrants; were these general or Metropolitan?—That of 1887 was Metropolitan, and it suggested the discharge of casuals, who had been detained the two nights, at an earlier hour on the second day, in order that they might get away in time to have a chance of obtaining some work, and in 1888 a similar Circular was issued to provincial guardians.

179. There was a comment, I think, by the Local Government Board in 1888 as to oakum picking?—Yes, they stated that a question had been raised as to the comparative tasks of oakum picking in prisons and in casual wards, and they found that although the amount for casuals was rather greater than for prisoners, their task was far easier, as the material was soft, or the oakum not so finely picked, the full task was often not exacted, and hooks for picking were generally allowed. That shows that question had been raised then as to the comparative tasks of casuals and of prisoners.

180. In 1888 there was a Circular as to the avoidance of competition of workhouse labour with manufacturers of firewood?—Yes, the Local Government Board had complaints from manufacturers of firewood that their trade was being spoilt by the competition of casual wards, and so the Board asked guardians to discontinue the manufacture of firewood on any large scale, and, in the task imposed, to avoid competition with any particular branch of industry.

181. Was that in any way prohibitive; was it a suggestion that that particular industry for the workhouse should be stopped?—It was left to the guardians to do as they liked; but the Local Government Board advised them to take care not to compete with individual trades in any arrangements for selling, and in the choice of goods produced.

182. (Sir William Chance.) As a matter of fact there is a great deal of cutting up firewood done in workhouses?—Oh, yes, a great deal.

Mr. H. Preston-Thomas.

Mr. H.
Preston-
Thomas.

25 Oct. 1904.

183. And have the complaints to a large extent stopped ?
—I believe so.

184. (Chairman.) Is this not a task which is easily performed by an unskilled person, and out of which you may get a good deal of labour in the course of some three or four hours ?—Certainly. But the question of substituting time-work for piece-work is one which seems to deserve consideration. If you fix a specific quantity of work for every casual to do, you cannot easily adapt it to various capabilities. What is too little for some is too much for others. You might get a greater scope, I think, in the character and the application of the task, if you made it not so much work to be done, but so many hours to be occupied ; any reasonably sufficient work.

185. (Mr. Davy.) In these countries that you have visited, say Norway, Switzerland, and the Tyrol, where they have wood industries, the men are mainly occupied during summer in preparing fuel for winter ; and the old age pauperism is made lighter by convenient work of this kind in which old people are employed ?—I think so.

186. (Chairman.) Was there not a Local Government Board Circular in 1889 to the London guardians regarding uniformity of treatment of casuals ?—Yes ; that Circular pointed out that while some casual wards are overcrowded others have always vacant accommodation, ascribing this to differences of administration as regards detention or task, and suggesting that guardians should adopt uniformity. But it does not say what the uniformity is to be.

187. That was to London alone ?—Yes.

188. Then there was an Order of the 11th June, 1892, as to the time of discharge of casuals ?—That was a general Order. The previous Circulars which I have already mentioned as advising the discharge of men earlier on the second morning had been ineffectual, and so the Board issued an Order especially conferring upon any casual, representing that he wishes to seek work, the right to claim his discharge on the second morning after admission at 5.30 in the summer and at 6.30 in the winter, provided he has performed his task to the best of his ability.

189. In 1895 was there not a deputation to the Local Government Board in favour of the appointment of a Royal Commission, or a Departmental Committee ?—Yes. There was a deputation from a large number of unions—250—representing a population of over 16,000,000, and it pressed Mr. Shaw-Lefevre for a Royal Commission or a Departmental Committee on vagrancy, but they got rather cold comfort from him, for his answer was that the remedy was in the hands of the guardians themselves, who ought to try the effect of carrying out the Order before asking for fresh inquiry or legislation.

190. Which Order do you refer to ?—The Order of 1882. He said the remedy was in the hands of the guardians ; they had only to enforce the Order and they would find that vagrancy would decrease.

191. Then the request was declined ?—The request was declined.

192. There was a Local Government Board Circular of 1896 urging the enforcement of the Order of 1882 ?—No doubt that was partly in consequence of the deputation. The Local Government Board issued a Circular to the guardians stating that out of 648 unions, 635 had casual wards, but only in 305 were vagrants detained more than one night. It stated the principle of the existing system as that of “insuring from the vagrants such a return by work for the relief afforded to them by the guardians, that they will understand that their lot while so relieved will be in no wise better as regards labour than that of the industrious man,” but “this intention is frustrated when from more than half the vagrant wards in the country, vagrants are discharged the first morning after their admission, generally without any adequate task of work being required from them.” To meet the plea of the accommodation being insufficient for detention, the Board said that if an habitual vagrant is not sleeping in one workhouse he is sleeping in another, and that, therefore, if all guardians enforced detention there would be no extra strain, and that, moreover, strict administration always produces reduction ; but if this should prove insufficient to check vagrancy the Board declared their readiness to take further action by legislation or otherwise.

193. The Local Government Board asked in February, 1903, for their Inspectors' opinions ?—Yes, they consulted their General Inspectors as to how far the regulations were enforced, whether and in what respects they were insufficient, whether the question should be dealt with, and what action was desirable.

194. And the Inspectors replied ?—The reports of the Inspectors were received, and some of their suggestions will be dealt with in a later part of my evidence as to various amendments of the Orders which have been suggested as possible.

195. On the 23rd February, 1904, there was a deputation to the President of the Local Government Board. Whence did that come ?—That was from the Central Poor Law Conference, and from the Poor Law Unions' Association. It pressed for the appointment of a Departmental Committee on the whole question ; and the present Committee was subsequently appointed. This, with the exception of some Circulars as to the spreading of smallpox by tramps, as to which I shall bring forward some facts presently, completes the history of the action taken by Parliament, and by the Central Department on the subject up to the present time.

196. (Mr. Davy.) That, you may say, is the historical review of vagrancy from its earliest days up to the present time so far as it touches the Poor Law ?—Yes.

197. (Chairman.) I think you have some statistics on vagrancy to give us ?—It is necessary to point out, in dealing with the statistics of vagrancy, that there are two causes which have led to very great exaggeration indeed as to the number of vagrants relieved by the guardians. In the first place, returns are constantly published for particular unions and particular counties, not of the number of vagrants on a particular night, but of the total number of admissions to casual wards during a half-year or a year. A statement appeared in the newspapers some time ago that in the four counties, Berks, Bucks, Oxford, and Warwick, the total number of casual paupers for several years averaged about 200,000 per year. Well, as a matter of fact, during the last half century, the number of casuals relieved on a single night in the whole of England has not, until the present year, according to the half-yearly returns, ever reached 9,000, and it is only by multiplying the number of days by the number of daily admissions that we get enormous figures like the above for only four counties. Of course the tramps are like a stage army, appearing again and again.

198. The same individual night after night ?—Yes, and if only ten of them go from workhouse to workhouse during the year, they will, allowing for detention, figure as about 2,500 admissions in the year. That is one reason, and newspaper and other articles so often confuse the number of admissions with the number of actual tramps, that a very exaggerated idea has been formed. Moreover, the half-yearly returns up to the 1st July, 1896, include a large number of cases counted twice over, because they had breakfast at one union and supper at another. This was discovered in the compilation of a Parliamentary Return ordered for the years 1890–1895, which required the number of tramps sleeping at workhouses on a particular night. Then it was seen that that number differed largely from those previously given as relieved on the 1st January, so an alteration has been made, and though the figures of the double count still appear in the returns of the 1st January and 1st July, those returns now also give separately the numbers sleeping on the particular night.

199. Those are tramps relieved ?—Tramps relieved in casual wards.

200. On one particular night ?—Yes.

201. That says nothing, of course, of tramps who may be sleeping out ?—No, nor in common lodging-houses ; these are the numbers of casuals actually relieved.

202. (Mr. Simpson.) Is it the case that of the tramps sleeping at common lodging-houses, a considerable proportion have been given tickets by the relieving officer ?—Not a considerable proportion now. There was a considerable proportion of course when casual wards were much less general and more inadequate than at present, especially in times of considerable and sudden increase which strain workhouse accommodation. Even now when casual wards are full it is the practice to give tickets for common lodging-houses, but the number has been very small of late years.

203. It would be technically relief, I suppose, giving a ticket for a common lodging-house?—Yes, that is so.

204. Would it be included in the statistics of pauper vagrants relieved?—Yes, there is a separate column, in our half-yearly returns, and you will find that whereas the numbers used to run into thousands, 2,000 or 3,000, some twenty or thirty years ago, now, I think, the number is about two or three hundred. It is insignificant now as compared with the whole number.

205. (Sir William Chance.) The figures for the night of 1st January, 1904, give the total number of outdoor vagrants relieved as 214 for the whole of England and Wales?—Yes.

206. Those would only be relieved in common lodging-houses?—That is so.

207. On orders given by the relieving officer?—Yes. Not having room in his casual wards, he gives them tickets for a common lodging-house.

208. (Mr. Davy.) I think you told us that in 1866, quite a large proportion of the workhouses had no casual wards?—A very great many of them had not.

209. Now I think every union practically has a casual ward?—Practically every union; there are one or two exceptions.

210. (Mr. Simpson.) I suppose some unions have more than one casual ward?—In a few instances they have more than one. I know of one or two such cases.

211. Not more than that?—It is very rare. One in the West of England has a couple of casual wards. Axbridge is a very widespread union; they have one at Weston-super-Mare and one at Axbridge; that is the only case I know of, either in the eastern or the western counties.

212. (Dr. Downes.) Have you observed the difference at different periods between the January and July figures. I will illustrate what I mean by a rough diagram I have here. You will see that in 1858, the indoor vagrants were practically the same in number, both in January and July, but as time goes on and we come up to the present time there is a very great difference between the July and the January numbers?—The number always falls very much in the summer now, and it used not to do so.

213. (Chairman.) Have you any reason to assign for that?—No, I do not think I have. There was very much confusion in old times and I should hesitate to deduce anything from the figures of 1858.

214. I was going to suggest to you that possibly sleeping out would make a difference?—Oh, yes, as regards winter and summer; the sleeping out doubtless makes some difference.

215. (Dr. Downes.) Sometimes the July numbers have exceeded the January numbers?—They used to; not in recent years.

216. (Captain Showers.) They used to in the country?—They used to in the country, but they do not now; in the summer there are generally not nearly so many casuals; of course there are more odd jobs for them, and various things, and besides they sleep out more.

217. And also the farmers in the fruit and pea-picking places provide sheds or barns, and that sort of thing?—Yes.

218. That naturally reduces the number coming to the workhouse?—Yes.

219. (Mr. Simpson.) But it was not only in old times; I notice that there are four occasions since 1880 in which the July number exceeded that in January. There was not very much difference. No good reason for that difference occurs to you, does it?—I am afraid I cannot suggest any reason.

220. (Dr. Downes.) There is a considerable drop in 1900, coincident with the calling out of the Reserves?—That is so.

221. (Chairman.) Have you any further remark to make on your statistics?—Yes. Till the present year we have only had the 1st January and 1st July figures; we have only had those two dates in the year, and until ten or a dozen years ago we only had figures subject to that confusion I have mentioned as to the double counts. But even when we have had the single counts we have only had those two figures for the year, and we have been in the habit of taking the mean of those two figures as representing the vagrancy for the year. Yet the more one looks into the thing the more one sees that we do not thus get the average for the year or anything like it. The 1st January is certainly not the maximum. I think that it is possible that there may be some sentiment even among tramps, and that they may not like to spend the 1st January in a casual ward, or it may be that on New Year's day people are readier with their money. At any rate, if we may judge from London for which we have long had very minute returns, it is quite clear that the first week in January is by no means the maximum. I have found on the other hand that the 1st July is very often by no means the minimum. London is the only district in which we have had precise statistics, week by week, for the last fifteen years, and we find, that in the fifteen years, 1889–1903, the maximum was seven times in some week in September or October, it was twice in December, twice in the last week of January, twice in February, and once each in March and November. That is to say, in London in all those fifteen years it was not once at the time that we take as representing the maximum. Then again, the minimum was five times in July in these fifteen years, four times in June, four times in the last week of December and the first week in January. What we take as a maximum was a minimum. That is a reversal of the whole thing. Then it was once each in April and September. That is quite enough to show that these returns cannot be depended upon as representing with any accuracy the vagrancy for the year; we can only make a shot at it.

222. (Mr. Davy.) But those returns will no doubt be useful for comparison one year with another?—Those returns will no doubt be useful for comparison one year with another as regards the particular dates. I will put in a return of vagrancy containing all the January and July figures from 1858 to 1904. (Return handed in—see Appendix VI.)

223. (Chairman.) How do the recent figures of vagrancy compare with the early returns?—You will see from the half-yearly returns of vagrants that in 1868, when the population was only about 22,000,000, the number in the July return was 7,946, while in July, 1903, when the population was 33,000,000, it was only 5,121. So, too, in January, 1869, it was 7,020, while in 1900 it was 5,579. I ought to mention that 1900 was a very exceptional year. Vagrancy diminished in all parts of the country, no doubt partly because some casuals went to the war, but also because more took the places of those who had gone to the war, and so on, but it was quite an exceptional year standing by itself.

224. It was also an excellent year for employment?—Yes.

225. (Sir William Chance.) Just now you mentioned the year 1868, and you compared it with 1903, did you not?—Yes.

226. In the year 1868, was not the system of recording vagrants the same as it was previously to the year 1896; and therefore ought you not to take the higher number in 1903 for the purpose of comparison with 1868?—I think not, because the explanation is that the higher figure now admittedly includes all those who breakfasted at one house and supped at another.

227. Was not that so with the figure of 1868?—No; then some masters simply returned the admissions and some gave the double figures; and from a comparison with the return that I mentioned just now—the special return before this question was raised at all—we found that the figures given by the masters in the general return were only from 10 to 12 per cent. in excess of the figures in the special return—in the figures for the single night count; whereas now it is one and three-quarters to one, so that to compare one and three-quarters with one and one-tenth would be illusory, of course. Then it is noticeable that while with the exception of 1900 the July figures for 1903 are lower than any since 1889, those for the 1st January, 1904, are higher than any since 1895. Then, coming to the returns of the present year, a perfectly new system has been started. With the general statistics on pauperism have for the first time been collected, week by week, statistics of vagrancy on a particular night—on Friday of each week—so that now during this year, and for the future, we shall have accurate returns of the occupants of casual wards on the particular day in each week. We have not had that hitherto.

228. You have had accurate returns of the casual paupers in London for some time?—For a long time.

229. But not in the rest of the country?—Not in the rest of the country.

230. (Mr. Davy.) Is there any return showing men, women, and children in London?—We are beginning to get that; we have it for one or two dates.

231. (Sir William Chance.) Then these returns for the Metropolis, which can be relied on for the purpose of comparison, show a very large increase between 1883 and 1903; the number of casuals relieved is doubled?—I am going to discuss that presently. I should just like to point out that in the present year there has been an extraordinary rise in vagrancy, which we could not have known anything about, but for that weekly return which is now obtained. It is really a very remarkable return, because, starting with 8,509 at the beginning of January, the figures rose steadily to 11,441 in the second week of February, dropped to 10,259 in the third week of March, but rose to 11,660 in the second week of April, and to 12,153 in the fourth week of May. Then they dropped steadily to 6,610 in the second week of July, but rose to 11,227 at the beginning of August, and to 12,713 at the end of that month; and after a fall in the middle of September there was a rise to 12,648 in the last week. It is noticeable, as an illustration of the fallacy of judging the amount of vagrancy by striking a mean between the figures on the 1st July and the 1st January, that the result during the present year would be to give about 7,500 as the average, while the weekly returns so far show that it has been about 11,000. I will furnish a diagram showing the weekly fluctuations during this year (see Appendix VI.)

232. (Chairman.) Have you compared that at all with the Board of Trade returns with regard to employment?—No, I have not.

233. (Mr. Davy.) Have you any theory for accounting for the increase?—I think the sudden increase this year is very largely due to the want of employment and the sudden migration of labour. I believe it will be found that there has been some difference in the character of the tramps this year.

234. Might it not be due to the relaxation in the workhouse regulations; or might it not be due to the difficulty of getting convictions owing to the Prison Commissioners' Report?—I am unable to say from actual knowledge that that has been so; it may have been so.

235. Might it not even be due to the appointment of this Committee; I mean to say, that may be an excuse for workhouse masters and guardians not enforcing a series of regulations which may be obsolete?—That may, of course, be so, but I have not enough facts to say it has been so.

236. There are many possible reasons?—Yes.

237. (Sir William Chance.) I suppose the figures for casuals in London would not necessarily follow the line on that diagram?—Not at all; this is for the whole country.

238. If it were possible to get a few types of unions, some where there had been a decrease of vagrancy, others where there had been an increase, one might possibly be able to get at the cause?—That might be so.

239. It might be shown that a relaxation of the stringency in the casual wards was followed by an increase of vagrancy?—I think the return that the Committee has asked for from the boards of guardians will give you considerable information as to that point.

240. (Mr. Simpson.) I gather that, from your point of view, really any reference to the mean before this year is likely to be misleading; you cannot draw large deductions from it?—I think it is likely to be misleading. In any case you are unable to affirm that it is correct.

241. (Dr. Downes.) Taking the January and the July returns, you have told us that up to a certain date many casuals were counted twice over owing to the mode in which the return was made, but that since 1890 returns were obtained of the numbers sleeping on a particular night in casual wards. Have you compared the two sets of figures to see how far we may trust the returns for the previous years as a guide to the trend of vagrancy from time to time?—Yes, I have got out a good many comparisons. Of course, the first thing that brought out that difference was the special return, to which I have already referred, and I found that some masters had given in their statistics people who had gone away in the morning and people who had come in at night, while others had given only the admissions. But that is very different from the present practice, by which they give the two quite separately.

242. But my point is this: accepting it as an undoubted fact that the figures themselves are inaccurate, how far may we trust them as a general indication of the amount of vagrancy in previous years. I will illustrate what I mean by the diagram, which I have shown before. You will see that the true figures of the people sleeping on one night in January shown here corresponds very closely with the curve of the old inaccurate return which is still continued; and, therefore, I suggest that this curve, although the figures themselves are not true figures, shows the drift of vagrancy on the particular night of those years before 1890?—I think it will show the drift of vagrancy.

243. Carrying it on to July, there is not the same correspondence between the true July and the old July numbers, if you look at these two curves?—Quite so. I think you must take it that the present return is not comparable with that before 1890.

244. But I suggest that so far as these curves go the true January curve follows in its shape the inaccurate curve, but the true July curve does not follow in its shape the inaccurate July curve?—That is so.

245. (Mr. Davy.) Then may I take it from you that all our figures have a relative value rather than a positive value?—That is so.

246. And that is so with regard to poor law vagrancy?—Yes.

247. Much more would it be the case with regard to other vagrancy?—Yes.

248. (Dr. Downes.) I think these figures refer only to poor law vagrancy; you have taken no account of vagrancy outside the poor law?—No.

249. (Sir William Chance.) Then is there not a connection between the rise and fall of general pauperism and of pauper vagrancy?—I was just coming to that. Although these figures are in the respects I have pointed out very defective and faulty inherently, at any rate they are the only figures we have got; and from them it is impossible to infer any very close connection between general pauperism and pauper vagrancy. While general pauperism has been pretty steadily going down from 47 per thousand in 1865, to 26 per thousand in 1904, pauper vagrancy has been subject to remarkable fluctuations, with, on the whole, an upward tendency, though till recently this has not been very considerable.

250. Still the curves of pauperism and vagrancy in the diagram you have put in do seem to follow each other to a certain extent?—Well, general pauperism has gone down and vagrancy has gone up. Over those forty years you may trace particular instances where both have been going up; and, on the other hand, you may take a good many where one has been going up and the other has been going down.

251. Take the last two years, there is a steady rise both of general pauperism and vagrancy?—Yes.

252. And there has been a similar descent in both before?—Yes, there are some similarities, especially in recent years.

253. (Mr. Davy.) What is your highest year in vagrancy?—The highest year in vagrancy is 1895 with 8,500; and here we have come to just about the same in 1904.

254. (Sir William Chance.) Your criticisms of the vagrancy returns would apply to the returns of general pauperism, in that you would not get a true mean from the figures of the 1st of July and the 1st of January?—Well, not true, but it would be much more nearly accurate in the case of general pauperism, because there are so many more chronic paupers and fewer abrupt fluctuations.

255. (Dr. Downes.) Are these figures that you have just handed in, in proportion to population, or are they the actual figures?—They are the actual figures.

256. Have you any diagrams drawn out in proportion to population?—No; but I have shown the proportion of general pauperism to the total population.

257. (Mr. Davy.) You are of opinion, are you not, that the general number of paupers is very much dependent on the administration of the Poor Law?—Enormously; whether a district is much pauperised depends not on its poverty, but on its administration. I have not the least doubt as to that.

258. (Chairman.) And that would apply I suppose to vagrants as well as to the general body of paupers?—To a large degree, except that to some extent your number of vagrants depends on what your next door neighbours do with vagrants.

259. Possibly the vagrants would depend not only on the administration of the Poor Law, but on the administration of the Poor Law and the action of the magistrates combined?—Yes.

260. (Mr. Davy.) Then the number of your vagrants depends more on other people than yourselves?—I say you may be treating your vagrants rigorously, you may be detaining them, you may be setting them a hard task, and making things not very comfortable for them, but your neighbouring union may be practically inviting them, and then you are helpless. They do not perhaps avoid you, because they cannot get on to the next easy-going union without coming across you, so they put up with you for a day or two.

261. (Chairman.) Now do you think your vagrancy figures are affected at all by the more complete return of vagrants that you have had of later years?—Yes.

262. I mean that steady rise?—Not materially. The figures before 1891, were perhaps about 10 or 12 per cent. in excess; but subject to that consideration the figures may be treated as fairly representative.

263. London vagrancy has varied very slightly during I believe, the last fifteen years?—Well, in London, for which, as I have already stated, we have long had weekly returns, the average number of casuals relieved on Friday nights in each of the fifteen years, 1889–1903, has varied very little, rising only once above 1,100, and falling only twice below 700, and being generally about 1,000. In London, whatever the system is, for the last fifteen years we have roughly kept the number pretty constant at somewhere about 1,000 on a particular night, on the average of the whole year.

264. (Sir William Chance.) That may be owing to the fact that you have more uniformity of administration in London, which is practically only one union for the treatment of casuals?—That has a great deal to do with it, and perhaps the identification by officers has had still more effect. Although there is little uniformity in London, yet there is much more than in the country, and hence it is that London figures have kept very much as they were. For the last fifteen years, roughly speaking, there has been no big variation, yet the country figures have altered enormously. I have, however, avoided speaking of London, except so far as was absolutely necessary from the historical point of view, and as to figures which I had to bring in as a complement to other figures, as I believe you propose to call special evidence as to London.

265. (Chairman.) Then you have something to say as to the number of vagrant children?—There was a special Parliamentary Return of vagrant children, from 1890 to 1898, in the whole country in January and July on a particular night, and that showed the number to range from a minimum of 164 in January, 1891, to a maximum of 411 in July, 1893. It was during that period about 5 per cent. of the total vagrancy, but there has since been a marked decrease, and the return for the 1st of January, 1904, shows that there were then only 170 children, or 2 per cent. of the whole, and in London the average number of casual children relieved on a single night was 16 in 1901, 19 in 1902, and 13 in 1903. That is an extraordinarily small proportion.

266. When you say vagrant children what limit of age would you put?—Children under sixteen.

267. Do you refer to unprotected children?—Not necessarily; children who were either with their parents, or children who were in the vagrant wards by themselves.

Mr. H. Preston-Thomas.

268. You would include children who were with their 25 Oct. 1904. parents, if these were vagrants?—Quite so.

269. (Sir William Chance.) And they are included in the detailed returns?—Yes.

270. You mentioned the exaggeration in the number of casual paupers relieved in the whole of the country, taking the year's count or the half year's count. I believe the number of vagrant children has been equally exaggerated for the same cause; they have been counted over and over again?—Yes, and we find astounding statements in the newspapers as to the thousands of children wandering, dragged about by their parents, and all that sort of thing—extraordinary exaggeration.

271. You think there will be only a few hundreds at most?—A few hundreds at most.

272. (Chairman.) Now we come to the ages of vagrants?—There was an official return as to the ages of adult vagrants on the 1st of January, 1900, and that gave 283 out of 5,499 as over sixty-five years of age, 67 of these being over seventy. Another return in 1899 showed much the same result, except that I think we found that in the agricultural districts there is rather a larger proportion of old people among the vagrants in summer than in winter. That you might naturally expect; the old folk get into their own workhouses for the winter and go tramping in the summer, and that accounts for rather a larger number of aged people in the summer than in the winter. In order to obtain more precise information in a particular instance, I got out the figures for Exeter workhouse and analysed them as to the whole ages of the vagrants for a year. I took the register of casuals from 1st April, 1903, to 31st March, 1904, and here are my results:—

Men from 16 to 25	-	-	-	-	143
„ „ 26 to 35	-	-	-	-	650
„ „ 36 to 45	-	-	-	-	769
„ „ 46 to 55	-	-	-	-	471
„ „ 56 to 65	-	-	-	-	533
„ over 65	-	-	-	-	130

That brings out a total of - - - 2,696

Then of the women there were:—

From 16 to 55	-	-	-	-	99
„ 56 to 65	-	-	-	-	10
Over 65	-	-	-	-	2

Total - - - - - 111

Of children under sixteen there were 45. Thus 1,562, or more than half, were men under forty-five, and only 130 were men over sixty-five.

273. Evidently they are not a long-lived class?—No.

274. (Mr. Davy.) Would the proportion of vagrants over 65 per 1,000 be less than the average for the population of England?—Possibly.

275. A great deal less than what it would be in some country unions?—The average in my country unions is 71 people over sixty-five per 1,000 of population.

276. Sometimes it goes over 80 per 1,000?—Yes, in one or two counties—Huntingdon, for instance.

277. Do you happen to know the lowest union in your district for persons over sixty-five?—Both Devonport and East Stonehouse have only 45 per 1,000, and at the other end of the scale is Axminster, a purely agricultural union with 94 per 1,000.

278. As to Devonport and East Stonehouse?—Both have special populations.

279. Mechanics and soldiers?—Yes.

280. Your district generally has a rate of 71 per 1,000 over sixty-five?—Yes.

281. Whereas, your tramps would give far less?—Yes, about 48 per 1,000. But in the population of Lancashire there are only 33 per 1,000 that are over sixty-five.

282. Of course, we are relying upon the statement of the tramps themselves as to their age?—Yes.

283. (Dr. Downes.) When the tramp falls sick he may

Mr. H.
Preston-
Thomas.

25 Oct. 1904.

be taken into the workhouse and would then be counted as an ordinary inmate?—That is so, but I take it the proportion is so small that it would not vitiate your figures very much.

284. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you think there is any reason for a tramp to give his age either older or younger, than it really is?—I expect he may be inclined to give it older in order that if he is believed he may get an easier task, or be let off a task.

285. There is nothing very positive that way?—No; I think that that would be the only reason that would tend to make him give his age as higher than it is.

286. Then really, so to speak, the youth of tramps is perhaps even greater than what you said?—I should think so.

287. (Mr. Davy.) Anyway, the great proportion of the tramps as a rule are men in the able-bodied period of life?—Yes; they are men in the able-bodied period of life, but an enormous proportion of them are handicapped somehow or other. Some are handicapped by the effects of years of drink, some are partly paralysed, some have this or that disability, and most of them have the great disability of hating work of any sort or kind, and not being used to it, and not having any aptitude for it.

288. (Chairman.) Then as to the women?—The return for the 1st January, 1904, shows that women were rather less than one-tenth of the whole number of admissions, but in London the proportion is about one-fifth. The proportion of both women and children is rather larger in summer than in winter.

289. Can you give a reason for that?—It is easier for women and children to go about the country in summer; and a good many women and children go hop-picking, and so on.

290. Now take women and children who are accompanying or following after the bread-winner; are they ticked down as tramps?—Yes.

291. Unless they have got any settled place of abode or any place to sleep in?—Yes.

292. Although they are on their road to the hop garden?—If they are relieved in the casual ward, they are reckoned as tramps.

293. (Sir William Chance.) Has there been a decrease of recent years in the number of women relieved as tramps?—Yes.

294. As well as of children?—Yes. To some extent, not very much.

295. (Chairman.) Is that accounted for in any way; do the husbands leave them at home?—I cannot say. I have not got any old returns as to sex; but I infer from various things—I would rather give it as an opinion than as anything that I could substantiate by precise statistics—that the proportion has decreased.

296. Does not the return of 1899, which classified men, women and children, show a reduction?—Yes, it shows some reduction.

297. Now, can you give any statistics as to the total number of tramps?—As to the average number of vagrants in England on a given day, using that word "vagrant" as including all persons without fixed habitation, while "casual" is, according to the definition in the Act of 1871, "any destitute wayfarer or wanderer applying for or receiving relief"—estimates varying from 20,000 to 150,000 have been published. According to the Census of 1901, the number of persons who spent the night of the 31st March in barns and sheds was 1,645, and in caravans, tents and the open air was 12,574, being together 14,219. Well, of course that includes a great number of persons who are in no sense tramps. For example, there are the gipsies and pedlars with caravans, also many persons who, though passing a particular night in the open air, are not habitually homeless, so a very large deduction has to be made from those figures in estimating the number of vagrants. And to these must be added a proportion of the persons in common lodging-houses and most of those in refuges and in similar institutions; and here the census does not help us at all. As regards London, all I can find is that the common lodging-houses have accommodation for about 29,000 people, including 3,200 in shelters and refuges, which by a recent decision now have to be registered as common lodging-houses. In times of pressure I suppose nearly all these are occupied, but we do not know anything about them. Before 1868 the police used to make returns of all persons who spent a particular night in April of each year in casual wards, common lodging-houses, or the open air. The figure of 1st April, 1868, was 36,179, or just about six times the number of casuals on 1st January, 1868. Then you have to remember that 1868 was before the time when casuals were at all systematically dealt with, and therefore it is not worth much, but of course a considerable proportion of the inmates of common lodging-houses were not tramps. Then I have some statistics from the chief constable of Gloucestershire. He has published detailed statistics extending from 1883 to 1902, with regard to the persons sleeping (a) in casual wards, and (b) in common lodging-houses in the administrative county on a night in April. In those twenty years the aggregate number of casuals was 2,032 (101 per day), while the inmates of common lodging-houses numbered 8,593 (430 per day), of whom about one-third were known as residents. Of course, in common lodging-houses there is a pretty good lot of men who are moderately frequent workers. They do not take the trouble of getting quarters of their own, and they live there from month to month. Then a great number are pedlars, itinerant musicians, people of that kind, and it is very difficult to say how many can be reckoned as vagrants. But the basis on which the chief constable of Gloucestershire discriminated was that they were strangers to the place or not strangers, and he found that one-third of his common lodging-house inmates were not strangers and that two-thirds might be reckoned as such.

298. (Sir William Chance.) Two-thirds were strangers?—Yes, two-thirds were strangers, one-third residents.

299. (Dr. Downes.) Have you taken note of the census which was made recently by the London county council in the central parts of London of the houseless people on a particular night?—No, I have not seen it.

300. (Chairman.) What have you to tell us as to the localisation of vagrancy?—There is some difficulty in forming a basis for any estimate as to whether tramping is specially prevalent in this or that part of the country. Broadly speaking, we find on the figures for the 1st of January, 1904, there were 249 casuals per 1,000,000 in England and Wales, that the proportion was highest in Westmorland, according to the population, lowest in Cornwall, high in Berks, Surrey and Kent, and particularly low in Essex and Devon. That is on population. A calculation has also been made on another basis, that is to say, by dividing the number of vagrants by the number of casual wards in the particular county, by saying that there are so many casual wards in this county, and such and such is the average per casual ward. The statement which I have here (see Appendix VI.) shows for each county the figures on the 1st January and 1st July for a period of eight years (1897–1904), and we find that the average number of casuals in each union of the country has been 11 on the 1st January and 9 on the 1st July. It will be seen that London stands at one end of the January figures with 30 casuals in each casual ward, and is followed by Lancashire and Westmorland each with 28, and Surrey with 24. At the other end, as having the fewest casuals, are North Wales with 4 and Cornwall with only one casual per union. But I am not sure that it is worth very much.

301. (Mr. Davy.) The average number per casual ward falls as low as 4 in North Wales, while in Cornwall it is only one. In each case there is some building for use as a casual ward and expense is incurred?—Yes.

302. And there is an officer?—Yes; but not necessarily an officer specially appointed or paid for the duty. In some of the Cornish unions the accommodation is very rough. When they have hardly any tramps you cannot force them to go to much expense in providing casual wards.

303. If there were no casual wards, there would be no poor law vagrants?—But the really destitute wayfarer would have to be relieved.

SECOND DAY.

Wednesday, 26th October, 1904.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair).

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.
Captain SHOWERS.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary).

Mr. H. PRESTON-THOMAS, recalled; and further Examined.

304. (Chairman.) You kindly gave us yesterday a historical account up to the present time of the dealings with vagrancy. Have you anything to add to that?—It does not occur to me that I have anything to add at the present time except to say that I am very much indebted to a paper, which has not hitherto been published, by Sir William Chance, which he kindly let me utilise, and which gave me a great many of the facts and put me on the track of other facts which I laid before you yesterday. I omitted to say yesterday that I am very much indebted to him.

305. No doubt you verified the information from official statistics?—In all cases.

306. Now, would you give us some information as to the want of uniformity in casual wards as regards diet, detention, and task?—Well, for a great many years the Central Department has insisted in its Circulars to boards of guardians, and in other ways, on the necessity for uniformity in dealing with casuals, but the Orders issued have been such as to make diet, detention, and, within a very wide range, task, matters of local option. In London the nearest approach to uniformity has been secured, with the result that, for many years, in spite of the increase of population, there has been no substantial increase of casuals. But even in London, as Mr. Lockwood's report just published shows, various boards of guardians have been allowed to do very much as they like.

307. And as the result of that has there been considerable want of uniformity?—Yes. It is just a chance how a tramp is treated in the next union to which he goes.

308. Although, as I understand, there is much more uniformity in the Metropolis than there is outside?—There is certainly a good deal more there than outside, but even there the variations are very considerable.

309. Is your suggestion, as far as it goes, that there should be every possible approach to uniformity?—That, no doubt, is one great point for the consideration of the Committee.

310. And you think that the result of that would be in all probability a decrease in the number of casuals?—That is my own opinion.

311. Yes; I am asking for your opinion founded on your long experience?—Of course I am not authorised to express an opinion on behalf of the Local Government Board; I am only giving for them a statement on matters of fact. If I am asked a particular question I will give my individual opinion.

312. Well, now, is it your opinion that, where there has been a further approach to uniformity, there has been a decrease in the number of casuals?—I think that would almost necessarily result; and I conclude that that is the view of the Local Government Board generally, because in all their Circulars they have advocated uniformity, though they have not seen their way hitherto to enforce it.

313. (Mr. Davy.) Are there not inherent difficulties in the way of uniformity; for instance, in the task—stones vary very much in hardness, do they not?—That is so.

314. Therefore the Board have to sanction tasks with varying weights of stones?—Under the present system of task, yes.

315. Under the present system of task, the quantity of stones which can be broken by an average man would vary from a couple of hundredweight of hard granite to a ton of soft sandstone?—Unquestionably, a man finds it much easier to break half a ton of the sandstone that we get in Exeter than a couple of hundredweight of the granite that we get in Cornwall.

316. Take flint, which is a common thing?—That is very variable.

317. There is a considerable difference between field flints and pit flints?—There is an enormous difference in flints.

318. Therefore, in sanctioning tasks of labour the Board have to look at local conditions?—Certainly.

319. And that is at once an element of uncertainty or want of uniformity in the procedure?—That is so.

320. Your remedy is?—Not task work so much as time work; a work sufficient to occupy an individual vagrant thoroughly during the day, but not necessarily a task that he must accomplish and then may rest after accomplishing it.

321. In point of fact, if a man did his best for a certain number of hours that would be, in your judgment, a better task than a task by measure?—That would be so in my judgment.

322. But there again there would be an element of want of uniformity, would there not, in the judgment of the officer, whether the man was doing his best?—Certainly, you get the human equation everywhere.

323. (Sir William Chance.) The Local Government Board for years, and the Poor Law Board before them, have always been insisting in their Circulars on uniformity in task, dietary, and other matters?—That is so.

324. One knows as a matter of fact that every board of guardians takes a different view of this question. Now, do you think that it would be possible under the present system of leaving the relief of the casuals practically entirely to the guardians to secure uniformity?—I do not think it possible to secure absolute uniformity, but I think by a change a nearer approach to uniformity might be secured. Of course you will never get away from the personal equation, and from the fact that one superintendent of casual wards or workhouse master has very different ideas from another as to what is a sufficient day's work; but I think that you would get rather less marked differences than in the present system under which the prescribed task is very small at one union, and very large at another.

325. (Mr. Simpson.) Should you suppose over the country generally stone breaking forms the bulk of the work done in casual wards?—A very large proportion in such districts as I am acquainted with. My districts have been mainly agricultural; and in those, stone breaking has certainly been the chief task; but where the workhouse has a garden some digging is done; where there is a town with customers for firewood, sawing or wood chopping is introduced, but no doubt in the main you would find more stone breaking than anything else.

326. With wood cutting and oakum picking, would it not be much more possible to have uniformity?—Well, I am very much against oakum picking altogether.

327. Is it not very difficult sometimes to get other work; there is a considerable amount of oakum picking still done, is there not, in the casual wards?—Not very much. It has been very much reduced of late years. I have persistently advised all my boards of guardians against it, and I do not think it is used in any of my workhouses except now and then for a very old man who cannot do anything else.

328. (Mr. Davy.) As a matter of fact, is not oakum picking a task in which it is very difficult to insure uniformity, because the tramp may be allowed to use a "fiddle" or a "finger," and to warm his oakum on the hot water pipes, or he may be obliged to pick it without any of these aids?—Quite so.

329. In the latter case the task would be very much more difficult, would it not?—Yes.

330. (Mr. Simpson.) What is your objection to oakum picking?—I think it is pretty generally agreed that it has a penal air about it. Then it is absolutely wasteful. Now that wooden ships are no longer built you do not want oakum, and the oakum when it is picked very often sells for less than the old junk before it was picked. You cannot have anything more futile than that; and a futile task is a very bad thing for a casual or for anybody.

331. The Committee then can rather disregard that as a task; that is to say, it ought to be abolished?—Yes. I think so.

332. And there is a possibility of it being reduced to an inconsiderable quantity?—It is likely to become obsolete.

333. (Mr. Davy.) Would not the ideal task be one which would be quite unskilled?—Yes.

334. And rather irksome and laborious?—Yes, that is about it.

335. (Dr. Downes.) Do you find in any of your workhouses that they use specially prepared oakum as a surgical dressing?—I do not think I have any oakum picking in any of my workhouses. They have abolished it generally, and it is a negligible quantity really so far as my experience goes, but then I have scarcely any big town workhouses.

336. (Chairman.) Now would you kindly give us some information as to diet?—In many provincial workhouses the tramp gets nothing but half a pound of bread with cold water for supper and breakfast; in others (including all metropolitan casual wards) he gets six ounces of bread with a pint of gruel for breakfast and six ounces of bread with a pint of either gruel or broth for supper; his dinner in all cases being half a pound of bread and one and a half ounces of cheese—a very small bit of cheese; or six ounces of bread and a pint of soup, but this latter is rarely given. Then suppose we compare the food of a man who has been four days in the casual ward with that of a man who gets four days in prison. We find that the casual has half a pound of bread at breakfast and the same at supper; he gets nothing else; while the prisoner also gets a pint of cocoa for breakfast and a pint of porridge for supper on the first day, and a pint of gruel on each of the other days in addition. For dinner the casual probably gets half a pound of bread and one and a half ounces of cheese on each of the four days; while the prisoner gets three-quarters of a pound of bread and a quarter of a pound of meat on the first day, and half a pound of bread, with the addition of either a pint of porridge, half a pound of suet pudding, or half a pound of potatoes on each of the other days. He has all these things more than the man in the casual ward; and that is a premium for him to go to the prison instead of to the casual ward.

337. Is that the case with the seven-day prisoner?—Yes.

338. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) It depends on what time of the day the man arrives at the prison; he would get his mid-day meal at the police-station; it is only on the actual day of reception that he gets the admission diet?—Yes, it is on the actual day of reception.

339. But he would never arrive before breakfast?—I suppose not.

340. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you suppose many people coming from the vagrant wards are committed to prison in time to get the breakfast on the first day of admission?—I should think not, but the breakfast is a small part; there are the other two meals; the dinner is the great thing.

341. If he does not come to the prison until after dinner time?—We have just heard that if he does not get the dinner at the prison, he gets it at the police station; as a rule he would get it somehow.

342. (Chairman.) That is to say, if he is apprehended before dinner-time?—Yes, you see that gives him a very nice impression of the prison to start with—that instead of getting his $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of bread with a scrap of cheese and cold water, he gets a good square meal of $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of bread and $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. of meat, and then he goes on pleasantly to a supper in the evening, which is also much better than he gets in the casual ward.

343. Were you speaking of the seven-day diet or the diet for a longer period?—I was speaking of the seven-day diet; I took it from the tables, which were issued by Mr. Ritchie, when Home Secretary, in May, 1901.

344. (Mr. Davy.) You have taken the case of a man detained four days in the workhouse; are not these cases very rare?—Yes.

345. Do you ever come across a man who is detained for four days?—Oh, yes.

346. But it is rare?—It is rare. But, whenever the Order of 1882 is enforced, a very large number of casuals are detained for three nights, since Sunday is not reckoned.

347. And your hypothetical casual is compared with the man who gets three days' imprisonment?—Yes.

348. That is not a common sentence, is it?—Yes, I should say, three days is. I have heard of a great many cases in which, to my surprise, three days has been given.

349. Do you think the improved prison diet has had any effect on the number of convictions of casuals?—In the two years 1899 and 1900 the number of convictions of inmates in London casual wards averaged 535. In 1901 the improved scale of dietaries was introduced, and it is significant that the convictions in the two years, 1902 and 1903, averaged 924. That is to say, a rise to 924 from 535.

350. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Was there not a great deal of screwing up of the administration in the casual wards in that period; would not that account for the increase?—There was no change whatever in administration that I am aware of.

351. Were there not more stringent Circulars at that time?—No, I think not. I have tried to account for it in any other way. There were no Circulars issued during that year so far as I know, and there was nothing on earth to account for it, except that they liked the better food of the prison. That may not be the reason, but it is the only reason that I can find, and it is a very strong inference when you find the numbers nearly double between the two years before and the two years after.

352. (Mr. Simpson.) I should like to point out, if I may, that the diet on the first day of admission was not altered by the dietary of May, 1901. It was introduced, I think, in 1892?—Indeed.

353. So far, therefore, as the diet on the first day is concerned, that would not really have a bearing?—Not upon these particular prosecutions.

354. (Mr. Davy.) You are dealing with the Metropolis alone?—Yes.

355. (Chairman.) Then the convictions referred to would be, I take it, in the Metropolitan police courts?—Yes. The convictions, for instance, in the two years before 1901, for destroying clothes were 59 and 46; in the two years after they were 80 and 100. In the two years before, the convictions for refusal to work were 253 and 239; in the two years after, they were 496 and 633; and that is very striking, because the refusal to work is the particular offence which the man would commit if he wanted to go to prison.

356. Could you tell us what was the average length of sentence for those?—That I cannot; I only noted the convictions without particulars of the sentences.

✓ 357. Do you think the London casuals would want to go to prison?—These casuals are going round and round; they spend their whole time nearly in casual wards; therefore, their food is the food of the casual wards; that is their habitual diet, but they get their puddings and one thing and another in prison. If they want a week's rather better food they go to prison to get it, some of them.

358. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Are there any earlier years which have anything like 900 convictions?—The previous years, going backwards from 1901, are 504, 565, 601, 568, 608, 651; then in 1894 there is a higher lot—785; but that does not approach the two last years, you see.

359. It shows a great variety—700 down to 500?—Yes, but there was a very big jump in those last two years. Taking the period of ten years, it seemed to me that, looking down the figures, you could not help coming to the conclusion that something happened in 1901; and the only thing that I find did happen in 1901 to make these convictions more numerous was that there was a better dietary in prison.

360. (Mr. Davy.) Even excluding the fact that the first day's dietary had not been altered?—Was very much better, even excluding that fact.

361. Are you going to give us any figures with regard to the country generally?—No, they are not available, I am afraid.

362. (Dr. Downes.) I do not know, whether in your earlier evidence you referred to the Order of 1887 with regard to the dietary of Metropolitan casuals?—I intended to include it in my enumeration. The Order was dated 3rd November, 1887. It abolished, so far as London was concerned, the bread and water diet for breakfast and supper, and required gruel or broth to be given.

363. (Chairman.) Have you a note as to the cost of the casuals' diet?—The actual cost of the minimum dietary of the tramp detained two days, taking bread at 4½d. per quarter and cheese at 5d. a pound, is for 2½ lbs. of bread rather less than 3d.; and 1½ oz. of cheese about ¼d.; the total, 3½d. If he is allowed gruel with only 6 ozs. of bread instead of 8 oz. for breakfast and supper, he consumes 8 ozs. of oatmeal (2 ozs. of oatmeal to a pint of gruel), which costs only a small fraction more than the bread saved. If he is allowed broth for supper the cost is infinitesimally higher, but the total amount will not in any case be much above 4d. for his five meals,—that is to say, his supper on the day of arrival, his breakfast, dinner, and supper on the day of detention and his breakfast next morning.

364. For the whole time, 4d.?—Yes. To this must be added a proportion, which it is impossible to estimate accurately, of the establishment expenses, repairs, and interest on original cost of casual wards. In the workhouses of large towns one or two labour masters may be employed exclusively for the superintendence of the vagrant; in rural workhouses this function is generally discharged by the workhouse porter. So, too, in an urban union the assistant relieving officer for vagrants is appointed and may be paid a tolerable salary for his work, perhaps exclusively or almost exclusively employed in that, but in a rural union an allowance of £3 or £4 a year or some small sum is made to a sergeant of police or somebody else. Of course there are many complaints against the present system, but I think that no complaints can be made against the cost, if you can keep a man for 4d. for a couple of days; you cannot do it cheaper anyhow.

365. In that cost you are taking in not only the cost of the food and the cooking, but the cost of the maintenance of the casual ward?—I am unable to give any figures for that, but that has to be considered.

366. (Mr. Davy.) Have you anything further to mention on this dietary question?—I have two or three things more to say about it. First, the able-bodied man in the workhouse proper has a far better diet than either the casual or short time prisoner, including a luncheon of bread and cheese, if engaged in work, in addition to three other meals. The fact is that the dietary both for prisons and for workhouses has been made very much more liberal in the course of the last twenty years, while the diet of casuals has remained much the same as it was when it was established in 1882. The only exceptions are that in London it has been made more or less uniform, and as to children it has been made rather better; they must give milk to children under seven; but, bar that, it has remained the same for twenty years and the others have been improved. That is, I think, the long and the short of it.

367. The ordinary vagrant who is detained two nights gets bread and water or bread and cheese, does he not?—Yes.

368. The diet is not fixed for a longer period than the one day on which he is detained?—Well, he is detained a day and a half.

369. It is fixed for that period. The Board have never regarded what the man is likely to get on the other days of the week, have they?—No, they have not.

370. The vagrant admitted on Monday night is discharged on the Wednesday morning?—Yes.

371. Then supposing he goes on to another vagrant ward that day, he would have supper there?—Yes.

372. There is no mid-day meal?—No, except in the few counties that have provided for that by voluntary efforts.

373. How can the man get the mid-day meal—he must beg or steal, unless he gets a casual job?—Yes.

374. Supposing he does not break the law or get a casual job, he would starve, would he not?—Well, he would have to walk fifteen miles probably on a small piece of bread for breakfast, and I do not know anything harder to do than that; I have tried it.

375. Of course, in time he would not have enough to live on?—No, and I know a case which one of my colleagues lately mentioned, of an habitual tramp who lived on bread. He was a beggar and he practically lived on bread so constantly that the doctor reported that he broke down with scurvy and that the scurvy was due to a constant bread diet. Whether that was correct or not I do not know, but that was the medical diagnosis.

376. But those cases would be very rare, would they not?—Very rare.

377. In your judgment are tramps an ill-fed class; do they look ill-fed?—No, not on the whole. There are sorry specimens.

378. In your experience is it not often the case, when tramps are searched on coming into a workhouse, that broken food is found on them?—Yes, and they will not take food when it is given to them, they are evidently so well fed before. The other day somebody asked a man, "How do you like your supper in the workhouse?" He said, "Oh, I do not care twopence about my supper in the workhouse; I always take jolly good care to have a good supper before I go in!" That was from the proceeds of his begging.

379. Now, what is the procedure with workhouse masters generally; do they take that food away or do they allow the man to eat it?—I should say in country workhouses, where rules are not very rigidly kept, they let the man eat it.

380. Is it your experience that if the food is taken away and the man is confined to the workhouse diet, the number of tramps decreases?—I should think that would very likely be so, but I have not got such an instance in my mind that I could say "Yes" to that.

381. Do workhouse masters tell you that tramps come into the casual wards full of liquor; not actually drunk, but full of liquor?—Yes, many of them.

382. That they evidently had spent their money having a drink?—With their last 3d., instead of taking it to the doss-house and getting a bed there, they have got more drink and come to the casual ward.

383. Have you any experience of a workhouse which has introduced hot gruel instead of bread and cheese; what is the effect on the numbers?—I do not know of any such case.

384. Does not the number of vagrants go up if there is the slightest relaxation of diet?—That is so.

385. There are great difficulties in the matter of diet?—Enormous difficulties. No doubt, if you make the diet better you attract more tramps, unless at the same time

Preston-
Thomas.*

Preston-
Thomas.

you make the work more constant and more universal for every tramp that comes. But I think you may improve your diet without making your number of tramps bigger, if you alter the working conditions.

386. Have you formed any idea whether there is any large number of tramps who go straight from workhouse to workhouse ; do they not go to a workhouse one or two nights and then go one or two nights to a common lodging-house, and then take the workhouse again ?—No ; I should say not. I should say that many of them go from workhouse to workhouse. In many places with which I am familiar there are no lodging-houses at all for them. Some men are driven to the casual ward for that reason.

387. (Mr. Simpson.) Unless they sleep out ?—Yes, unless they sleep out. I think they are less fond of sleeping out than they used to be ; I do not know whether they are getting softer, but I do not believe they sleep out so often.

388. (Sir William Chance.) If a mid-day meal was provided for tramps, do you think it would stop cadging and begging on the roads ?—I think it might in some degree check indiscriminate almsgiving. Nothing on earth will stop people from titillating their own sense of benevolence by giving when they can do so without any trouble ; but it might in some degree teach people to be more sensible in that matter if they knew that every tramp had a mid-day meal within reach, and although I quite think if you gave it to him at the workhouse door he would often throw it over the hedge, yet, if no better plan can be found, I would even give him the opportunity of throwing it over the hedge rather than discharge him as at present and say to him in effect—you have got to walk fifteen miles and you must break the law or else starve.

389. But you have no evidence actually to show that the mid-day meal does induce the so-called charitable public to give less than they would otherwise give ?—That is a thing upon which you cannot bring actual evidence and statistics, but it is said that this has been one of the advantages in the counties where they have established it.

390. That is what I wanted to get at. In Gloucestershire, for instance, has it stopped this almsgiving ?—It is very difficult to say, but I have heard so. You see it is a sort of matter in which you cannot have very definite evidence as to how much has been given away or what has been the effect.

391. And in Dorset they have a similar system, have they not ; they provide a mid-day meal and give tickets ?—Yes. You had better have that from the chief constable of Dorset, as to what effect it has had ; but my own impression is that in some places it has rather discounted the plea, “I must beg or else I must starve” by supplying the answer, “No, you need not beg and you need not starve because you can get a mid-day meal at so-and-so.” I think that fact would make a difference to any people who consider before they give.

392. And I may take it that you are generally in favour of a mid-day meal being provided in some way or other for tramps ?—Personally, I am in favour of the offer of a mid-day meal.

393. (Mr. Davy.) The mid-day meal would be of necessity bread, would it not ?—Probably, or bread and cheese.

394. Then it would be assuming a sort of responsibility for the dietary of the tramp for a period longer than a day, and it would be giving him a diet which would be improper for a lengthened period, viz., nothing but bread ?—It would be very hard to give, no doubt, a meal that would be sufficient if it were to be a permanent meal day after day, and I am afraid you could never reconcile theory and practice in the matter at all, but as a way of simply meeting that particular charge, I should like them to have the option of a mid-day meal.

395. Well, the mid-day meal to an able-bodied man would be relief to an able-bodied man without work, would it not ?—No ; because he would have to walk a good way to get it.

396. I am assuming it is given him at the door of the workhouse before his walk ?—Well, I suppose it would be open to that theoretical objection.

397. You know the objection has been made ?—Yes, I am aware of that.

398. And that has influenced the Local Government Board ?—Of course, I am not pretending to make any suggestion on behalf of the Local Government Board.

399. (Chairman.) Might there not be another process by which you might give the man the mid-day meal ; might he not be allowed to eat something before he leaves the workhouse, if he wishes to do so, without taking it away from him ?—But he is discharged quite early in the morning.

400. At what time ?—At 5.30 in summer and 6.30 in winter.

401. I was thinking of the man who stayed there till 11 o'clock, having done his two or three hours of work. Surely, it would seem rather more reasonable that that man should have some refreshment before he leaves the workhouse ?—Yes, but in the bulk of cases if you have detention for two nights you would discharge the man early and he gets his breakfast. That, I think, is the objection to giving him anything at the door of the workhouse. You might, of course, adopt the plan of letting him get something either by an order on a baker's shop, or at a police station. Those are variations of the way-ticket system.

402. (Mr. Davy.) But in any case, if the co-operation of the police is a part of the system of mid-day meals that is a great advantage ?—An enormous advantage.

403. The police could co-operate with the poor law authorities ?—Yes ; the more I see of it the more I recognise the importance of bringing the police into close relation with the poor law authorities on this whole matter. It is a thing that is so much mixed up. We do not object to the tramp qua casual, or because he costs us anything ; we get rid of him easily enough ; he is not very much trouble. We object to him qua beggar, because he is a nuisance and infests the roads and threatens women and insists on having food when their husbands are absent, and all that sort of thing. We object to him because of his offences against the law and not because of the cost of his relief, which is really insignificant.

404. He is a police nuisance rather than a poor law nuisance ?—That is so.

405. (Dr. Downes.) Under the Order of 1882, I think there is an alternative for the bread and cheese dinner for the man who is detained more than one night, viz., a dinner of bread and soup ?—Yes ; six ounces of bread and a pint of soup.

406. Made of the same ingredients as workhouse soup ?—Yes.

407. According to the Dietary Order, the ingredients for pea soup in the workhouse are to each pint, three ounces of raw beef free from bone, two ounces of bones, two ounces of split peas, half an ounce of oatmeal, one ounce of vegetables, salt, pepper, and herbs to taste ?—That is so.

408. It is an excellent soup ?—Yes.

409. Do you find that given in the casual ward at all ?—Not very much, at any rate in the country : I contrasted expressly the minimum that the guardians might give with what the prison did give. Most boards of guardians, I think, give bread and cheese only.

410. But they might give this very excellent soup if they chose ?—They can, yes ; but then they cut him off, mind you, two ounces of his bread, whereas the prisoner gets his soup and gets his $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of bread.

411. Have you referred in your evidence to the Order of 1897 for the children of casuals ?—I just mentioned it, as being the only Order that improved the dietary of casuals.

412. I think that Order prescribes a very liberal allowance of milk ?—Yes ; that is very good for the children ; only the children are an insignificant part of the whole number of vagrants.

413. Do you think this Order has increased the number of vagrant children in any way ?—Not to my knowledge.

414. I think you gave us evidence to the contrary ?—The number of children has dropped decidedly.

415. The numbers have dropped since that was introduced ?—The numbers have dropped.

416. (Chairman.) Have you anything to add on the subject of diet?—What I had intended to add as to the general question was that any improvement in dietary doubtless tends to attract men to the casual ward, but it has to be considered whether that fact justifies the maintenance of a scale which is not only much inferior to that of prisoners, but is quite insufficient to work upon and does not contain either the vegetable or the fatty constituents which science regards as essential for health and for strength. I admit that it is not a continuous life in the casual wards; but you can scarcely call it a continuous life in prison when such terms as three days' and seven days' imprisonment are in question.

417. Now we come to the question of the detention of casuals?—The Local Government Board regulations allow the boards of guardians to give directions for the discharge of any class or classes of casual paupers before the expiration of the periods specified in the Act of 1882, and in a very large proportion of unions this power has been exercised, not merely with respect to particular classes, but to all classes of casuals, so as to discharge them on the morning after arrival, after a task, calculated on a maximum of three hours' work, and often made merely nominal. I think I said something to the same effect yesterday in answer to particular questions.

418. (Sir William Chance.) The discretion has become a rule, practically, in the country?—I should think rigid detention of all casuals, but those actually going to a job, is the exception. And the practice as to the detention for four days of persons who have been twice during a month in the same casual ward varies considerably, but is rarely carried out with strictness.

419. (Chairman.) What is your own opinion with regard to the four days' detention in casual wards; does it not seem to be more like an imprisonment?—Yes, that is so.

420. And would it not be better if the men were committed to prison rather than occupying the casual wards for that time?—Except that there are so many objections to sending men to gaol for short terms; and I do not think that the four days' detention is a matter as to which much objection has been raised.

421. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Does it not put an enormous power in the hands of the workhouse master?—He makes them work under the regulations; they have got to do the work like the tramp detained for only two days. I do not think there is very much difference. After all, the workhouse master must be more or less of an autocrat. We may go and inspect, but he it is that regulates the labour and dispenses with the particular tasks.

422. And with the four days?—Yes.

423. Without reference to the guardians?—Yes.

424. (Chairman.) There is some identification of habituels in London?—In London 17,363 identifications of casuals were made during last year by the visiting officers; that is to say, they were recognised as habitual tramps, and 13,748 of these were detained for four days. Of course, those figures ought to be read with the knowledge that those were not so many different individuals, but the same cases were over and over again identified, and over and over again detained for four days.

425. Have you any information as to how often the same men were identified, in the course, say, of twelve months?—I have not.

426. (Mr. Davy.) As matter of fact this four days' detention is mainly in the Metropolis?—Yes.

427. There is no one to identify tramps all over the country?—No; no identification system at all.

428. So long as he does not go to the same casual ward he is free from the operation of the Act?—In London he may go to Islington, and the next night be spotted at Hammersmith, identified, and detained for the four days; but, of course, in the country there is no such identification, and it is a question whether combination between police and workhouse officers might not result in some system of identification by police, such as is carried out in London by special officers.

429. (Chairman.) Now what have you to say as regards uniformity of tasks, and especially as to stone breaking and oakum picking?—As to the character and amount of the task, there is scarcely any uniformity, as I have already said; nor indeed is this practicable, as long as piece-work is the one alternative and stone breaking and oakum picking are the work. The great objection to both these tasks is that they are more or less skilled labour. We set two able-bodied men to break the same stone to the same size, and the novice will take twice the time that the old hand will take, and even knowledge of local stones comes out as to that. I was in North Devon the other day where they break boulders from the beach. Well, these boulders from the beach have a special set in the stone. The man that knows the dodge of that would break them as quickly as possible. On the other hand I found a man who knew nothing about the way of these stones, and he was hammering at them, and the chips were flying about, and after a time he got a sort of stone ball, with little bits off all round it—no good at all. That is simply an illustration that it may be quite skilled labour. And then, as Mr. Davy said just now, a man would sooner break half a ton of sandstone than 1 cwt. or 2 cwt. of granite, or anything of that sort. Then oakum picking is open to the same sort of objection, for the material varies very much in hardness. It is very trying to unaccustomed fingers. It makes men's fingers bleed sometimes, and while the old hand, who knows the dodges, gets through it with ease, yet it is horribly monotonous work; it is futile and it is costly; it has every disadvantage, I think. On broken stones now and then there is some profit in some places. For instance, in Exeter, where I happen to live, the Town Council haul the stone to the workhouse, and each vagrant cracks half a ton; it is a soft sort of stone. The Town Council take it away, and pay the guardians a shilling for each ton cracked; that is sixpence for the work of each vagrant. That more than pays for the vagrants' food, such as it is, so they actually make a profit. I believe in London some of the riverside unions, where they get Guernsey granite brought by barge very nearly alongside the workhouse, make a little money—or at any rate do not lose much—by stone breaking. But the ones that have to cart it right up to, say, Kensington or Islington, or wherever it may be, find that it costs them a good deal. Not that it matters very much to them, because in London the expense of casuals is a metropolitan and not a union charge. It has been said that what is wanted is some purely unskilled work which is rather tedious than exhausting, and perhaps the work which best satisfies this requirement is either corn grinding, of which an average man can do from 90 lbs. to 120 lbs. a day, or pounding flint with something like a large pestle and mortar. The objection to the former is that the mills are rather expensive; but the rammers for stone pounding are quite cheap, and for pounded flint there is a ready demand for paths for gardens and from chicken fanciers, who use the stuff a good deal. Of course some men blister their hands over it, and that is a drawback. There are a good many malingerers who blister their hands on purpose, and when taken up for refusing to work, they show the blisters, which they can make in a very short time, and which they very easily get rid of; and a sympathetic magistrate dismisses the case. It is doubtless difficult to prescribe a task which has so many varying factors—the hardness of the flint, the size to which it has to be pounded, and the capacity of the individual man. It will be noted that only as regards stone breaking and oakum picking is there a task which has to be prescribed under the Order; with respect to all other labour, nine hours' work is put down in digging, or cutting wood, or grinding corn, or any other approved labour, and it is worth consideration whether some modification should not be made in the conditions of the labour in the direction I have indicated.

430. What happens in the case of the inability of a vagrant to do the task?—The Order exempts from task every casual pauper suffering from any permanent or temporary infirmity of body, and also provides that a person shall not be required to perform the whole, or any part, of such a task or work, if it shall appear that the same is not suited to his age, strength or capacity.

431. I take it the workhouse doctor has to certify their condition?—Yes.

432. It would not be a question for the master; it would be a question for the doctor?—If a man says he cannot perform his task the doctor is, I think, invariably called in, unless the master yields at once and sees that the man is weak and sets him to do something else. They

- Mr. H. Preston-Thomas.* constantly do this—not in strictest accordance with the regulations; they give him a light job about the place. That happens every day.
- 26 Oct. 1904. 433. Is corn grinding frequently resorted to in workhouses?—Not in the country unions; I believe that it is in a good many of the big town unions, especially in the North country.
434. That has, I think you will probably agree with me, the virtue of being work which has some satisfactory result?—Yes.
435. Instead of being useless work?—Quite so.
436. I do not know whether you are aware that a prisoner will much more willingly do work which he knows has some result than, say, turn a crank which only has the effect of lifting a weight up and down?—That is certainly so as regards tramps; tramps hate useless work.
437. (Mr. Simpson.) The actual work of a corn mill would be turning a handle, I suppose?—Yes.
438. (Dr. Downes.) Have you had any allegations as to any of the tasks which are now prescribed interfering with the touch of men who profess to be engaged in skilled work?—Yes, I have heard of complaints by such men, watchmakers, for instance. I do not know whether it has personally come before me, but I have heard of complaints in various districts of men whose occupations required a delicate touch, that it was injured by rough work like stone breaking.
439. (Chairman.) Would that be the case with turning the crank for grinding corn?—I should imagine not; a blister would probably be the worst thing that could happen to them.
440. (Mr. Davy.) Is it not very much easier for a workhouse master to let a man off than to insist upon him doing his work?—Much easier.
441. Therefore the tendency would always be towards slackness and leniency?—That would be so always.
442. Just as the tendency would be in favour of discharge instead of detention?—Yes.
443. They want to get rid of a rogue?—That is so.
444. A man wants some sense of duty to carry out these regulations?—That is so. Some masters think the tramp is an inconvenience and they try to get rid of him if they can.
445. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Does not a master find he gets rid of tramps more easily by being strict; he gets a reputation that way?—That is so.
446. (Mr. Simpson.) He would be rather a long-sighted man to take that view?—Yes, but still there are some like that. There are great differences; I think most of them treat tramps very well.
447. (Chairman.) Then, to sum up this matter, what is your recommendation with regard to the best unskilled labour?—I think the two I have mentioned, the stone pounding and the corn grinding, but I would also have any labour that should occupy a certain time. My notion is to have no task work, but time work, and the offence should not be neglect to perform the specified task, but neglect to do a reasonable amount of work during a specified time, in nine hours or whatever it was.
448. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Would not that lead to a great deal more expense in the way of supervision?—Possibly additional supervision might be required in some workhouses.
449. More men to supervise the casual in the cell with his stone; at present he does not get out until his task is done, but if it is a case of time work it would be very difficult to judge?—If he had not done a reasonable amount.
450. They would still judge by the results?—Yes, as they now do in digging and sawing.
451. (Mr. Simpson.) The difficulty of giving labour to the tramp would be lessened by any scheme by which it was possible to get a large number of tramps together. The more you have to deal with at once the less difficulty there would be in getting suitable work for them?—I think that is so. It is very much easier where you have thirty or forty men to get three or four sorts of industry and to assign each man to the industry that is suitable to him.

452. (Mr. Davy.) And it would be more worth while incurring the expense of putting up a corn grinding mill if you are likely to have a considerable number to employ?—That would be so. Of course one great difficulty about anything that costs money is that you have to take into consideration not only the big unions, but some of my little unions down in Cornwall, where they do not see a tramp for a couple of weeks together. You cannot expect guardians in such unions to incur expense for anything in connection with tramps; that is one of the difficulties.

453. Occasionally you have a small union, which is on the main road of tramps, and you have a disproportionate number of tramps there?—Yes, and it would be particularly hard on the small unions if the tramps were more expensive.

454. It is very hard on these small towns to have to build modern vagrant wards, is it not, for the benefit of their neighbours?—Yes; that often happens; and there is sometimes a difficulty as to the workhouse staff. For instance, in one union in my district the master is a man over eighty; the matron and the nurse are the only other officers. The feeble old man is quite powerless against any robust able-bodied tramp who likes to be cantankerous.

455. What would be about the number of inmates of the workhouse?—Between twenty and thirty.

456. Mostly old people?—Yes.

457. And tramps go there?—Yes, some tramps go there, though they have to go a little out of the way to do so.

458. (Chairman.) That would probably be rather a special case?—Yes, but there are a good many workhouses where the staff is very small indeed, and where there would be difficulty in enforcing anything on tramps very much against their will.

459. (Sir William Chance.) What is the duty laid down by the Orders on the master as to calling in a medical officer where a tramp claims exemption from work?—It is the universal practice to call in the doctor if a tramp pleads illness. Article 13 of the Order says: "In the event of any casual pauper being ill, the master of the workhouse or the superintendent of the casual ward shall, as soon as practicable, obtain the attendance of the medical officer, who shall give directions as to the treatment of such pauper, and if, in the opinion of the medical officer, the pauper cannot be properly treated in the casual ward, he shall be transferred to a sick ward of the workhouse, and be deemed to be an ordinary inmate thereof."

460. If the tramp says he cannot perform his task, it is only in the case where he pleads illness, I think, that the medical officer need be called in. In other cases the master could act on his own discretion?—Yes, but as a matter of fact if a man pleads that he is incapable, though it may not be from an actual physical attack of illness, I think it is the invariable practice of the master to call in the doctor.

461. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Suppose he said he had some disease or something of that sort, would the master call in the doctor?—He would call in the doctor or he might say: "I see you are a sickly-looking man, you need only do this light job of (say) sweeping."

462. A man may look quite strong and yet have heart disease, may he not?—He can always claim, by a sort of unwritten law, to see the doctor whenever he likes.

463. (Mr. Davy.) That is your experience?—Yes.

464. You do not think any master would take the responsibility of refusing to let him see the doctor?—I cannot imagine his doing so.

465. (Captain Showers.) Do you not find the infirmaries of these workhouses invariably full?—Oh, no.

466. A tramp I was talking to in the workhouse the other day said he had tried in two workhouses to get to the infirmary, as he was suffering from a certain disease, but they told him the infirmary was full and they could not deal with him there. He had to go on to the next one, although there is no doubt he was suffering from disease?—If I heard of such a case in a district of mine I should make inquiries as to whether the statements were justified, and why they did not call in the doctor, because, as a matter of fact, there is almost always a vacant bed in the infirmary.

467. (Mr. Davy.) If the man was unfit to go on, it would be, in your view, a neglect of duty on the part of the master not to take him in?—Certainly.

468. (Captain Showers.) He could not do any work?—It certainly was a neglect of duty. I constantly ask masters in my district as to their practice. They say: "Oh! we always treat a tramp who is ill just as we treat anybody else who comes to the workhouse and is ill: The doctor sees him and he goes to the infirmary if the doctor considers that necessary."

469. (Dr. Downes.) The Order of 1882 lays down quite distinctly that if a vagrant is ill the master shall obtain the attendance of the medical officer?—Certainly, and I have no doubt each of the Inspectors of the Local Government Board in any case of not carrying out that direction would want to know from the master why the doctor was not called in.

470. And further, that if the man requires treatment in a sick ward he shall be transferred there?—Yes, and one never, or very rarely, goes into a big workhouse infirmary without finding one or two casuals who have been put in.

471. I suppose there may be cases that only require a little surgical dressing and then may proceed on the road?—That may be so.

472. That may not necessarily require to be put into a sick ward?—No.

473. Article 10 of the Order provides as follows:—"If a casual pauper be sick or infirm, the medical officer of the workhouse or casual ward shall prescribe the dietary for such pauper?"—Yes.

474. The Order, I take it, contemplates that if the man is infirm, apart from being sick, the medical officer shall intervene?—That is so, no doubt. "Infirm" of course is a very vague word; it has a wide range; I mean a man may be regarded as infirm owing to age alone, although he is hale and stalwart.

475. But the word, I take it, gives a wider discretion than the word "ill" in Article 13?—Certainly.

476. (Chairman.) What are the actual rules with regard to the attendance of medical officers at workhouses; is there a general rule that they shall attend there so often, or is it only when they are sent for?—That rests with the guardians; in some large workhouses there is a resident medical officer. If there are not enough patients to demand his entire services, perhaps (as at Plymouth, for instance) he attends for some hours a day. Then in smaller workhouses the medical officer comes, perhaps three times a week, and when sent for. He is sent for in any case of illness or any case of emergency that arises, quite apart from his regular attendance.

477. Does he not reside a considerable distance from the workhouse in some country districts?—Well, in most cases he resides pretty near, because the workhouse in the country is generally in the market town, and he generally has a poor law district in that market town, and is required to live within it. I know of very few cases in which the workhouse medical officer lives at any considerable distance.

478. (Captain Showers.) About a mile, we may take it?—Mostly within a mile.

479. (Chairman.) I suppose in the more sparsely populated country districts it is left with the guardians to make arrangements with the medical officer as to his attendance?—That is so. The Order says that he shall attend at such times as they may prescribe, and also when sent for by the master or matron.

480. There is no hard and fast rule of the Local Government Board?—No.

481. (Mr. Davy.) But he must attend for every fresh admission?—Yes.

482. (Dr. Downes.) I think it is his duty also to examine each pauper on admission to the workhouse as to his or her physical condition and fitness for employment?—Yes, that is in the case of an ordinary inmate.

483. (Chairman.) That does not apply to casuals?—Unless the question of health is raised.

484. What have you to say on the question of competition with outside labour?—That was just incidentally mentioned yesterday. One difficulty is to find labour for tramps that will not compete with outside industry. Even the wood chopping industry in London was objected to by persons interested in the trade, and the Board issued the Circular which I mentioned yesterday. As to work which would in any degree help to train men to get their living afterwards, the usual objection is that the shortness of the period of detention puts this out of the question; but certainly three-fourths of the inmates of casual wards spend a large proportion of their lives in them; only, unluckily, they are not of a class willing to learn anything. In the country unions they are set to garden work, and they do show some gleam of interest in it. Now and then it happens that a painter or carpenter who cannot keep from drink if he is outside the workhouse, will do useful work inside, and sometimes we find he remains two or three weeks—it is rather irregular—doing odd jobs about the workhouse—painting, and so on—and getting nothing but perhaps a little tobacco and one or two extras for his labours, but no money at all.

485. (Mr. Simpson.) Is he technically a casual all the time, for the two or three weeks?—Well, sometimes he stops in the casual ward; sometimes they give him accommodation elsewhere; it is a little irregular, but it is very often done in country unions. And there is one real artist I know about. I have seen him both in the eastern counties and the west. He is an extraordinarily good decorator, and would be capable of earning £2 or £3 a week outside, but he comes inside the house, and stops there, and is kept from drink.

486. He is employed when any little job of painting wants doing?—Yes; but he is not paid for it; he only gets his tobacco and some little extras.

487. (Chairman.) Have you known any case where there has been a complaint made on behalf of the trade that an inmate is employed in that way instead of a regular painter?—I have heard of there being such a complaint.

488. I am not saying I have any sympathy with it, but I was wondering whether any objection had been raised?—I have heard of an objection being raised.

489. Obviously it is the best thing for the man and the best thing for the workhouse?—Yes.

490. Is the result of enforcement of detention, task of work and cell system almost invariably a great reduction in numbers?—It is almost an invariable rule that where the provisions of the Order of 1882 are enforced (especially if there are cells) as to search, detention, and task, the numbers of vagrants in the union go down to a tremendous extent.

491. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) And go up, I suppose, proportionately in the neighbouring unions?—That may be so, if they do not protect themselves.

492. You do not convert the vagrants—you simply squeeze them further?—No; but if you get them all uniform, you do not squeeze the vagrants from A to B, but B defends itself, and so along the whole line.

493. (Chairman.) Can you give any instances?—I have picked out a few; I might multiply them to an enormous extent. In Leicester the admissions averaged 257 per week. In 1889 a new block of cells was opened, and the admissions fell to 138 in 1890, and 118 in 1891, as against 257.

494. What was the date of the opening of the new cells?—The autumn of 1889, and in the two following years the numbers fell to about one half what they had been. Then in Sunderland the admissions from May, 1894 to 1896, were 14,000 odd; in May, 1896, new cells were opened, and from May, 1896, to April, 1898, the admissions were only 3,812. In Shepton Mallet, one of my little country unions, the admissions in the year ending Lady day, 1898, were 2,475; then new cells were provided and detention enforced. In the following year they fell to 649, and they have never got up again. In Taunton the numbers fell to a half with the cell system and detention. So, too, at Wolverhampton, Mr. Wethered, the Inspector, states in a recent report, that owing to better supervision—searching, bathing, and so on—the admissions were reduced from 4,094 in the last quarter of 1902, to 1,326 in the last quarter of 1903. In Plymouth the admissions for the year ended Lady Day, 1899, were 7,697. Detention was enforced, and in the following years they fell to 1,693, 1,306, 1,471, 1,327, and 1,391 respectively. And I might multiply such examples to any extent. It is a matter of course that, when you change from the lax system to the strict system, down go the numbers, and the tramps go somewhere else.

495. You spoke of one practice which has apparently led to a great diminution, namely, searching and bathing?—Yes, tramps dislike the searching especially. For a long time they hated baths, but they have got used to them now; I do not think they mind them nearly so much.

496. Does the establishment of baths increase the cost of the maintenance of the casual ward much?—No, I do not think so; though there is a little expense in the first instance. Most of the country unions, at any rate, have simply a couple of baths, or perhaps three, and they have a circulating boiler for hot water.

497. Has the bath acted as a deterrent to casuals?—It did once, but I think they are getting used to it now.

498. It is obviously a good thing from the health point of view to have enforcement of bathing?—Yes, and there is another great advantage; if you bathe a man you find out whether he shows signs of any particular disease, such, for example as scabies or even small-pox.

499. I suppose within your knowledge there have been many cases where, in consequence of a search, men who represented they were destitute have been found to have money?—Oh, yes, and sometimes when a tramp is a new hand in a particular district and he is told he is going to be searched, he says: "No, thank you; I will go on." He goes and pays for his lodging at a lodging-house, if he knows he would get his money taken from him at the casual ward.

500. Manifestly, therefore, it would be a good thing if the search and the baths were made compulsory?—I think they ought to be so; they are nominally compulsory now.

501. (Sir William Chance.) Does it not come to this, that if the Order of 1882 is carried out conjointly with the cell system, the figures of vagrancy will go down?—Yes, no doubt.

502. (Dr. Downes.) The number of pauper vagrants will go down?—Yes; they may go somewhere else, they may go to lodging-houses.

503. (Mr. Davy.) Some of them might take to honest work, might they not?—Yes.

504. (Dr. Downes.) Did they go to common lodging-houses or sleep out in those instances that you have given us?—I cannot say. Unfortunately you cannot get any precise information as to common lodging-houses and their inmates at particular times.

505. It is not known what became of the people who had formerly frequented those tramp wards?—No.

506. (Chairman.) I think we were dealing with the question of the enforcement of detention, task and cell system, which had almost invariably been followed by great reduction in numbers?—I just mentioned that there had been a considerable falling off after detention was enforced at Plymouth workhouse, but it is worth mentioning that when they had about fifty applicants for admission to the casual ward, night after night, the manager of the Dockyard extension works, where hands were very much needed at that time, offered to give work to as many men as the workhouse master could send, but not a quarter of the able-bodied, strong men would go, and very few of these that went would stay. And we are constantly meeting instances of that sort of work-shyness. I have often been told by occupants of vagrant wards that they are looking for work, but if particular work is indicated to them, they do not go. In a little country town where living is particularly cheap, where wages of 18s. a week are a competence almost, a tradesman of the town not long ago came to the workhouse master and said he could give permanent employment to a number of men in moving wood about and wood sawing, and he would employ them at 18s. a week for a long time. The workhouse master went into the casual ward, and all the casuals stated that they would be delighted to go. He picked out six of the strongest, and they were to begin work at 6 o'clock next morning. Six of them started. The works were a quarter of a mile off and only one of them got there, five having slunk off. Only one went to work, and he has been working there now for more than a year. That sort of thing constantly happens. These are only illustrations of the fact that people who declare they are looking for work will not take work when it is offered to them.

507. There was a House of Lords' Committee in 1888, which made some suggestions for an alteration of the system?—Various witnesses before the Committee suggested that casual wards should be abolished altogether and that casuals should be treated as ordinary paupers; but the House of Lords' Committee disapproved of the suggestion, and their only recommendation was that it might be advisable somewhat further to extend the power of detention where the tramp had been re-admitted within fourteen days.

508. There was a Departmental Committee dealing with habitual vagrants in Scotland?—Yes, it was proposed that power should be given to detain for a week or ten days casuals known to have been in workhouses more than two or three times during the preceding six months. They also recommended that there should be discrimination in favour of the honest workman—"and that the police authorities should be empowered to grant temporary relief to the extent of a night's lodging and food to the necessitous homeless and travelling poor where they think it expedient to do so, and that they should also have power to exact, if they think right, a labour equivalent from those that are able to work." There is not very much bearing on the present inquiry; I only mention that recommendation as to the police.

509. (Sir William Chance.) Is anything to be learned from the Scotch system?—I do not think so. Their system generally is so entirely different from ours that I rather doubt if we could learn profitably from it. I thought it desirable to put on record that there was that inquiry on vagrancy and various police matters in Scotland.

510. (Mr. Simpson.) They have no casual wards under the poor law authority, have they?—None at all. I believe it is illegal to give relief to an able-bodied man in Scotland.

511. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Begging is not contrary to the law?—I think within the last ten years they have applied practically the provisions of the Vagrancy Act to Scotland.

512. It has not been enforced?—I cannot say.

513. (Chairman.) There were two Bills in 1904 with regard to vagrancy; was one of those Sir John Gorst's Bill?—Sir John Gorst's was the general Bill as to labour colonies. There was one as to child vagrancy called the Vagrants' Children Protection Bill, backed by Mr. Claude Hay, Mr. Spear, and other Members.

514. They got no further than the Bill stage, I suppose?—They did not reach the second reading stage.

515. (Sir William Chance.) Numbers of children are on the road with the tramps, and the idea is that something should be done to rescue them from a life which is not a desirable one; it is felt that if a tramp is found habitually carrying about a child, whether his own or somebody else's, it should be an offence for which he should be punished. Thus the child could be dealt with and sent to some place where it could be educated and trained. That is the idea of the second Bill?—I think the proposal was to throw the expense not on the union, but on the county.

516. (Chairman.) Suggestions have been made by various bodies as to the establishment of labour colonies, way-tickets, mid-day meals, more rigorous treatment of casuals committed to prison, and so on?—I will give a summary of the principal recommendations which have been made to the Local Government Board for various amendments in the present system, some of them vague but some of them precise. 117 boards of guardians have petitioned for legislation enabling the poor law unions to combine for the provision and maintenance of labour colonies and for the detention of vagrants. The Wiltshire Poor Law Association proposed that a passport system should be adopted, and that old and impotent vagrants should be compulsorily removed to the workhouse of their birthplace and detained there. The

Horsham guardians in urging uniformity of treatment in casual wards proposed that prison authorities should place vagrants in a special class with more rigorous treatment. The Cricklade guardians considered that attempts to deal with the vagrancy question would be ineffectual as long as the lenient treatment of refractory tramps in gaol continued. The Lindsey court of quarter sessions, also 105 boards of guardians and fourteen other courts of quarter sessions or standing joint committees, advocated legislation for the amendment of the vagrancy laws by the establishment of labour colonies on the Belgian lines or otherwise. The West Riding court of quarter sessions and twenty-one Yorkshire boards of guardians urged greater power to deal with habitual vagrants by detaining them in a place provided for that purpose or otherwise. The Basingstoke guardians advocated the establishment of labour colonies, the cost to be equally shared by the State, county councils, and the unions. The Norwich board suggested the grouping of boards of guardians to provide labour colonies. Portsmouth and Poplar desired a power of detention for able-bodied paupers in the present voluntary labour colonies. Sculcoates and some other boards were in favour of a system of way-tickets available for a stated period and including a free ration of bread and cheese for dinner. Henley proposed permits, without which tramping should be punishable, the opening of an employment bureau at each workhouse, a penalty on refusal to work, increase of detention to three days, and improvement of diet. Bridgnorth suggested a new law on vagrancy providing for issue of passports by the police, exempting from task and detention in casual wards; tramps without such passports to be apprehended and detained for fourteen days in tramp wards, or on repetition for two, three or twelve months in a gaol or labour institution. It also made various suggestions with regard to the treatment of wives and children in such cases. Among other suggestions are that the entire cost of vagrancy should be a county charge; that there should be a contribution by the Exchequer of 6d. a day for each tramp; that the whole matter should be transferred to the police; that some measures should be taken to obtain uniform sentences, as in Lancashire, Cheshire, and some other counties where the magistrates agree to give at least fourteen days for every offence, the police acting as assistant relieving officers. There are many advocates of the various schemes known as the Dorset system, by which bread is supplied at bakers' shops about five miles apart on the main roads, in exchange for tickets provided by subscribers to a mendicity society, or the Berkshire system, abandoned in Berks but adopted in Wilts, under which bread is provided at police stations; or the Gloucestershire system, by which, on condition of taking a certain route, a tramp is furnished by the workhouse master with a ticket entitling him to a mid-day ration of bread at some office in connection with a police station distant from the workhouse. Mr. Bircham, Local Government Board Inspector, states that in many unions in Wales a ticket system is in force, three coloured tickets being used, white, blue and red. "The police are as a rule employed as assistant relieving officers, and the white ticket is given to those who, as far as they can judge, are bona fide working men of some sort or other; this white ticket implies detention for one night only and the prescribed task accordingly, or in some special cases these would be discharged as early as possible the next morning without a task. The blue ticket is given to men who, so far as the assistant relieving officer can judge, are tramps—not bona fide working men, or are of known indifferent character—these are detained two nights, and set to work accordingly. Red tickets are given to those who have visited the union more than once within the month and are detained the full period, but they are very few in number. This ticket system has been found useful, and has acted well so far as I can ascertain." These plans are of course mainly intended to prevent indiscriminate alms to casuals who plead that they have to walk from one workhouse to another without being allowed any food for the journey, but it is disappointing to find no doubt in several counties where such systems are in force that there are a very large number of vagrants. It is very difficult to separate cause and effect, to say whether those counties have natural attractions for vagrants which have induced people to make special provision with regard to them, or that the special provision made with regard to vagrants has attracted the tramps. We cannot tell which it is, but there is the fact that in most of these counties (only about half-a-dozen) where they have some system of the sort, there seem to be a good many tramps, except in Gloucestershire, where they have mastered them pretty well. The small number of tramps in Cornwall is a question of geography, I suppose, and not anything else, but one county where there are very few tramps, although you would naturally expect to find a very large number, is Essex, and they have not any system of the kind there. Then we get to the proposal for labour colonies by the Poor Law Unions Association.

517. Will you describe that proposal?—Yes, a scheme for the establishment of labour colonies was framed a year or two ago by a special committee of the Poor Law Unions Association and it has been supported by some boards of guardians. Their proposal was that labour colonies should be formed for counties or other areas, and managed by committees of boards of guardians of the areas; that some of these should be industrial and some agricultural, according to the district, but that there should be a power of transferring inmates by arrangement from agricultural to industrial colonies and vice versa, according to the capacity of the individual vagrant; that inmates of the colonies should be graded, should receive a character on discharge, and also a sum of money according to conduct; that the expenses should be met by precepts on boards of guardians taking part; that the colonies should also be available for able-bodied inmates of workhouses. As to detention, the committee suggested that boards of guardians should be entitled to take any vagrant found in the casual wards for the third time (I do not gather within what period) before the magistrate, who "on being satisfied that the casual is an habitual vagrant, may send him or her to a labour colony for a period of not less than one year or more than three years." Those are the suggestions made to the Board by local authorities of various kinds. Then there are various suggestions which have been recently made by the Board's Inspectors; that vagrant children should be dealt with on the lines of the Bill of 1900; that vagrancy should be a county charge; that the cell system should be made universal; that in London uniformity of treatment should be enforced, and that the Board should withhold repayment from the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund in any cases where the regulations are wilfully disregarded; that all tramps should be examined by workhouse medical officers, with a view to detention, if unfit to leave on account of infectious disease; that unnecessary vagrant wards should be closed, their unions making some contribution to those whither the tramps are diverted. Those are, I think, among the principal of the suggestions made by the Board's fourteen Inspectors.

518. What was the date of those suggestions?—1903; a Minute was sent round by the Board early in that year to all the Inspectors, and their answers contained these suggestions.

519. Nothing came of that?—The question was deferred for the consideration of this Committee.

520. There were Reports of the Commissioners of Prisons as to casuals who were sent to prison by magistrates for refusal to work, but who were reported by gaol surgeons as incapable?—In their Report for the year ended 31st March, 1901, the Commissioners of Prisons called attention to the large number of prisoners committed for refusal of task in the casual wards of workhouses, and stated that a large number were found suffering from such physical or mental infirmity as to render them unfit for punitive labour of any kind. They suggested, therefore, that the Local Government Board should issue an Order that no inmate charged with this offence should be brought before a magistrate till he had been carefully examined by a medical man and certified fit for the task he had failed to perform, such certificate to be placed before the magistrate. The Home Secretary asked the Local Government Board whether there was any difficulty in adopting this course, and the Local Government Board stated that magistrates often asked for such a certificate or directed examination by the police doctor, and there was no reason why they should not require certificates in all cases. The Board also forwarded to the Home Office statements from the Chelsea and Kingston guardians showing that in a large number of cases specially referred to by the Prison Commissioners, either the workhouse medical officer had certified the men as fit to perform their task—it was a case of doctors differing—or they had declined to see him. Well, I take it if a casual is asked whether he cannot do his task because he is ill, and he says “No,” and refuses to see a doctor, he cannot be examined against his will. It then becomes a question for the magistrate as to what evidence he shall call for. The Home Secretary subsequently forwarded to the Local Government Board a large number of reports from medical officers of prisons as to casuals committed for refusal to work but found on examination to be unfit for prison labour. The Board communicated with the guardians concerned in these cases and a précis of their statements is available for the information of the Committee. It will be noticed that these cases relate to proceedings for refusal to do any work at all, not for neglect to complete a specified task, and the tables published in the Local Government Board Annual Reports show with regard to the Metropolis that the two offences are separately treated. I have quoted already some figures bearing on that. It is the invariable practice if a casual pleads illness to call in the medical officer before prosecuting him for refusal, and casuals are habitually excused, without calling in the doctor, from doing work for which they are too weak.

521. I suppose the workhouse master can judge for himself without calling in the doctor, if he takes the responsibility upon himself?—I do not think he ever judges in the sense of stringency. He never would say, “You shall do the task; you are malingering.” Before setting a man to work, who pleads illness, he would say, for his own protection, “We will have the doctor then.” But it often happens in inspecting a workhouse that I ask, “What is that tramp doing?” and get some such answer as, “Well, he is not very strong, sir; I put him to sweep the paths a bit; he is not up to the ordinary work.” That happens constantly.

522. The master satisfies himself that it is not absolutely incumbent upon him to call in the doctor?—That is so; in fact, according to the Order, he must not set any casual to a task for which he is incapable.

523. On the other hand, if he has absolutely satisfied himself that the man is incapable of working, he can act accordingly without calling in the doctor?—Certainly, and he habitually does so.

524. (Mr. Simpson.) Medical officers are usually paid by salary, are they not?—Invariably.

525. If a medical officer were called in to see a pauper in these circumstances, he would not charge a fee for that to the guardians?—No.

526. On the other hand if he appeared in court before the magistrate, I suppose he would have a claim as a witness, possibly to an allowance from county funds?—That may be so; I cannot speak as to that; he is certainly paid by salary.

527. (Mr. Davy.) A medical officer can make no charge for giving a certificate that A.B. is incapable of doing his work?—No.

528. (Chairman.) What is your opinion as to the communication of smallpox by vagrants?—Well, the spread of smallpox by tramps has been a matter as to which an enormous number of letters and communications and reports of various kinds have been received by the Local Government Board. On three occasions the Board have issued Circulars (in 1893, 1895 and 1903) to provincial and metropolitan boards of guardians as to the necessity of taking measures for the discovery of symptoms of the disease, and for the prompt isolation of any person affected. They have suggested, in times of epidemics of smallpox, that there should be a daily examination of all casuals presenting themselves for admission, and in a good many unions—town unions mostly, and in some country unions—this has been carried out, the doctor being paid something for this extra work. So that every tramp in epidemic times has been examined on admission to certain casual wards, and the possibility of taking a step of that kind strikes me as rather a reason against doing anything that would tend to divert the tramp from the casual wards, where his health can be minutely examined, and all precautions can be taken, to the common lodging-house, where practically you cannot take such precautions.

529. You have already said that one of the advantages of the bath is that it shows when a man is affected by smallpox?—That is so.

530. You are aware that there was a report by the medical officer of health of Newcastle-on-Tyne in 1893, with reference to the spread of smallpox by vagrants?—There is a very exhaustive report made by Mr. Armstrong, the medical officer of health of that city in 1893; he collected statistics with regard to between 5,000 and 6,000 cases of smallpox in sixty-three different towns, and found that in forty-six of these towns the introduction was due to vagrants, rather less than half being casuals. On the publication of this report the London county council convened a conference, which met on 19th July, 1894, and it was, I should think, one of the most representative conferences of the kind that has ever met; and therefore, its opinion carries very great weight, because all the big towns were represented—Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham—all the important towns, with very few exceptions; and there was a very animated and long discussion as to the way of preventing the spread of disease by casuals. A series of resolutions were passed which I will shortly enumerate. Of course, they took the word “vagrants” as including not merely the inmates of casual wards, but the whole floating population; and their first resolution related to refuges and shelters which had then been decided to be outside the scope of the Common Lodging Houses Acts; and, therefore, not to require registration, and not to be under the control of the London county council and its officers as regards sanitary precautions and a host of other matters. But, fortunately, that decision of the Queen’s Bench Division was over-ruled in 1899, when it was held in Logsdon v. Booth, that the fact that a Salvation Army shelter was not conducted for gain, did not remove it from the operation of the Common Lodging Houses Acts of 1851 and 1853, and that it was a common lodging-house and must be registered; so we have got rid of the primary difficulty which was then supposed to require legislation. Other resolutions suggested that the local authority should be empowered to require medical examination of all persons entering common lodging-houses and casual wards; to close for a time a common lodging-house where infectious disease had appeared; to require disinfection of the clothes of an inmate of a common lodging-house or casual ward exposed to infection; and to require the vaccination or the re-vaccination of such persons. From that time to the present, various reports from medical officers of health have been received complaining of the spread of infection by tramps, most of them to the effect of a report by the medical officer of health of Stratford-on-Avon, who said in a vigorous paragraph that “the sanitarians of the twenty-first century will look back with amazement on their ancestors who inflicted fines for moving pigs out of areas infected with swine fever, but allowed a tribe of tramps to wander at large spreading smallpox.” The Durham city council forwarded to the Local Government Board, rather later, a statement that fourteen cases of smallpox in the Durham rural district council’s hospital were all admitted from the workhouse, the infection being traceable to contact with a vagrant said to be suffering from influenza, but who developed smallpox. Then Mr. Wethered, one of the Board’s General Inspectors, in his report for 1903, states that smallpox had been so often introduced into vagrant wards in his district during the year that in most unions the medical officer was instructed to examine all vagrants on admission. He continues:—“Notwithstanding this precaution, some cases were not detected in time to prevent the vagrants going about with the disease upon them. One unfortunate instance of this occurred at Winchcombe on the 18th February. Owing to a misunderstanding a man was allowed to leave the workhouse with smallpox upon him, and he tramped to Stow-on-the-Wold, a distance of nine miles. On arriving, the nature of the man’s illness was detected, but the guardians had no isolation provision for treating cases of infectious disease, nor had the urban district council. Temporary arrangements had, therefore, to be made which cost the guardians over £200. But the irony of the case came when the man was convalescent. When this stage was reached one of the guardians kindly offered the man work. He replied that he never had done any work and never would. He was twenty-eight years of age.” These are typical instances, and a great many similar ones have been recently brought together in a second report by Mr. Armstrong, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, on smallpox and vagrancy in 1901-3. From information received from medical officers of health of 126 towns of over 20,000 population, he found that of 111 of these towns invaded by smallpox the introduction in 57—rather more than half of the whole—was caused by tramps. In forty-one cases they had lodged in workhouses, and in fifty-eight in common lodging-houses. On the publication of this report in the present year, the London county council decided to convene another conference on the spread of infectious diseases by vagrancy, and this conference will be held on the 10th November. I have no doubt the Committee will take account of its proceedings, as probably if it is as representative as the former conference, it may make some very valuable suggestions as to this particular matter.

531. Then as to suggestions to the Local Government Board for preventing spread of disease by tramps?—They have received a very large number of resolutions in favour of the compulsory vaccination of casuals and casuals' children. But, of course, there will always come up the question of differentiating between the rich man and the poor, of sending a man to take a baby out of its mother's arms, and so on. We have never had compulsory vaccination in the sense of forcing anybody to have a child vaccinated, although we have fined him for not doing so.

532. (Mr. Davy.) As a matter of fact, a considerable number of tramps were vaccinated during the last epidemic?—A large number generally by persuasion; in some places they pay them 1s. and then it is easy enough.

533. (Chairman.) Do you know if it has been found easier since they have been made aware that there is no question of arm-to-arm vaccination?—I could not say as regards tramps; it has had a very considerable effect on the labouring population generally.

534. I thought it might be so with tramps, too?—That is not unlikely. Of course, the number of vagrant children is very small, but there have been various resolutions of that sort; also, in favour of the compulsory vaccination of persons in a workhouse or a common lodging-house upon an outbreak of smallpox, and of the power being conferred upon the local authority to deal with contact cases, as they are called, by detention or otherwise. These have been suggestions made to the Local Government Board. Then I have two or three points to mention of a more or less general nature.

535. Suppose a tramp enters a casual ward and on his entrance it is found he is suffering from smallpox, what is the procedure?—In the first place, the doctor would find that, on being called in.

536. He certifies?—If there is an isolation hospital in the neighbourhood suitable for smallpox, the patient would be sent off there at once, the casual ward would be disinfected, possibly admission would be stopped for a day or two, and vaccination or re-vaccination would be pressed on everybody that could possibly have come into contact with him, or could possibly have received infection in any way. If there were no such hospital available, the master and doctor between them would make such arrangements as they could best improvise in some distant part of the workhouse premises, if possible, for putting such cases by themselves. Bad would be the best, but that is all they could do.

537. (Mr. Davy.) As matter of fact, in times of smallpox epidemic vagrant wards are not infrequently closed?—Yes.

538. In those unions in which cases of smallpox have occurred?—Yes.

539. (Mr. Simpson.) Is there any provision in law for detaining people in the workhouse infirmary or infectious hospital, who have actually smallpox?—Yes, they can be detained if they have smallpox, but they cannot be detained from simply having come into contact with other people.

540. And they can be detained till they are no source of danger to others?—Yes, in the opinion of the medical officer.

541. (Chairman.) As to the general treatment of vagrants—not with regard to disease—what have you to say?—It is unfortunate that the general treatment of vagrants is in no sense of a reforming character. The shortness of their stay at each workhouse prevents their learning any useful occupation and no good influences of any sort are at work upon them. On Sundays they are necessarily kept idle. Sunday is rather a difficulty in tramp wards; they are not allowed to go to the workhouse chapel for fear of introducing infection among the other inmates, and they can only associate with each other. There is no elevating, or reforming, or religious influence upon them. They are very rarely visited, and it may not be practicable to exercise any influence of the kind, but I merely record the fact. On Sunday there is no work, and these fellows only consort with each other, no one doing anything for them. This is at present one of the drawbacks of the system and one which I should like to see removed if possible.

542. Would not the chaplain of the workhouse give some attention to the vagrant ward?—His duties are to hold a service on Sunday, and to visit the sick wards. The individual man will sometimes consider it as part of his moral duty, but I am not sure that it is part of his legal duty; at any rate it is not generally performed.

543. (Mr. Davy.) Do you think that the material condition of the tramp has improved of recent years; I mean, if you contrast the tramp, as you know him now, with the tramp who is described in Mr. Doyle's report in 1866?—Enormously. In the first place, the tramp is one of the cleanest people you can find among the working classes.

544. At that time there were great complaints of the tramp suffering from itch?—Very general; and they swarmed with vermin. Now they occasionally get a little vermin from lodging-houses, and so on, but as a rule the tramp is extraordinarily clean. Take the ordinary labourer; he never thinks of washing himself completely. The tramp probably has a bath two or three times a week; that is unknown among the lowest stratum of the working classes.

545. And in the Inspectors' reports of 1866 there are great complaints as to vermin in the wards?—Oh, horrible.

546. Well, do you see vermin in tramp wards now?—Very rarely, and canvas hammocks are superseding the old wooden bunks which swarmed with vermin, and from which it is very hard to eradicate them. Some, I am afraid, are in existence now, and have some vermin in them still, but, as a rule, the tramp ward is very clean indeed. The masters take infinite care, because they know that that is a thing which is looked after specially.

547. I do not know whether you remember the time when tramps habitually had broken boots, with their toes sticking out; do you ever see that now?—Very rarely.

548. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Was not that an extreme case?—You do not find beautiful boots on tramps, but their boots are in better condition than in former years.

549. Is not the real labourer to be distinguished from the tramp by his boots?—The tramps' boots are not so good as those of labourers.

550. (Chairman.) At any rate, their general condition has very materially improved?—Very substantially indeed.

551. What have you to say as regards short sentences for vagrancy?—Well, that is not a matter for us except incidentally, but we find this, that when they are sent to prison for offences against the Vagrancy Act the term is generally a very short one, ranging from three to twenty-eight days. I should think the average is seven days, or perhaps less; the sentence is very seldom more than twenty-eight days even in the case of those with repeated convictions.

552. (Sir William Chance.) Is that for acts against the criminal law; does that come under the old Act of 1824?—Yes, and yet that Act of 1824 has an ascending scale of punishments by which a person neglecting to maintain himself or family by work and thus coming on the poor rates or being guilty of the offence of begging, etc., may be sentenced to one month's imprisonment as idle and disorderly; that a person guilty of an aggravated case of the same kind, or having been already convicted as idle and disorderly is liable to three months' hard labour as a rogue and vagabond, and any person already convicted as a rogue and vagabond may on a fresh offence be committed to sessions and sentenced to twelve months' hard labour, with whipping, as an incorrigible rogue. Well, as a matter of fact, nobody seems to get more than the first. Magistrates disregard the "rogue and vagabond" and the "incorrigible rogue," and they very rarely indeed give three months, and never a year, I think.

553. (Mr. Davy.) Is it not the fact that a man is never prosecuted as a rogue and vagabond unless he has persistently neglected to maintain his family?—I believe so.

554. Have you ever heard of a rogue and vagabond persistently refusing to work having anyone depending on him?—Scarcely ever. At any rate such sentences as twelve months for any offence under the Vagrant Act are certainly a very rare exception. Magistrates are much influenced by sentiment, by newspapers and by the fear of accusations of inhumanity and all sorts of things. I know of one country town in which the guardians were somewhat embarrassed because, when casuals were brought before the local Bench for refusing to perform their task in the workhouse, the mayor not only invariably discharged them, but gave them half-a-crown to help them on the road.

555. Is not the prison actually used as an easy means of locomotion when a tramp wants to get across a county, say?—Often.

556. He gets seven days and moves across the county?—I have known cases in North Devon. If a tramp there wants to get towards London and does not want to walk, what is simpler than to break a window in the casual ward? For breaking a window he gets sent to Exeter, he gets a good square meal on entrance, he gets much better feeding than in the casual ward for between three days and a week, and he is fifty miles on his way. The tramp is very dodgy, and I have no doubt when he gets on the border of Dorset he does the same thing if he wants to go to Weymouth; he has another smash and he is sent to Dorchester gaol. Tramps are very good at topography, and so they go on.

557. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Is that really very frequent?—I think the wily ones know the way. I do not suggest that the proportion is very large.

558. (Mr. Davy.) A man in a prison gets a rest, does he not?—Yes.

559. And there are people who interest themselves in him after he comes out?—Yes.

560. Give him clothes and so on?—Yes; you see you have no discharged casuals' aid society, but you have the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society.

561. So there are other reasons besides the dietary which would induce a tramp to seek the seclusion of a prison rather than the severity of the workhouse regulations?—No doubt.

562. (Chairman.) If a tramp instead of having, say, a seven day sentence in the prison were to have a twenty-eight day sentence do you think he would so gladly seek the prison as he does now?—No; I think this is shown in various counties where the magistrates have had a sort of rough agreement that they will give all cases twenty-eight days, and that sort of decision has been followed by a decrease of tramps and presumably of offences by them.

563. And from that point of view the longer sentence would be effective?—It would be an improvement certainly.

27 Oct. 1904.

564. (Chairman.) We did not touch the question of labour farms and colonies yesterday?—As to the question of labour colonies my Department do not express any opinion. But I am prepared to state various considerations that the Committee may like to weigh as representing simply my opinion for the very small amount that it may be worth, but not the opinion of the Local Government Board.

565. Quite so. Have you yourself visited any of the labour farms?—No, not in England.

566. Do you know whether any exist in England now?—There are the Salvation Army farm at Hadleigh, and the one at Lingfield of a philanthropic society, called the Christian Social Service Union.

567. Any others?—Then there is the organisation of the Church Army which consists in setting up a certain number of industrial workshops and so on, where men are employed, and where they receive housing and food, in return for a small amount of work that they do.

568. As far as you know has there been any action on the part of the county councils in this direction?—Not that I am aware of; I do not think there could be.

569. Well, as to the institution of labour colonies?—The first point is whether there should be labour colonies with compulsory detention.

570. Yes?—Of course, at present there is no compulsory detention of that kind in England, and it may be doubted whether, if forced labour colonies were introduced, a number of persons sufficient to produce any effect on the total amount of vagrancy would be committed by magistrates to them for such a lengthened term as alone would be of any use.

571. It would be a question, would it not, whether such establishments should be entirely under control of the Local Government Board or the Prison Commissioners?—It seems to me, personally, that interference with the liberty of adult and sane persons is the function of the Government alone; you cannot depute it to the best managed philanthropic society. A forced-labour colony, such as those that I am familiar with in Switzerland, is in effect a prison. It is a sort of prison with excellent arrangements for the betterment of the people and also for getting on the land an amount of force which is now wasted, but it is primarily a prison. It has been suggested that as lunatic asylums, inebriate homes and industrial schools are certified by the Home Office, and persons are committed to them and detained for a specified term, therefore the same thing might be done with regard to a labour colony maintained by a philanthropic society; but the cases seem to me to differ toto cælo with respect to the liberty of the subject. Take a lunatic asylum first as an extreme case; the lunatic is confined, not by way of punishment, but because he is unable to take care of himself. So you put the inebriate in an inebriate asylum, not in a prison, because he is not exactly compos mentis and is not an entirely sane member of the community. So with the children, it is not to punish them, but because they are not of an age to demand unrestricted liberty that you keep them in institutions suited for them. But I do not believe that any civilised Government delegates the charge of its prisoners to an irresponsible body, and I myself do not consider that any system of inspection can possibly get rid of the objection. A primary duty of the State is the charge of its prisoners, and that is a duty which as involving the all-important question of the liberty of the subject it ought to keep in its own hands. Ought any voluntary body to be entrusted with the right of interfering with individual freedom, of administering punishment for insubordination, or of dealing with escapes or attempts to escape from detention? I speak of philanthropic societies with the greatest respect. I think General Booth has done wonders as regards particular classes, but that is beside the argument. The question is whether he is to be entrusted with the powers of the governor of a State prison, and have a legal right of enforcing compliance with the special regulations and observances of the Salvation Army. My view is that if a compulsory labour farm is to be conducted this must be done by a responsible authority, and that if you delegate that particular duty, you are delegating a function which the Central Government has no right to delegate.

572. I take it from what you say that it would be necessary to have legislation if you established any system of this sort; that wherever compulsion is necessary there you must have legislation when you are dealing with the liberty of the subject?—That would be so, and whether Parliament would ever consent to trust the liberty of the subject, the subject not being a child, not a lunatic, or not a partial lunatic like the inebriate, to however good and useful a philanthropic society, is a matter as to which I personally have very grave doubts.

573. (Sir William Chance.) And by a philanthropic society would you imply such an organisation as the Salvation Army?—I should include that as a philanthropic society.

574. (Dr. Downes.) Do you think that the philanthropic societies might be useful as adjuncts; for example, that the man might be committed to a compulsory labour colony and then on certain conditions be passed on to a philanthropic agency?—Provided that the philanthropic agency had no compulsory power over that man's liberty. In Switzerland they have got one excellent plan. When a man leaves the compulsory labour farm people are not very ready to employ him, because they do not like to take into their service a man straight from prison, but there are one or two voluntary labour farms in which he can be received and can earn wages. There he has a time of quarantine, a time of rehabilitation, and people are much more ready to take him afterwards.

575. (Chairman.) And I suppose the advantage of that would be that he would be able there to earn a certain amount of wages which if he chose to put away he could establish himself with afterwards?—That would be so.

576. (Mr. Simpson.) Would the difficulty you feel apply equally to labour farms conducted by local authorities?—Not by police authorities.

577. Say county councils?—Not if they are police authorities. I am sorry to say I do not know quite how far county councils now do act as police authorities.

578. County councils are not police authorities, they only supply half the cost. All the prisons were under local authorities up to 1877 when they were transferred to the Home Office. The main reason of the change was to economise the prison system, not on account of theoretical objections to local authorities having control over prisons. In view of that, would you feel the same difficulty in having farm colonies under local authorities?—Not at all the same as in the case of charitable societies. But they are a sort of prison, and I should think that they had better be under the control of the prison authority.

579. (Sir William Chance.) Are you acquainted with the German system of labour colonies?—I have not visited those colonies; I have read, of course, a good deal of literature on the subject.

580. Some of the colonies to which you have referred are founded on that system?—Yes.

581. Which is that of voluntary colonies with no powers of detention?—Yes, quite so.

582. You have no objection to voluntary societies working side by side with compulsory colonies?—On the contrary I think it is a great advantage, and I would encourage voluntary societies to run their colonies; only my point is, a colony with detention is a prison; and no philanthropic society, or anybody but the Government, ought to run a prison.

583. (Dr. Downes.) It has been suggested, I think, by the Poor Law Unions Association that compulsory labour colonies should be under control of a combination of boards of guardians?—Yes.

584. I take it that what you have said applies equally to such a suggestion as that?—My objections would apply to that, in a rather less degree since any publicly constituted authority is more responsible than the committee of a philanthropic body.

585. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) In the casual wards the guardians have the control of the liberty of the man for four days and they are not a very responsible body?—That I admit is, to a certain extent, an analogy for detention by a body which is not the Government; but the tramp goes to the casual ward voluntarily.

586. Yes?—There is no question of his going to a compulsory labour colony voluntarily, he is sent there under sentence. But he resorts to the casual ward of his own free will and he knows the conditions. "If you want board and lodging you will have to work for it during a whole day and to stay two nights." Well, he accepts that bargain voluntarily, for he need not come at all, and this makes all the difference.

587. (Captain Showers.) If he does not conform to this, he is liable to the law?—Quite so, and of course it is a very precise law which allows it, a special Act of Parliament which allows these restrictions on a man's liberty; or, to put it in another way, prescribes the conditions on which he can obtain food and shelter.

588. (Chairman.) There was a Report of a Committee in 1896 upon voluntary labour farms?—It was a Report of the Select Committee of 1896 on Distress from Want of Employment, and they considered the possibility of the establishment of voluntary labour colonies by the State as a partial remedy for want of employment. That Select Committee reported against the adoption of any such scheme with regard to the unemployed generally; and their objections, apply with, I think, even greater force to State colonies for vagrants. Many of the vagrants would, of course, be quite unsuited to agricultural labour. A farm, so worked, could only be carried on at a heavy loss, since farming with difficulty pays, even when the best labourers are employed. And there is another difficulty which has been found in Switzerland and everywhere else. Farms employ least labour just when you want most to give employment—in the winter. In Switzerland there is some employment in the winter, but on an English farm little can be done, and when there is a hard frost (as there was in 1894–5) the ground cannot be touched for, perhaps a couple of months just when the distress is greatest. Other industries could rarely be made profitable owing to the inexperience of the workers, and the product might inconveniently compete with that of outside trades. I do not know that that is a very serious thing but it is something. Then in the German colonies three-fourths of the inmates have been in prison, and I think the proportion at Hadleigh is very high; so good and competent men are unwilling to go there, and such a place is run under very great disadvantages. There are obvious drawbacks in a thing of that sort being carried on by the State. In the first place, you would miss the personal enthusiasm of the workers, the influence that people in the Church

Army and in the Salvation Army exercise from their keenness for the work. You cannot get that out of the very best officials. There are many considerations which lead to the conclusion that the establishment of a voluntary colony by the State is out of the question. That was the view which that Committee took, and in their Report (page 260) there is a string of objections to any such scheme.

589. You spoke of Hadleigh as not being a paying establishment; was that owing to the incapacity of the men who are working there?—I did not intend to suggest that Hadleigh was exceptional in that respect; I rather meant to state the difficulty generally.

590. That is a great difficulty?—Yes. I did not mean to individualise that place, because I did not desire to go into a contested question.

591. No doubt we will have evidence in regard to that. I suppose you would say that you must have capable men to make the place at all self-supporting?—You must.

592. That is obvious?—And then, of course, there is the objection that a State-supported institution at which any body may claim employment would be a sort of compliance with the socialist demand that the State should provide labour for everybody. It was tried in Paris in 1848, and nearly everybody is agreed that that is a demand which cannot be satisfied without disturbing the whole relations between capital and labour. Then there is rather a difficulty in providing for the wives and families of the colonists, if they have any. Most of the tramps, I think, have not wives and families, but some have, and you cannot conveniently provide for them on the farm. On the other hand, there are certain difficulties and dangers in a colony consisting only of men.

593. Have you anything more to say on this point?—Well, there is just one more remark I wish to make on the voluntary labour farms. I have said the various institutions of the Salvation Army at Hadleigh and elsewhere, and those of the Church Army and of the Society at Lingfield are, no doubt, doing very useful work. There is, however, enormous difficulty in ascertaining their effect on the subsequent career of those who go through them. What we really want to know is what individuals were in those institutions on, let us say, the 1st of January, 1902; how many of those individuals were gaining their own living in more or less permanent places on the 1st of January, 1904. The precise figures are doubtless not easily attainable. But it is no use to be told that a certain number obtained places unless we know how long they kept them; we want from all these institutions, if possible, a distinct statement supported by good evidence as to how many individuals who were there two years ago are now not on the tramp, or in philanthropic colonies, but earning a living. Till we get that, I do not believe we shall be able to form any trustworthy conclusions.

594. What is the effect of the Army short-service system on vagrancy?—As to the short-service system it has very often been alleged that it has a considerable effect in increasing vagrancy. On the other hand, it has been urged, with a good deal of force, I think, that it is the man with a wandering turn of mind that enlists. If he did not enlist he would be on the roads for his three years, or his five years, or his seven years, and at any rate he is taken away from the roads for that time. I believe that this is so much gain, and that the habits of discipline that he acquires tend to keep him off rather than on the roads. The system of gratuities on discharge is often blamed. Some men are perfectly reckless; they spend in drink however many pounds they get, then they go on the roads, miserable creatures, perhaps for the rest of their lives. But probably if they had not gone into the Army at all, although they would not have had this particular big drink, they would have been on the roads, they would have been living more or less on the public. I very much doubt whether the short-service system has any considerable effect in adding to the gross number of vagrants; but that is a matter of speculation.

595. Are you at all prepared to give an opinion as to what proportion of the general body of tramps are men who have been in the army?—There were returns as to that in 1897 and 1898.

596. (Mr. Davy.) There is a tendency on the part of tramps, is there not, to say they are old soldiers?—Very considerable; they are "old soldiers."

597. (Dr. Downes.) In the statistics of vagrancy you handed in, there is rather a large drop in the numbers in 1900. I do not know whether you have formed any opinion with regard to the cause of this drop?—As far as one can tell that was due to the war. An enormous number of able-bodied men went to the war and tramps took their place to a certain extent, and some tramps went to the war. I knew a workhouse porter who was a reservist; when he got down to the place of shipment he found in his company four or five men whom he recognised as casuals. They were reservists, too, and were taken away from the road for the time. No doubt the war was the cause of the extraordinary drop in 1900.

598. (Chairman.) And also it was a very good year for employment as well?—Yes, that was so.

599. Now, as to the cheapness of the present system?—It is not, of course, as a casual but as a beggar that we really object to the tramp. No conceivable system could make him cost less than he does, I take it. His food costs extraordinarily little, and although his lodging has cost something, there it is; and no change of system, requiring bricks and mortar and fresh capital expenditure, could possibly effect an economy. Of course, some other system may suppress the beggar more than he is suppressed now, and so save the pockets of the public, but as regards expenditure from rates and taxes you cannot have anything cheaper than the present system.

600. And you have already told us that there has been a considerable improvement in his bodily condition, his cleanliness, and so on?—Very considerable.

601. So that in that way at any rate the system has been successful?—To that extent certainly.

602. (Sir William Chance.) You told us that reduction of vagrancy would be caused by a general adhesion to the Order of 1882, plus the cell system?—Yes.

603. Well, are there not very few workhouses in the country which have the cell system?—I would not say very few.

604. There are over 600 casual wards altogether. Now is it not a fact, that except in large towns, a very small proportion have the cell system in force?—Large towns usually have it, and in some counties it is pretty general. In Somerset, for instance, more than two-thirds of the unions have tramp cells. The difficulty is with remote unions where they scarcely have any tramps.

605. That is exactly what I am coming to. Your idea would be that the cell system should be introduced universally; that would mean a considerable increase of expense on the present system?—I would not go so far as that; I would suggest that with regard to detention, the exceptions of the Order should be swept away, that the guardians should be required to detain everybody—with an exception that I will specify directly.

606. Then you would like to qualify your previous statement by saying that the cell system need not necessarily be introduced in every workhouse?—Not in every workhouse in the kingdom.

607. There are, as a matter of fact, some casual wards existing which hardly ever see a vagrant during the year?—Which, at any rate, see very few.

608. And generally, I believe, the casuals follow the high roads?—Yes.

609. They do not go into the bye roads to visit out-of-the-way workhouses?—Not at all.

610. (Mr. Davy.) The modern vagrant ward is very expensive to build, is it not?—It depends on how much the contractor, and the various engineers and the architects, and all those people want to make out of it. I have some information as to the cost of cells. I have a table with which the Architectural Department of the Local Government Board has supplied me, and which has all sorts of sums as the cost in different unions. Of course it depends very much as to what are the arrangements, in addition to the actual cells; whether, for instance, disinfecting chambers have to be provided. That is a very important thing, both for drying and for disinfecting tramps' clothes. Some of the best disinfectors will do the two things excellently. Another point is whether there is an association room so that tramps are not entirely kept in their cells, but can sit together on Sundays and for meals; and other extras not of primary necessity, which are put in in some unions and not in others.

611. (Mr. Simpson.) All plans either for additions or alterations, or for new buildings at workhouses are subject to the approval of the Local Government Board, are they not?—That is so. In this table apparently the highest cost is at Poplar. Poplar built cells for fifty-nine men, and they had a heating apparatus, disinfecting chamber, including laundry, oakum store, drying room, attendants' room, office and kitchen; cells on two floors; that was for a big number, and the cost of that was enormous. It was £13,600; it worked out at £231 a cell.

612. (Mr. Davy.) £231 per head?—Yes. Then by way of contrast I asked for a few in my district, and I find here £76 a head, £33 a head, £44 a head, although for small numbers. It is always much more expensive per head to build for nine or ten people than to build for eighty or ninety. Axbridge was £76 a head, excellent cells, with disinfecting chamber, drying-room and heating chamber. Exeter, £33 a head. It is extraordinarily cheap there, but then they had a boiler house already, and I think also a disinfecter. Barring that, the whole cost was about £33 a head. Shepton Mallet, an excellent block of cells, with heating chamber and so on, £44 10s.; Tavistock, £33; Williton, £60; Taunton estimated at about £60; I could not get that out separately because other alterations were made to the workhouse, and there was not a separate contract for the tramp wards. They reckon them at somewhat over £60 a cell; Yeovil, £54 a cell; Plympton was £96 per head, but that includes various items, such as a padded room, not really intended for casuals; and Wells £117 per head. There they did the thing very well indeed, and that is the only one that has touched £100 in all my district.

613. But I put it to you whether those are not exceptionally low?—They are those that have been done in my district.

614. Due perhaps to the vigilance of the Inspector?—No; the guardians themselves have been mainly responsible.

615. Owing to the poverty of the district?—Owing partly to the fact that building is extremely cheap in the West of England.

616. But, as matter of fact, vagrant wards are very expensive, or have been very expensive?—I do not believe you need spend more than £100 a cell, at any rate in the country.

617. I will ask you, is it possible to get cheap vagrant wards approved?—All those cases in my district have passed the Board's Architect, who has approved the plans.

618. (Chairman.) With regard to expense, does the cell system necessitate more overlooking?—I should not say so. There is a spy hole to each cell, through which a man can always be seen.

619. (Mr. Davy.) Each cell is provided with a bell, is it not?—Yes.

620. And when the tramp rings his bell the attendant comes at once?—Yes.

621. (Sir William Chance.) Have you the figures of the cost of establishing casual wards in other unions in London; have you got St. George's-in-the-East, for instance?—St. George's is not included in the table which I have here.

622. I mean in fairness to Poplar I think we ought to have the cost of some of the other London unions; but, is it not a fact as accounting for the great cost of the casual wards in London that they are thrown upon the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund, while in the country the cost is thrown on the individual union?—I believe the delight of spending other people's money has been very much appreciated in London, as elsewhere.

623. (Mr. Davy.) Now, having spent a very large capital expenditure on tramp wards, is it not the fact that any change in the system would render that expenditure practically useless?—Any change that would render those tramp wards useless would be the throwing away of large capital expenditure, and would necessitate the expenditure of fresh capital in some form in the future.

624. Tramp wards, as a rule, are not available for any other workhouse purpose?—No.

625. Then what is your opinion as to the transfer of the system to the police?—On this point, as on others, any opinions which I put before the Committee are entirely individual and not necessarily those of my Department. Of course, if we were beginning again I imagine that we should put the tramp under the police, because it is mainly qua vagrant and not qua pauper that he has to be treated; but we have got all the paraphernalia, and we have expended the money on casual wards, and probably the Committee will take the view that Lord Kimberley took in 1871; that so much had been spent in establishing the system in connection with the Poor Law that it was impossible then (and it would be much more costly and much more difficult now) to transfer it to any other body.

626. Then I take it you would say that the best system would be a thoroughly harmonious working between the police and the poor law authorities—keeping an eye on the undesirable tramp, and helping the deserving man as much as possible?—Quite so.

627. If you could get a thoroughly harmonious working between the police and the poor law authorities that would be in your judgment the best method of dealing with the vagrant question?—I think a great deal might be done in that way.

628. (Sir William Chance.) Would it not be possible, if vagrants generally were put under the police, for the police to make use of existing casual wards for the reception of persons of this class?—It would be very difficult, I think, especially when you consider the question of supplying food, clothes, and so on; in so many respects there are points in which the poor law people must have to do with the tramps. It would be very interesting to see any scheme that would provide for that, but I doubt whether it would be practicable to make wards at the workhouse virtually a branch prison in charge of the police.

629. If such a system were introduced, a certain number of bona fide wayfarers might be able, by means of the casual wards, to work their way to where they were going to find employment?—Yes.

630. I mean is it quite right to dismiss absolutely the suggestion that they might be used under another system, if the police were brought more into the matter than they are at present?—It is conceivable that something of that sort might be done; I could not see my way to it.

631. (Mr. Davy.) Have you any unions where, as a matter of course, the constable comes and looks over the tramps?—Not within my knowledge; not regularly.

632. (Mr. Simpson.) Apart from capital expenditure, is it possible to form any estimate of the cost of maintaining the tramp wards?—I do not think so. The aggregate cost is very small indeed. The food, as I have already shown, is only something under 6d. As to the Exeter workhouse, I got out some actual facts the other day. There is accommodation for between thirty and forty tramps; the interest on money spent on the casual wards is something under £60.

633. (Chairman.) The yearly interest?—The yearly interest, and repayment of capital.

634. (Mr. Davy.) It will work out in thirty years, I suppose?—Yes. Then the porter and portress are employed during the whole of the day on other duties; but they let in the tramps and look after them, so we may reckon half their salaries and allowances—£46. Then there are a few expenses, of course, for warming and for clothes which occasionally have to be supplied. But the total expenses in addition to those of the workhouse proper are so small that really they are scarcely worth considering.

635. (Captain Showers.) What would you consider the duty of the police as regards the tramp?—The police have only the responsibility for carrying out the Vagrancy Act at present. I should like to see specific relations established as regards other matters.

636. Suppose you had a system of way-tickets and food tickets; what time of the day do you consider these tickets would be asked for?—The way-tickets would be granted by the police at the place of starting; the food tickets would be given each morning on discharge from the workhouse.

637. What meal would a food ticket entitle a man to?—

Mr. H.

Mr. H.
Preston-
Thomas.

27 Oct. 1904.

A mid-day meal at some place some distance from a workhouse, as has been arranged in some counties.

638. He would have to apply to the policeman, then, let us say, some time in the morning?—At a time more or less when he wants his food. The workhouse master will say: "You are going such and such a route; there is a police station seven miles off"; and would give him such a ticket as would enable him to get some sort of meal at that police station in the middle of the day.

639. A police station would be quite right; but it would be rather a hardship upon the individual policeman to have a tramp come to his house for a food ticket in the morning when he would be having his sleep?—I do not suggest that.

640. (Chairman.) What is your view of granting tickets on local tradesmen?—I much prefer the ticket being issued by the workhouse master for a meal of, let us say, bread and cheese, at the police station.

641. What have you to say about the statement that only a portion of the vagrants are in casual wards?—Of course, the difficulty that has to be met is, that at present rather less than one-third of the vagrants are in casual wards; that if you make restrictions in casual wards too irksome you will drive the tramp to the common lodging-house and he is under no control there, and the enforcement of sanitary precautions is much more difficult; or to prison where you already have got more tramps than you like. You want, of course, to facilitate as much as possible the movements of working men, and no doubt these movements have become in modern times much more frequent in consequence of the fluctuations of labour and of seasonal variations in different trades. Particular trades have nothing to do in the spring, and other trades have a great deal to do in the spring; and in these seasonal variations only the best men are kept on while the worst men are thrown out—the men who are most likely to become tramps, and they wander in search of labour. Of course, a very large proportion of working men belong to trade unions; all the best of them do. There is a blue-book of the Board of Trade which tells us that a large number of trade unions grant travelling allowances. And practically most decent working men, if they cannot get a travelling allowance from their trade union, have got somebody to assist them. If their labour is much wanted at a given place, the master would help them to get there, or somebody will lend them sufficient for travelling expenses; so as to the good class of working men, I take it, there are very few, except in seasons of exceptional depression, that are obliged to resort to the casual ward.

642. Have you thought out whether there could be any practicable scheme of placarding in the various workhouses information as to whether and where work could be got for the various operatives?—I think that might be very useful.

643. If there were such information published on the walls, or on a slate in the workhouse or the police station, it would be a great assistance to the honest tramp who was really in search of work?—Yes, I would like somehow to extend the system of labour bureaux. On the other hand, you would probably sooner have your bureau not at a workhouse, which would give it a sort of quasi-pauper tinge, but elsewhere. However, any arrangement of that sort at workhouses would be useful in the rare cases where tramps really want work, for it would tell them where to get it.

644. (Captain Showers.) It is suggested that tramps are perfectly ready to work and can work, but that they cannot get employment while they are clothed as they are. Do you think there is anything in that?—Something.

645. I mean to say, a bootmaker, for instance, might not be taken on, because he is in such a ragged state?—I have no doubt there are some genuine cases like that. But, after all, there are very few industrious men who would not be helped to old clothes if their wants were made known.

646. (Mr. Davy.) I gathered from your previous evidence that you did not think that there was any considerable number of what is known as the honest wayfarer in the ordinary tramp wards?—Very few indeed in ordinary times.

647. Would you make any exception in their treatment, at the discretion of the workhouse master?—I am coming to a suggestion which I may put before the Committee in which in my own particular opinion there are some possibilities at any rate. In the first place, I would have the diet uniform and with no alternatives. One thing I feel sure of is that people generally will always recognise some force in the present objection that a man gets better fed in prison than he does in the casual ward, and he ought to have enough food to work upon. So I should somewhat level up the feeding in the casual ward. It is not for me to say whether the prison diet for short term prisoners can to any extent be levelled down to meet it, but that is a matter which will no doubt be considered. Then I should like to see the work made so far as possible uniform, not necessarily in character but in the degree of exertion and the time occupied; and I would have no piece work, but time work, so to speak. I quite admit that there is convenience in saying that a man must do so much work; and that it might be in certain cases more difficult to prove negligence, before magistrates, if you do not have a task; but on the whole I should like time labour. As to its character, the guardians might have a fairly free hand, and I should like to see the introduction of some work suited to persons of low physique. At present the task is very often grotesquely exaggerated in newspapers, and we find comments on the wickedness of making a poor weak man break so many hundredweight of stones. Sometimes the magistrate goes and hammers stones for half an hour and finds a great difficulty in breaking them; and he goes on the Bench and he describes what he has done, and his personal exertions and all that sort of thing, and the poor man is discharged, generally with his tongue in his cheek. To my mind there is a great deal more consideration shown by workhouse masters and superintendents of tramp wards than people believe: I mean a weak man is not set to do the whole task; a weak man is very often set to easy jobs, but of course that depends on what sort of man the workhouse master is. I would, however, take away the discretionary power of discharge now possessed by the guardians and the master. I would keep all casuals not provided with tickets for the prescribed time, the two nights; or in the case of two visits within a month, the four nights. At present the master is allowed to discharge a man if he says he is going to work. Well, they all say they are going to work; and he has got to satisfy the master. But I would not have the master satisfied by anything short of a ticket bearing evidence that the man is a genuine worker. If a man at present wants to tramp through the country and if there is no exception made, what happens to him? Well, he has three days a week to himself. He says he wants to look for work, it is very hard if he cannot look for work; but it is not an unreasonable condition to my mind that he should spend three days a week in working for the guardians in return for his board and lodging, and three days a week in looking for labour. If he is going through the country at the cost of the public, it seems fair that he should work half his time for the public. That is all that the present system would do, if there were no exception at all; but I would make it even better for him to a certain extent in this way: I would give him a ticket which would allow him to do only four hours' work, but I would hedge round the grant of that ticket with considerable precautions. I would not grant it on any statement of what he is going to do; but I would grant it on evidence of what he has done. Find out whether he is a worker and whether he really wants work. Find out whether he has worked in order to entitle him to such a ticket as I mention, which it seems to me should be granted by the police of the place where he has worked; and let the case be first thoroughly investigated. Of course, the difficulty of identification comes in to some extent. There might be sales of tickets from one to the other; there might be difficulty in identifying the legitimate owner of a ticket, and so on, but I imagine that that is to be got over, that you might have such a description of the man as would identify him. I do not know whether you could actually take steps to bring photography in, but you might have such a ticket in these exceptional circumstances (for they would be exceptional) as would identify the man and the ticket; and with it, instead of being detained two nights, he should be able to go through the country without detention; to sleep at the workhouse, to have supper and breakfast; in the morning to do a task which should not be for more than four hours; and then go on, so that he would have, bar the four hours, all his time for looking for work. I would let the ticket be issued only on a proof that he was a working man, and I should like to see a thorough machinery established for that. Of course, the first outcry would be: "Is the British working man to have discharge notes, and is he to carry passports and papers about with him like a wretched foreigner?" That would be the popular outcry. But the answer to that, it seems to me, is this: We do not want him to do so at all; he need not carry anything; he need not get any papers if he does not want special treatment; if he does not desire one of these tickets, we will keep him going through all the country as we keep him now; but he will have to work three days a week. If, however, he chooses to get evidence of his being a worker, not a loafer, in that case we will not detain him, and we will make it easy for him.

648. How long will that ticket last?—A limited time, I should think. Certainly not more than two or three months.

649. And who would be the first giver of the ticket?—Somebody at the place where he had been employed.

650. The employer?—A certificate of employment, if duly authenticated, might suffice.

651. Would not the effect be that that ticket would be a certificate which would entitle the holder to demand alms; would it not be a very useful instrument for mendicancy?—But if it had to be authenticated by the police, they would not grant it to a mendicant.

652. No; but if it is granted by the employer?—I suggest that it should be either granted or authenticated by the police who should make inquiry of the employer. If the employer would not give a discharge note with the necessary particulars, the police should ascertain the facts and grant a certificate to the effect that A. B. (fully describing him) has been employed at X's factory from such a date to such a date.

653. Are you a believer in the maxim, "Once on the road always on the road"?—No, not quite. Of course, a man who is beer-sodden, especially when he comes on the road rather late in life, never gets off it; but there are men who do a bit of tramping in which they are really in search of work, especially at times of depression. Now, my scheme would meet that point. Suppose a man is discharged from a factory at Southampton, he hears there is work at Bristol, he wants to make his way there. I should like some sort of evidence that this man has been working at Southampton for a particular time, and if he gets this evidence in the form of a ticket, I would let him go from workhouse to workhouse with only four hours' detention daily.

654. You do not think there would be a danger that that man, who when he started really was a searcher for work, would degenerate into a vagrant?—I do not think there would be any additional difficulty; I think it would facilitate his looking for work.

655. Do you not think getting familiar with the vagrant wards and associating with vagrants would have a detrimental effect on his character?—Possibly; but then the best men would probably not avail themselves of this; such few working men as now tramp really in search of work would be better off because they would not be hampered by present restrictions, and I would make exceptions only in that form.

656. Do you not think the truest kindness to a man on the road is to get him off it somehow by deterrent means?—No doubt that is so.

657. And have you not urged on boards of guardians the necessity of strictness; and are you not constantly met with instances of supposed hardship to honest wayfarers?—Yes.

658. Is it not one of the most notorious examples of the Poor Law maxim that the exception becomes the vicious rule?—Yes, that is one reason against the present exceptions authorised by the Order.

659. In fact, the hypothetical wayfarer in search of work prevents a proper administration as regards the others?—Yes; but then my plan would be to separate the two. I do not care twopence about what the man who has not been working says he is going to do; what I want is proof as to what he has done, and that is the evidence which seems to me to be the best plan of discriminating between your professional tramp and your man who is really in search of work.

660. The first part of your scheme is that the exemption should be granted by somebody other than the officials of the workhouse?—Other than the officials of the workhouse.

661. (Sir William Chance.) These are very exceptional cases to which you refer. As a rule a man who wants work can make his way to any centre he likes in the ordinary way by rail; it is very cheap?—Yes.

662. His trade society would pay his fare?—Probably, if he belongs to one.

663. Is it not rather a dangerous thing to introduce the way-ticket system for a very limited class. It implies considerable expense—the expense of keeping him in the casual ward. If he satisfied some charitable agency or the police that he was actually bona fide in search of work, and that he had not the means to go where he hears there is work, would it not be cheaper that they should pay his fare to the particular place?—The best men would usually apply to their trade union or to some private source, but when there is great depression of trade, there is a certain number of men who are in search of work and who have no such resource. For those my change would give greater facilities, since at present they may have to depend on the will of this or that workhouse master whether they are or are not to be exempted from detention. I would cut off all the exceptions, and say, "You shall not make any exception whatever on the ground that a man is in search of work, unless he produces evidence in the shape of a ticket obtained in this particular way from the police of the place where he has worked. In that case only will you do what you do now. At present you make exceptions with regard to casuals who say they are working men when they are not; then you would only consider them working men when they produce evidence of it."

664. (Mr. Davy.) You would make your ticket holder do some work?—Yes.

665. When would he do it?—In the morning.

666. How long would it take him?—Four hours.

667. Till eleven o'clock?—As at present in the case of the man who is detained only one day.

668. Would you not have the same complaint that you used to have, that 11 o'clock is too late to go out to look for work?—He has got most of the day before him. I would not suggest dispensing with a task altogether.

669. At present we are depending a great deal on the discretion of workhouse masters?—That is so. That is what I want to abolish.

670. Now, when you first became an Inspector were you not struck by the kindness of workhouse masters as a body?—When I first became an Inspector and ever since, I have been struck with the humanity of workhouse masters and workhouse officials generally. The rubbish that is talked about their cruelty is contrary to common sense. Why should they be cruel?

671. Would not any harshness on the part of a workhouse master be extremely unpopular with the guardians?—Extremely.

672. Do you not find it so in your experience?—Yes; they inquire into any case and question the workhouse master on the slightest suspicion. There is nothing upon which they are so keen. I have known a workhouse master perfectly kindly as well as capable, who has been hauled up on some accusation ridiculous on the face of it; but he has been called to account and examined; and the whole desire of the guardians has been evidently to treat with great indulgence every complainant. That has happened over and over again.

673. (Mr. Simpson.) You think that feeling does lead often to an undeserving tramp being treated too indulgently?—Very often; I think the great fault at present is that an enormous number of exceptions are made. In point of fact, people are treated as in search of work who are not in search of work, and that is one thing which I want mended.

674. (Mr. Davy.) The only exception you would make would be in the case where a ticket was granted by a recognised authority?—Yes.

Mr. H.
Preston-
Thomas.

Oct. 1904.

Mr. H
Preston-
Thomas.

27 Oct. 1904.

675. (Captain Showers.) And when you find a very strict disciplinarian in the shape of a workhouse master, the tramps give that workhouse the go-by?—Very often. I know on a special case of that sort.

676. (Chairman.) The police could probably greatly assist your scheme of the way-ticket by means of telephonic communication or otherwise: they would thus have the means of identifying the tramp and of preventing him giving a false account of himself?—Yes.

678. Do you think there would be any difficulty in separating the vagrants into three categories: first, what I should call the criminal class, that is the men who can work and will not; secondly, the men who would do work if they could get it; and, thirdly, the incapable men from age or otherwise?—Yes, there are all those three classes; of course also border cases, but those are, no doubt, the broad divisions. Whether you could ever make your regulations so as to apply differently to each of those three classes, I do not know. I have great hesitation in suggesting the possibility of making different regulations except as regards the one class, the class that has shown that it is working.

679. Take the first one; if they do not quite, they narrowly approach a criminal class?—No doubt.

680. The second, there is no criminality about them at all, it is from no fault of their own that they cannot get work?—Yes.

681. The third is the class of incapable men, from age or otherwise?—Yes.

682. (Mr. Davy.) Would you detain all women?—Yes, I think so.

683. Do you ever have women say to you that they like the rest in the workhouse?—Yes.

684. They want to stay the two days?—Yes.

685. Do you ever have complaints that tramp women have a difficulty in getting into the workhouse?—Only once that I remember.

686. That would be a great hardship, would it not?—A great hardship. If I found a workhouse master repelling women, I have great doubts as to whether I should not ask my Board's leave to hold a formal inquiry whether he should not be turned out. In the one case to which I refer they did, at my instance, give the master the severest possible censure and even threatened him with dismissal.

687. Yet, strictly speaking, the workhouse master can only admit them on sudden and urgent necessity?—Yes.

688. (Chairman.) Can you at all account for the smaller number of women than men as vagrants, having regard to the ordinary numbers of the population, male and female?—Well, I suppose, one thing is that a good many of the tramps have deserted their wives, and of course it is much easier for a man to tramp than for a woman to tramp, and I believe it is almost the universal experience abroad, as well as in England, that the men tramp and not the women.

689. It is a remarkable fact that there are so very few women on the road compared with men?—Yes.

690. I suppose it would be very difficult to establish what has become of the women?—Yes. I fancy that a great many of them are deserted. Some men never marry; a man takes to the road early, and he has different relations with different women in turn, and he never settles down and marries, but goes on tramping.

691. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) What is the proportion of ordinary inmates of the workhouse; are the women more numerous than the men there?—There are about a third more men than women in workhouses.

692. (Chairman.) Is there anything you would like to add by way of summing up?—I do not think I have anything else that I need bring before you. As I understand, anything as to my report on Swiss vagrancy will be deferred to some future time.

693. (Sir William Chance.) Is it not a fact that the large mass of the people who resort to casual wards are professional tramps?—That is a fact, no doubt.

694. Is it not a fact that if one could get rid of casual almsgiving all over the country, that class of vagrant could not exist; I mean to say he could not continue travelling by the road; he has got to get food and money to pay his way?—Yes.

695. If that almsgiving could be stopped would there not probably be four courses left for him; he would either have to work, or he would have to steal, or he would have to go into the workhouse as a destitute person, or he would have to come into the army of the unemployed?—Yes, no doubt.

696. If he were destitute he would be taken into the workhouse; if he went to work it would be very advantageous to him; if he had to steal he would fall into the hands of the police, which would not be a bad thing; if he were driven to join the unemployed, then the question of labour colonies would come in?—Yes.

697. But I suppose it is your opinion, that, if it were not for this private casual almsgiving, the professional vagrant would not be able to live on the road?—I think he would vanish.

698. Does not a large amount of that support which he gets come from the poorer classes?—Yes; and that is one of the great difficulties.

699. He gets a good deal of that support by threats in out of the way places?—Sometimes almost by force.

700. A man will be away from home at work, and the tramp will go to his cottage, and if he is not given anything at first he will threaten and get money in that way?—Yes.

701. He gets a large amount of alms by threats?—There is no doubt. I believe the main amount comes in pence and halfpence.

702. (Mr. Davy.) What do you put the earnings of an ordinary tramp at?—I have heard them stated at from 2s. 6d. to 5s. a day, but there was one tramp a little while ago in the West who made 12s. 6d. in a day. This fellow said his brother was seriously ill, and he carried about a letter addressed to his brother at a distant place, and he begged a stamp for the letter. He went to 150 houses scattered about in different places; at only three or four houses did he receive refusals to give him a stamp to write to his dying brother, and he got over 12s. by the haul.

703. (Chairman.) If a man knows that on conviction for vagrancy, say on a third conviction within a certain time of the first, he would go to prison for three months, do you not think that would have a considerable deterrent effect?—Very considerable indeed. The Vagrancy Act provides amply for cumulative penalties, but, unluckily, the magistrates never impose them.

704. If magistrates could be induced to take that course, it would be highly deterrent?—Undoubtedly.

705. (Dr. Downes.) You have laid much stress on uniformity of treatment, uniformity of dietary, uniformity of work, and uniformity of detention. Do you think that an Order of the Local Government Board would be sufficient to ensure the greater uniformity that you desire?—There might be exceptions, no doubt, at some very small places. They do not care very much for Orders or anything else, and they feed the man with what happens to come handy; but if a general Order required that a man was to have so much bread and so much gruel for breakfast, and so much (whatever you fixed) for dinner, and so much bread and so much broth for supper, I have no doubt that all the big unions, broadly speaking, would carry it out exactly, and even the little ones would carry it out substantially.

706. (Chairman.) In the last resort at any rate you could have legislation?—Yes.

707. (Mr. Davy.) It would be much easier to enforce uniformity, would it not, for time work than for piece work?—I think so.

708. You would get rid of the difficulties with regard to the quantity of stones and so on?—Yes, that is what specially struck me.

709. Do you think you would get convictions?—I think you would get more than you do now perhaps.

710. (Captain Showers.) And longer sentences?—Very likely.

711. (Mr. Davy.) We want to know how you would secure uniformity of detention?—I would detain everybody.

712. Everybody?—Everybody without one of the tickets; everyone else I would detain for two nights and a whole day, and make them work.

713. Would it be your duty in going round a workhouse to see whether that had been carried out?—I think so.

714. If everybody had to be detained, you could ascertain whether there were any exceptions?—Quite so. I would not give workhouse officials power to make any exception whatever. I would require them to have regard to the capacity of the individual with respect both to the description and the amount of the work to be done, but the time of detention should be unalterable.

715. If you had no exceptions you could enforce it?—That is so.

716. Then the Board could enforce that, could they not, either by dismissing the master in case of refusal to detain, or by the process of law in case the guardians were recalcitrant?—Quite so.

717. (Chairman.) I think I understand from you that your idea is that the ticket should be a police ticket granted by the superintendent or inspector of police at, shall I say, the town of origin. I will give you an idea of my own: say the man has been at work at a shipyard at Hull; the shipyard gives up work; "Now," he says, "I will go on to Middlesbrough, or to the Tyne, and see if I cannot get work at some shipyard there." He goes to the superintendent of police at Hull, he gets a ticket from him, noting that he is going, we will say, to Middlesbrough, and he then can with the ticket call at police station after police station, and if you like, have it viséd, stamped as he goes on, and then he comes to Middlesbrough. If he finds he cannot get work there, he has got his police ticket showing he is honestly in search of work, and it would be renewed at Middlesbrough and he would be passed on to the Tyne?—Yes, except that my own notion was not to require renewal, but let a ticket be in force for say three or four months, and that he should be able to go to a workhouse for a single night and be discharged after four hours' work next morning; that on discharge he should (like other casuals) receive a ticket for a mid-day meal at a police station at a distance.

718. This would involve a mid-day meal?—This would involve a mid-day meal, but to my mind a mid-day meal is a necessary corollary to proper detention and adequate work. If you make the man do a good hard day's work and detain him a certain time, then you must feed him in the interval of going on, and a mid-day meal is, in my opinion, desirable.

719. (Mr. Davy.) The ticket will not be given by the police except on evidence?—Except on evidence of what he has done.

720. Evidence that he had been employed recently?—That he had been employed recently for so long.

721. It would be necessary, would it not, to have that given with a good deal of care?—With great care.

722. By a very responsible person?—Undoubtedly.

723. Do you suggest the chief constable?—At any rate somebody in a sufficiently responsible position in the police force to make certain that the ticket would not be granted without thorough verification of the facts.

Mr. H. Preston-Thomas.

27 Oct. 1904.

724. (Captain Showers.) That would entail the constable going to the place where the man said he was employed and finding out if he had been employed and giving him a ticket?—Yes.

725. (Mr. Davy.) A ticket would entitle him to a bed at the workhouse and an evening and a morning meal?—Yes; and the workhouse master would give him an order for a mid-day meal at a police station.

726. (Sir William Chance.) The possibility of detention depends on the possibility of accommodation being forthcoming?—That is so.

727. Now how would you meet this difficulty; as we know happens very often, there are large railway works going on that attract people from all parts of the country. The consequence is you have an inrush into particular casual wards. Now, is that not liable to upset your arrangement for two days' detention; how would you deal with it?—Well, there is the possibility of that in the present arrangements in individual places. Of course you cannot meet that absolutely, but a good master can generally improvise accommodation. I have often said, "Have you given any tickets for the common lodging-house this half year?"—"No, I never do that, I find them a place somewhere here. I have got a vacant sort of shed place, I manage something." No doubt those exceptional cases will be always difficult to deal with, as they are now.

728. (Mr. Davy.) The tramps who rush to places where there are works are not workers as a rule, but hangers on to the workers?—That is so.

729. (Dr. Downes.) Is there not a possible difficulty in getting the boards of guardians to provide suitable accommodation?—Now and then. But one difficulty is this. I scarcely know one board of guardians that is not clamouring for uniformity. When I say, "Really, I think you ought to build some casual wards here" their answer is, "If every board of guardians has to do it, very well; but what is the use of our building casual wards when at the neighbouring workhouse they do not detain, they do not do anything." "Well," I say, "defend yourselves," but they always harp on that one string of uniformity. No doubt there may be difficulty with some small workhouses, but when you have uniformity of treatment and detention (though not necessarily in cells) everywhere, I think there will be much less difficulty than there is at present in persuading guardians to make the necessary arrangements. Of course now we can force the guardians to do it, but it is brutum fulmen. The Act is never appealed to; we have never forced any board of guardians to build cells for casuals as far as I know; we have recommended them and advocated them.

730. (Chairman.) I should like to say, Mr. Preston-Thomas, that the Committee are much obliged to you for the valuable evidence you have given.

Major E. G. CLAYTON, Secretary to the Prison Commissioners, called; and Examined.

731. (Chairman.) Major Clayton, you are the Secretary, I believe, to the Prison Commissioners?—I am.

732. Will you kindly give us some evidence as to the dietary in local prisons; when was it changed and when was the existing dietary instituted?—The existing dietary was instituted in consequence of the recommendations of the Committee of which you were Chairman.

733. Would you kindly give us the date when the change was made?—The old Class 1 and 2 diets were abolished and the new A and B diets introduced on the 21st April, 1899. It was immediately after the Report of your Committee, which was signed in December, 1898. The Report was so strong regarding Class 1 and Class 2 diets that the Secretary of State issued a new rule almost immediately and they were brought in at once.

734. It might be perhaps useful to know what the changes in Class 1 were; we might get that on the notes,

I think?—Class 1 diet on the old scale—you want now to deal with men only—was: breakfast, eight ounces of bread; dinner, one and a half pints of stirabout; and supper, eight ounces of bread. That was the diet for seven days. The new dietary that was introduced on the recommendation of your Committee, now called Class A, is, for men, for breakfast, eight ounces of bread and a pint of gruel—that was an addition of a pint of gruel for breakfast; for dinner on Sunday, eight ounces of bread and a pint of porridge; on Monday, eight ounces of bread and eight ounces of potatoes; on Tuesday eight ounces of bread and one pint of porridge; on Wednesday eight ounces of bread and eight ounces of suet pudding; on Thursday eight ounces of bread and eight ounces of potatoes; on Friday eight ounces of bread and one pint of porridge; on Saturday eight ounces of bread and eight ounces of suet pudding; and supper daily was eight ounces of bread and a pint of gruel.

Major E. G. Clayton.

27 Oct. 1904.

Major E. G. Clayton. 735. The principal alteration being the addition of the gruel morning and evening ?—And the variety of the dinner.

27 Oct. 1904.

736. Do you know, Major Clayton, what the difference in cost was in that particular diet ?—No, I am not aware what it was. The difference between the two diets is shown concisely in your Report.

737. Then with regard to the other dietaries ?—No. 3 and 4 were introduced on the 2nd September, 1901. These did not affect vagrants at all.

738. Or a similar class of men to vagrants ?—No.

739. But, generally speaking, I think the change was to give a greater variety ?—A greater variety.

740. A greater variety and rather more fatty substance ?—And rather more fatty substance. That was the main change.

741. The changes were made on medical grounds ?—They were made on medical grounds. No less than twenty-seven, I think, of the visiting committees of prisons recommended to your Committee that the old No. 1 diet should be either abolished or improved.

742. (Mr. Simpson.) That was the diet for the first seven days ?—Yes.

743. (Chairman.) I think no alteration with regard to the admission diet was made on a recommendation on our part ?—The admission diet remained what it was.

744. I think we did not propose any alteration ?—You said “We do not recommend any change in the diet on the first day of reception.”

745. The admission diet remained as before ?—Yes; I might point out about that reception diet, that it looks a very good diet indeed as printed, but as a matter of fact hardly any prisoner ever gets any of it but supper.

746. And perhaps you would say what the supper is ?—The supper is a pint of porridge and half a pound of bread.

747. (Dr. Downes.) I think that admission diet is in accordance with Standing Order 226 of the 24th January, 1895, in pursuance of a Rule made on the 17th March, 1892 ?—Yes, the Rule giving effect to it was made in March, 1892. I have not looked up the Standing Orders.

748. (Chairman.) I do not think much turns upon it; it is only, I think, material to us to know that no alteration was made in the admission diet by our Report ?—No, there was no alteration made.

749. (Dr. Downes.) It has been suggested that the admission diet was one cause of the recent increase of convictions ?—It has been in force for a long time.

750. (Chairman.) Then, as far as the experience of the Prison Commissioners goes, has the present dietary been satisfactory ?—Yes, it has been reported on satisfactorily by the medical officers.

751. Have you heard it suggested that its introduction has rather led people more to seek the comfort of the prison ?—I have heard it stated in a vague way very often; I do not believe it.

752. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you ever find during the first seven days that prisoners return any of the food ?—I do not think they do now; they used to return the stirabout very much in the old days of the Class I diet.

753. What is the difference between stirabout and gruel ?—Stirabout is made of Indian meal.

754. (Chairman.) They rather objected to the sweetness of the Indian meal ?—Yes.

755. (Mr. Davy.) What was the exact date of the introduction of the new diet: the Class A ?—The exact date was the 21st April, 1899.

756. Will you look at the figures I have here (see Appendix XVIII.) as to the number of convictions; take first of all workhouse offences, misbehaviour of paupers. You see the convictions mount from 2,500 in 1893 to 3,300 in 1899, and 3,400, 4,700, and 5,600 in the following years; a very large increase, was there not ?—Not in 1899; it went down in that year.

757. But since 1899 ?—There is a large increase between 1899 and 1902.

758. We have had evidence that during that period there was no change in workhouse regulations. Now, take begging, which has nothing to do with workhouse regulations; the number of convictions each year beginning at 1893 are 11,000, 13,000, 10,000, 11,000, 10,000, 11,000; then in 1899 the number is 9,000, and the following years are 8,000, 10,000 and 12,000. Quite a large increase, is there not ?—Yes; they have gone back more or less to the first figures.

759. Is there any reason that you can give for the recent increase in number ?—No; I cannot give you any reason.

760. You observe it occurs immediately after the adoption of the new dietary ?—Oh, no, excuse me, I do not observe that; it went down for the first two years after the new dietary was introduced.

761. The change was in April, 1899. From then the numbers go up steadily ?—Which figures are you taking ?

762. Misbehaviour by paupers ?—In 1899 the number was 3,309, which is 108 less than in 1898. 1899 was the year in which the new dietary was instituted.

763. In April ?—In April.

764. It was, therefore, only for part of the year ?—It was for eight months.

765. The next year they come up to 3,400 ?—3,407, the same as they were in 1898, or rather ten less.

766. They then jump up from 3,400 to 4,749 ?—Yes.

767. And in 1902 they further go up to 5,620 ?—Yes.

768. Is there any reason that you can give for that ?—No, I have no reason at all to give you; I do not know why they should go up.

769. Now take the figures as to convictions for begging ?—Yes. In 1899 the total went down from 11,066 to 9,317.

770. And then ?—In 1900 it went down still further to 8,416, when the new diets had been in force nearly two years; in 1901 it went up to nearly as much as in 1898; and about the same as 1897. In 1902 it went up in the large way that the others went up too.

771. To over 12,000 ?—Yes, and even then it is less than 1894, ten years ago, when the prison population was much smaller.

772. Supposing that the new diet were attractive, it would take some time before its attractions were known, would it not ?—A very short time indeed.

773. You think the prison population would know ?—They would know very soon; they know the arrangements in workhouses too; they know immediately they are altered.

774. Have there been any other changes in prison discipline concurrently with this ?—Not concurrently; there have been other changes made since the Act of 1896, and also of course since the Departmental Committee of 1894, which led to the abolition of tread mills.

775. Other forms of labour of the same sort have been abolished too, have they not—cranks ?—Yes, cranks.

776. Cranks and tread mills ?—All unproductive labour has been abolished.

777. So that a short-time prisoner has not got either the tread mill or the crank ?—No.

778. Has he any hard work ?—Yes, he has hard work, certainly.

779. Of what nature ?—Either stone breaking or heavy sack making. Stone breaking he has in some prisons. It varies according to the work there is available in the prison.

780. Stone breaking with a hammer, not crushing ?—Stone breaking with a hammer, not crushing.

781. Is that a task work ?—Yes.

782. So many cwts. ?—Yes.

783. Would that be given to prisoners of seven days ?—Yes, if they were fit for it. I should tell you that 50 per cent. of the prisoners we receive are never certified as fit for hard labour at all.

784. They are examined by the medical officer when they come in ?—Yes, and that relates especially to the class of vagrants and beggars, and people who sleep out and who commit offences against the workhouse regulations. I went into the figures this morning. I find that nearly 50 per cent. are unfit for hard labour.

785. Now take a man who gets seven days; supposing he is convicted on Monday, would he be taken to the prison on that evening?—As a rule, yes.

786. Then on Tuesday?—On Tuesday he would begin work.

787. He would be examined by the medical officer on Tuesday?—He would be examined by the medical officer. As soon as he is certified fit for labour he is told off.

788. About what time of day would that be?—About ten o'clock, I suppose.

789. He would do that day's work?—Yes;

790. And he would go on till Sunday?—He would go on till Saturday morning; he would be discharged on Saturday morning; we do not discharge on Sunday.

791. You do not keep them over the Sunday?—No.

792. Seven days means six days really?—If he is convicted on Monday.

793. (Captain Showers.) Then it would really mean four days' work?—Yes, four days.

794. (Mr. Davy.) Supposing he got three days, would he do any labour at all?—He would do one day's labour, that is all.

795. And a week's imprisonment means four days' labour?—That is only if he is convicted on Monday.

796. Would a man, even if he were able-bodied, be sent to hard labour, stone breaking or some such work, for the four days?—Yes, certainly.

797. Stone breaking does not prevail in all prisons, does it?—No; the work varies in different prisons.

798. What is the substitute?—There are various classes of labour—hard labour; there is stone breaking, and making heavy coal sacks.

799. Is that hard work?—Yes, it is hard work.

800. Will it make a man sweat?—It would depend on the weather.

801. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Coal sack making would be in separation; that is a feature of it, too?—All hard labour is in separation.

802. (Mr. Davy.) Well, take a man in for a week, would he be in solitary confinement the whole time?—Yes; separate confinement continues up to twenty-eight days.

803. And his work would be task work?—Yes, according to his capability. If he is not fit to do hard labour the medical officer tasks him himself.

804. (Chairman.) The medical officer is, of course, supreme as to the man's fitness for work?—Yes, entirely.

805. Are there any cranks now in use?—No.

806. I thought there were—for corn?—Oh, no, we do not use any now; we have abolished them all.

807. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Do you suppose that many men of the tramp class are fit for the crank?—About 50 per cent.

808. That is as much as there ever was?—That is so.

809. (Mr. Simpson.) The tread wheel was particularly hard for a man who had any weakness of the heart, because of the position?—I should think it would be, but that is rather a medical question. I am quite sure that no medical man ever certified that a man was fit for the tread wheel who had anything the matter with his heart.

810. (Captain Showers.) If a man goes to gaol on Tuesday, he does not begin work really till Wednesday. Sunday, I take it, he does no work whatever; and he is let out on the Tuesday morning?—He is let out on the Monday morning.

811. If he comes in on Tuesday he goes out on Monday morning?—He goes out on Monday morning.

812. Therefore he does no work on Sunday or Monday?—Yes; seven days' labour is practically four days.

813. (Mr. Simpson.) Seven days always means four days' work?—Well, yes.

814. (Mr. Davy.) The longer the sentence the less would be the number of idle days proportionately?—Yes, proportionately. You see the day of conviction counts as one day, and the day of discharge counts as one day.

815. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) A three days' sentence is one day of labour to two of idleness really, that is what it comes to?—Yes. Major E. G. Clayton.

27 Oct. 1904.

816. (Mr. Simpson.) But there are a good many formalities necessary for the reception and discharge of prisoners, are there not?—Yes, a great many.

817. It gives a great deal of trouble about their clothing and property, and so on, entering them in a register?—Yes.

818. For instance, two men sentenced to fourteen days give a great deal more trouble than one man sentenced to twenty-eight days?—A great deal more.

819. And of the prisoners who come to prison for fourteen days or less, should you say that tramps form the majority?—I have not looked into that.

820. But there are a very large number for begging and sleeping out?—Yes.

821. For less than fourteen days?—Yes; they are mostly seven days.

822. (Mr. Davy.) You have no information as to the sentences given by magistrates—no classified information have you?—No; we are going to get it at the end of this year for the different offences.

823. In the figures I have here, which are taken from the return as to criminal statistics, I see that all the sentences under fourteen days are lumped together?—Yes, they are all lumped together.

824. (Chairman.) A remarkable proportion of short sentences to the whole?—Yes, an enormous proportion.

825. (Mr. Davy.) The short sentences entail a great deal of trouble on governors and officers of prisons, I suppose?—More in proportion than longer sentences.

826. (Dr. Downes.) Can you tell me if the number of prisoners on hospital diet has diminished or been in any way affected since the new dietary has been introduced into the prisons?—I have not got the information here, but I could get it for you of course.

827. Have you any classification as to prison labour, what you would call hard labour, light labour, and so on?—There is only hard labour and industrial labour.

828. Can you tell us what the occupations of hard labour would be; you have given us some, I think?—I have given you nearly all, I think.

829. (Chairman.) Shot drill is gone?—That never was in force in civil prisons; that was in military prisons, but it has now gone from them.

830. (Mr. Simpson.) Was it not before 1865 in civil prisons?—I do not know; my memory does not go back so far as that.

831. (Dr. Downes.) I thought possibly you might have some official list of them?—Yes, it is in the Standing Orders.

832. (Chairman.) Will a man who has learned a trade exercise it in making things, for instance in mat making?—Not for his own benefit.

833. There is very little productive labour is there?—A very great deal of productive industrial labour, very much more than there ever was.

834. Well, now, what is there principally?—Making mail bags for the Post Office, baskets for the Post Office, parcels baskets and all sorts of things.

835. These are not for sale?—No, these are not for sale. The only things that are sold to the public are mats, and these in very small quantities. We make all Government mats, of course.

836. Years ago there was a great deal more of that?—There was more sold to the public.

837. There was a public objection to that?—Yes. The productive labour is very much larger than it ever was before and the value of it is very much larger.

838. Are the men taught more than they used to be?—Yes.

839. They are taught trades more?—Yes, we have instructors now. We never used to have them.

840. When was that change made?—I am not quite sure.

Major E. G. Clayton. 841. It is quite of late years?—Yes, since I was Secretary.

27 Oct. 1904. 842. (Captain Showers.) Have they ceased to make cocoanut matting?—Do you mean the fibre mats? They are still making them in certain prisons.

843. (Mr. Davy.) You say you appointed industrial instructors?—Yes.

844. The benefit of the industrial instructors would be practically confined to the long sentence prisoners, would it not?—Yes.

845. Men could not learn anything worth having in seven days?—They do not go into the trades parties—the men who come in for seven days; they are simply given some work in their cells.

846. How long must the sentence be before a man receives any instruction?—A man would not receive any positive instruction in a party until he has been in prison twenty-eight days. After doing fourteen days in the first stage, he may get, if the prison industries allow it, instruction in bag making or in sack making; he cannot learn much in the time, it is impossible.

847. (Chairman.) You probably would not set to work to instruct a prisoner in anything definite of that sort if he were sentenced to less than three months?—He would not be put into a party until he had served twenty-eight days, after which an opportunity would be given of learning sewing or other simple work.

848. (Mr. Simpson.) The labour that is put on prisoners up to twenty-eight days is really only intended to make prison unpleasant to him, not to improve him?—That is all, for the first twenty-eight days.

849. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Was it not laid down by Mr. Gladstone's Committee and successive Secretaries of State that prison diets were not to be penal?—It was in the reference to the Committee of 1898 by the Secretary of State that the diets were not to be a means of punishment. It says, "In considering the question of dietary the main principle to be kept in view by the Committee will be the fact that the ordinary prison diet is not to be regarded as an instrument of punishment. At the same time any approach, either to indulgence or excess, will be avoided, so that prison diets may not bear too favourable a comparison with the diets of free labourers in the outside world, or of the inmates of workhouses." That meant the regular inmates, not the casual paupers.

FOURTH DAY.

Monday, 28th November, 1904.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair.)

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.
Captain SHOWERS.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary.)

Mr. JOSEPH BROWN, Dewsbury, and Mr. G. W. MEATS, Hereford, called; Mr. BROWN Examined.

Mr. J. Brown. 850. (Chairman.) Mr. Brown, you are, I believe, president of the Association of Poor Law Unions of England and Wales?—(Mr. Brown.) I have that honour.

28 Nov. 1904. 851. You are aware that we are inquiring into the present state of the law with regard to vagrancy, and how far that law is satisfactory, and whether any additional legislation or any alteration in the administration of the present law is requisite?—Yes, sir.

852. Would you kindly now tell us your views on the subject?—I have been a guardian rather more than twenty-eight years. The one thing that has surprised me in connection with the office has been the everlasting cropping up of this tramp question at conferences and gatherings of poor law authorities. Far be it from me to want to trouble the Committee with the subjects and the various forms in which that subject has arisen at these conferences, but nobody can have attended them without having noted that it is always cropping up, and on several occasions we have had conferences directly upon the question. I remember, at least twenty years ago, attending a conference on this question in Middlesbrough, where certain recommendations were made with regard to differential treatment of certain classes of tramps, but nothing ever came of that, and, so far as I know, we have never been able to effect any material improvement. Acting on recommendations made, the Local Government Board did alter the regulations as to admission and discharge. That appeared to me only to exercise a very temporary beneficent result on the tramps. I noticed that in our own union it did reduce the number temporarily, but afterwards they got up even higher than they were before. It seems to me that the need is to alter the character of the treatment. It is my opinion that this largely becomes a question of habit. I have known several persons, three I have before my mind particularly in connection with my acquaintance with the question. At Dewsbury there were three men, since I became a guardian, that fell out of work, casually in the first instance, so it appeared to me, and they came to us for temporary assistance which they got. They did not appear to like the kind of treatment we gave them. Well, we have made it a rule in cases of that sort to give a full week's work and relief according to the size of the family. We do not give a man with a small family as much as we should give a man with a big family, but we expect the same amount of work from him. He has to come to us and work a number of days, we give him two or three half days, two or three mornings a week in which to go and seek work. It seemed that these men took exception to the treatment, and they gradually drifted off as tramps, and to-day these men are tramping about in the West Riding. I imagine they rarely go outside the West Riding by the frequency with which they appear at Dewsbury, varying their appearance between the board of guardians and the police court. One of these men has been sentenced fifty-two times to short periods of imprisonment. One of the men was before the Bench last week when I was there. I have had the privilege of sitting on the Bench now for a few years as chairman of the district council in the neighbourhood, and that gave me the opportunity to see how a number of those people were given sentences varying from seven to twenty-eight days. It seemed to me that it only makes them worse, and they vary their appearance occasionally, coming to the workhouse to be treated there and then palpably committing some fault or other in connection with the arrangements, so that they may get sent to prison.

853. What would you suggest?—What I want to suggest to the Committee is that some kind of labour colony should be established, some kind of colony where not entirely penal treatment may be awarded the vagrants, but reclamatory treatment in some form or another, so that the habit of tramping might be broken. I believe that if they were committed, say for a period of three years, those who had charge of the colony peopled with these men, at the end of one year, might allow those to go who had shown some sign of improvement, and that they might be trusted out; and a second time on a pinch, but a third time that they should be made to serve the full time. I believe that that would have some beneficial effect. Then with regard to dietary, sir, we, I believe, in Dewsbury, as in some other respects, are culprits. We have never stuck to the ordinary diet of bread and water. For humanitarian reasons our board has always sought to give a little bit better diet than that. But I believe, sir, if the dietary were somewhat improved, the public at large would have less sympathy with these men. They go and tell their tale that they have had nothing to eat but bread and water. This is so in Yorkshire, and especially perhaps in the West Riding, where, on account of the better character and surroundings of the people, they are better off than they are in other parts of our large county; and when the tramps go and tell their tale of having subsisted upon bread and water, there is no doubt that they excite and secure a larger amount of sympathy than if they were being treated in the tramp ward to something like consideration. We have, I say, improved upon the ordinary diet. I asked our master what the daily cost of food was, and he has told me that for this last year it averages 3·7d. per day. That, I believe, is larger than usual, but it seems to me to be a miserably low sum for a man to live upon, it is a low diet for a man to do an ordinary hard day's work upon. I might mention further, sir, that so far as the Dewsbury union is concerned we are peculiarly situated. Our union is at the top of the hill and is situated centrally between five large towns.

854. (Sir William Chance.) You mean the workhouse?—I do, sir; I mean the workhouse, and I daresay owing to that we do not get as many tramps as we otherwise might. But, at the same time, it makes labour very difficult for us; we cannot do stone breaking—it would cost us more to get the stone up to the top of the hill, and then we should have to cart it back again, so that we have never been able to adopt stone breaking as tramp labour. We have had wood sawing and corn grinding. So far as the corn grinding is concerned it is utterly impossible for us to make it pay; we cannot make it pay costs, but otherwise we have found it helpful. The wood sawing and wood chopping is the only labour for which we can at all expect any kind of return from these tramps. We have had a varying number of tramps. I find from the return given to me by our master that in 1895 the average weekly number for the year was forty-two men, eight women, and five children. That roughly is 20 per cent. women and 10 per cent. children. Then in one year, ending Midsummer, 1904, a similar comparison, we have 149 men, eleven women, and three children, so that you see we have a remarkable diminution proportionately and absolutely; in the case of children we have only three children out of 150 people, whereas in 1895 we had five children out of fifty people. How to account for that I do not know. I do not know of anything in the circumstances or the treatment, or anything else that would account for that diminution at all. I may say that since June we have fallen in the number of our admissions; there were 200 per week in June; last week we had about 150, and only one child out of the number. They are gradually diminishing, but for what reason I am unable to suggest. I do not know where they go. That is the ground upon which I urge the establishment of the labour colony. Now as to the Association of Poor Law Unions; this has been the subject of perennial interest since the establishment of the Association—this and old age pensions, I think, have held the field. We have never been able, satisfactorily, to deal with either question, I think, but undoubtedly it is a burning question with the Association as with all boards of guardians all over the country. The Association has had a committee upon this question, I think, almost since its first inception, and they have discussed this pretty largely. I am sorry we have lost Mr. Dimpleby, who interested himself very deeply in this question. He was a guardian for Richmond, but he got thrown, as a number of good men occasionally do; sometimes the better man stands the least chance of election, owing to some crotchet at the time; but if he had been here he would have told you more of the working of the Association's proposals, although the main lines of the recommendation of the Association are that the country should be mapped out into districts, sometimes two or more counties merged into one district, at other times that one county should be divided into a number of districts, and that the boards of guardians within those districts should appoint a number of representatives, who should form a board to manage the colony; that such colony should be maintained and governed entirely by such joint boards at the expense pro rata, according to the rateable value, of the several unions within the district. I think Mr. Meats will bear me out that that is substantially the recommendation. (Mr. Meats.) That is so.

855. (Chairman.) What are your personal preferences?—(Mr. Brown.) I support the colony and support the idea of the Association with regard to it, but I am not at one with them as to the advisability of having the management in the hands of popularly elected bodies. My confidence in popular election is not sufficient, I think, to warrant me in saying that I should like to see an establishment of this kind managed by popularly elected people, for two or three reasons. It is not that I have anything to complain of with regard to popular election; but it seems to me that the continuity of those bodies is so risky and uncertain that, for the very reason that Mr. Dimpleby got thrown, the best man, who might have at his finger-ends all the business of such a colony and might be the soul and life of the good work of the colony, might get thrown, and so get lost, and, as I say, his very excellences might be the reasons why he might be thrown, and therefore for that reason, I think, it would be a risky undertaking to let the colony be entirely in the hands of the publicly or popularly elected board. And one other thing, sir. There must be above all else a very high standard of discipline maintained at establishments of this kind if they are going to do any good. The class of people to be dealt with, whilst I want to see them dealt with as kindly as possible, must, I am satisfied, be dealt with firmly and under strong discipline, and on a popularly elected body we sometimes get a faddist, and he might be very troublesome on a board like that, and one such man might disturb the good working and prejudice the success. Whilst I agree with the Association in all their recommendations, I still make that personal preference that I should like to see it managed by the Government, through the Home Office, giving the guardians power to go and see the cases they have there, the same as they now go to the asylums. But let the management be entirely in the hands of one body of directors—not subject to the fluctuation of popular election, so that the best men do not get thrown. I think substantially, sir, that is the representation that I wish to make.

856. I take it from what you say that you would desire to have some similar body of supervision to what at present obtains in prisons?—Yes, sir.

857. Namely, a committee of visitors. Of course in the case of prisons it is a committee of magistrates, but you would have a body, I gather, composed of either guardians or magistrates, or both mixed together. Then you would have probably a governor of that colony who should be appointed either by the Home Office on the nomination of this body, or by the Home Office alone, and then you would have the supervision of the Government Department and at the same time the local supervision of your committee. You would have local control and also Government control. I think that seems to be somewhat the line that you suggest?—That is so; that would, in my opinion, be a model form of administration.

858. Now from whence do you think the funds necessary for the maintenance of the labour colony should come?—I would follow the scheme laid down by the Poor Law Unions Association, viz.:—from the area covered by the colony.

Brown.

859. Then that would be from the rates?—I think so. They have expressed a very strong preference for that. The question has come up before the Association directly; shall it be by Government funds or by local funds? And the Association has in each case by a majority decided that it should be a charge upon the rates of the districts.

860. If the ratepayers find the money, they would desire to be represented on the board itself to some extent?—Oh! certainly, sir; that is why they voted that the funds should come from the local authorities, so that the local authorities would have the right of supervision and visitation.

861. On the other hand, it is possible that the ratepayers would not object if part of the cost of these labour colonies came from other sources than the rates?—I have not the slightest doubt about that.

862. And if that were the case, it would be only right that the taxpayers as apart from the ratepayers should be represented by having an additional Government supervision?—Quite so.

863. To take care that the money was properly spent?—That would, I think, be a very wise course.

864. As regards dietary, you mentioned that the dietary in your casual ward costs 3-7d. per day?—Yes, sir.

865. That would be probably in excess of the cost in the majority of other wards?—I should suppose somewhere from $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to $\frac{3}{4}$ d. above the average.

866. Now do you think that dietary makes your casual ward attractive as compared with other casual wards?—I do not think so, judging from what I hear. Of course I have no actual acquaintance with the facts in other unions, beyond casual conversations with those belonging to them.

867. You probably know what the proportion of inmates in your casual wards is, compared with other workhouses?—It is not excessively large.

868. It is not?—Especially considering we are on the highway between these other large towns that I spoke of. One thing that does undoubtedly tend to increase the number of casuals with us, is the fact that we have the old association ward still. That is a matter of accident, though; we have been short of land and we have been waiting for years for land coming into the market so that we could build proper casual wards. We have now secured it, and we shall construct proper casual wards and shall dispense with the old association wards. I have no doubt that that will have some tendency at all events to keep a certain class of tramps away.

869. You yourself are not, I take it, in favour of the association ward?—No, sir, certainly not. It seems to me that any honest working man would prefer to have a little room to himself rather than associate with the bulk of the men who are there.

870. Have you studied the question of way-tickets?—I have.

871. I mean a way-ticket that is given to a man who is on his way with the honest intention of taking work?—I follow you, sir.

872. Would you recommend a system of way-tickets?—The price of liberty is eternal vigilance, and it seems to me that we are prejudicing the liberty of the subject in the issue of the way-ticket. It might develop into a limitation of the liberty of the subject, so that is why I should hesitate to adopt it. I know on the face of it, it is very admirable.

873. But would you give the opportunity to the man?—For the reason that I have mentioned, sir, I am afraid I could not see my way to do it; it would be the thin end of the wedge, I fear. That is the only argument that I should advance against it.

874. (Mr. Simpson.) The thin end of the wedge leading to what?—To the diminution of the liberty of the subject. You are giving him a permit to go about; to-day he goes about where he likes without any permit.

875. And you mean that that might lead to the idea that a man may not go about at all without a permit?—That is so, sir; that is the ground upon which I should object, and that only.

876. (Sir William Chance.) Do you draw a distinction between the wayfarer and the professional vagrant; there is a certain number of men who come into the casual wards who are really seeking work?—Years ago I used to take very great interest in this work, and I used nearly every two or three days to go right through the casual wards and ask personal questions of those that were there. I found very few, perhaps two or three in a week out of 150; that is all that I could find of that class. They were all more or less bordering on the permanent casual. I have found that they began no doubt as genuine wanderers with a more or less indefinite purpose, and then gradually they developed the other way; very few really honest working men are on the tramp so far as our experience is concerned.

877. But still you admit there is a certain number?—Oh, yes. I say there were somewhere about 3 per cent.; 2 per cent, say, is what I found when I made careful inquiry. It will be, I daresay, a dozen or fifteen years ago since I did that.

878. Then is it your idea as well as that of the Association that the present casual wards should be replaced by labour colonies?—No, sir.

879. That is not your idea?—No, sir.

880. I should like to be quite clear upon that point?—The casual ward cannot be dispensed with.

881. Even if you have a labour colony?—Certainly not, because you cannot send every one to the labour colony. The man that is temporarily out of work and coming the first time, you must provide for him. Take the case of a man turning up at night, or a woman, especially a sick person; sometimes we have a number of them and perhaps we have been deterred from inquiring so much into the character of those when they have been sick; we have occasionally transferred them to our infirmary straight away from the tramp ward; the ones who were not fit subjects for the infirmary might still want the tramp ward, and the women too must have the casual ward.

882. You want the guardians, then, to have the power to send a certain number of vagrants to labour colonies?—Confirmed vagrants.

883. Confirmed vagrants; now how should they be sent, in your idea?—In the opinion of the Association, and of myself, too, by magistrates.

884. By magistrates' commitment?—In all cases. Because that would effectually prevent anyone being sent there without having a full and fair public hearing.

885. And that, in your opinion, would get over the difficulty of detention; you would not give the boards of guardians any direct power of detention; it would have to be by order of the magistrates?—Always by order of the Bench.

886. Then what is the particular difference between you and your Association with regard to the management of these colonies; you would have them under the Home Office?—Yes.

887. As penal establishments?—Yes, sir, in that sense penal establishments.

888. You could hardly reconcile that with supporting them from the rates?—Yes, sir, inasmuch as the guardians would still have the right of inspection and supervision. I am afraid I did not make myself clear; I said that I wanted the guardians to have the right of inspection and supervision in all cases.

889. As visitors?—Yes.

890. Not as managers?—Not as managers, because of the lack of continuity in the men themselves, and our difficulty in administrative affairs; that is my experience, at any rate.

891. And that is how you differ from the proposals of the Association?—That is the difference, I think, sir.

892. Of course, you know a good deal about the management of labour colonies in foreign countries?—I do.

893. I daresay you have read the last report of the Board of Trade on the subject?—I have.

894. And what conclusion have you drawn from that; is it that any large number of these men are reclaimed by being sent to a colony and detained there?—Well, I have come to the conclusion that labour colonies are well worthy of having a trial in our own country.

895. Do you look forward with any hope to these professional vagrants sent to a colony, practically to prison, being reclaimed?—Well, there are some of them that you never will reclaim, but if you put them there for three years they will not trouble the other authorities and they will not cost more than they are costing now, when we are sending a man down to prison some eight or nine times in a year, as I have known during the last four or five years since I have had a seat on the Bench. The cost of sending him down and of maintaining him when he is there is far greater than his cost would be in a colony; and it seemed to me that he would be far better off in the colony than he could possibly be wandering about.

896. Yes, exactly, it is for his protection; you think it is better to set him to work in a colony than to let him go from casual ward to casual ward?—That is the irreclaimable man.

897. I am talking of the irreclaimable man. And it would also be for the protection of the public?—That is my opinion.

898. Then there is one other question. You have wood chopping and wood sawing in the workhouse. Has there been any complaint about that from the public outside?—No, none whatever.

899. You sell to the general public?—We do.

900. There has been no complaint about it?—I have heard of none. We sell to retailers; we are in the position of wholesale wood choppers, and supply a large number of retailers in the district surrounding us.

901. And what other work do you put your vagrants to besides wood chopping?—Wood chopping and corn grinding; that is the main work.

902. Pumping?—No, we have no pumping.

903. And the women, how do you employ them?—Well, as you see by the numbers I gave, we have not many, and those that we have we can find plenty of work for in the cleaning up of the tramp wards and other premises.

904. You do not give them any oakum picking?—No, sir, no oakum picking, except to a few extremely bad men whom we could not send to other work; we give them a little oakum picking, but there is very little done in the year; very few pounds are picked.

905. How long have you given up stone breaking?—We never had any.

906. You never had any stone breaking?—We never had any; we could not have it, owing to the position of the workhouse.

907. And your numbers have gone down of late years?—No, sir, they have gone up. They went down as between, say, 1860 and 1870; they went down from 1875 to 1890, but they have been gradually going up since. This last year is one of the heaviest years we have ever had for vagrants, the year that is now expiring.

908. Did you find a decrease of vagrancy in the year 1900 in your district?—Nothing remarkable.

909. (Dr. Downes.) To what do you attribute your present increase in numbers?—I am at a loss to know what to attribute it to, sir, except it is to the return of the men from the war; that has a very large influence upon us, I have no doubt.

910. With regard to your wood chopping, is that time work or piece work?—It is piece work. We generally give them about ten pit props—the number varies, according to the size—they are short pieces, about six to eight feet long of stout timber, used in the pits to prop up the roof; these are the larger ones that are unsuitable for the colliery, and we buy them and cut them into firewood, and the tramps have to cut thirteen cuts in each prop, and they have ten props to cut; they cut them with a two-handed saw, and that is their day's work. That will be 130 cuts, through timber of an average of eight inches in diameter. If sleepers are used we would give them eight sleepers—railway sleepers—and they would have to put thirteen cuts through the sleeper.

911. How long do they take, on an average, to get through that job?—Well, they generally make it spin out the whole day long; they could do it, no doubt, in half the time easily.

912. Do you find many fail to do it?—No, sir, not many; so far as I know we have never instituted a prosecution on the ground of the task not being done.

913. Now, I understand that your Association proposes to send the confirmed vagrants to the labour colonies?—That is so.

914. Have they adopted any definition of what they would mean by a confirmed vagrant?—Yes, sir, they have. I am appointed by them to represent them. The definition that they have adopted is "Any person who shall have been three times convicted of wandering abroad for the purpose of soliciting alms."

915. Three times convicted?—Three convictions; after a third conviction he should be liable to be sent to the labour colony.

916. (Chairman.) Three convictions altogether, or three convictions within a certain time?—I think it is altogether, sir; after the third conviction for wandering.

917. (Dr. Downes.) How would you identify the man as having been previously convicted?—That is the difficulty.

918. Has your Association any proposal on that point?—Not a bit, sir.

919. Have they considered it?—They have considered it, but they never came to any conclusion upon the matter. They saw the difficulty, but they could not suggest a way out.

920. (Mr. Simpson.) There are plenty of people who are known to have been convicted three times of that offence, at the present time. There are many persons whose previous convictions for begging are known; so that the practical difficulty of finding that out has not proved insurmountable in the past?—I do not think it would be found insurmountable, sir, in practice.

921. Quite so?—It is more in appearance than it would prove in fact, I think. We are able now to establish previous convictions against persons for very long distances in our local courts, and I have no doubt that in this case, when once it was made punishable by the sentence to the labour colony, the police would be able to identify their men.

922. (Dr. Downes.) Should you see any objection to a registration of measurements or of marks or finger-prints?—Not a bit, sir.

923. That would not interfere with the liberty of the subject?—I think not, sir; certainly not. A man that has offended against the law must be expected to submit himself to identification for the protection of the public.

924. (Sir William Chance.) Have you any one who visits the wards now and then, to see if they can rescue any of the vagrants from the life they are leading; is there any system of that kind?—I know of none, sir.

925. Does the chaplain do anything of that kind?—He does occasionally.

926. Not by way of reclaiming?—I know of no agency at work of that kind in our neighbourhood.

927. It has been urged that the number of tramps has been increased by the number of old soldiers who are on the road, men who have been in the Army; do you know anything about that?—I do not know anything specially about it, but I know that a number of those who are there are men from the Army; you can see that by watching them march in and out.

928. In large numbers, do you think?—I do not think so.

929. (Dr. Downes.) I understand that the cost of the provision of these labour colonies is proposed to come out of local rates?—That is so.

930. And the cost of maintenance?—Both provision and maintenance.

931. There is a difference of opinion as to who should be chief officer, I think?—No, sir; I am not entitled to say that. Certainly the only thing that the Association has done has been to declare its desire that they should be managed by joint boards; they have not said who shall appoint the chief officer; but I take it that the management involves the appointment of a chief officer, and I suggest, at least in my own mind I strongly prefer, that his appointment, at any rate,

Mr. J. Brown.

Mr. J.
Brown.

if it was made by the Government, should not be revocable by such a body.

932. Are you able to state what are the objections of the Association to the charge being wholly Imperial?—Simply that they would lose control, sir; that is the only ground upon which the Association as such objects to Imperial funds being used for the affair.

933. But the inmates of the labour colony would be men convicted before the magistrates?—Yes, sir.

934. Just as the inmates of prisons are convicted men?—Yes, but with this exception, that they are convicted of a very moderate form of misdemeanour, hardly amounting to misdemeanour in that sense, whereas in the other case they are convicted of crime. It is no crime to be poor.

935. You draw a distinction of degree?—Quite so; it would be a conviction, no doubt.

936. It is a distinction of degree only?—No, sir; there is the character involved in the difference, I think, between the conviction for crime and the conviction for tramping.

937. (Mr. Simpson.) Would you say that as a matter of fact the men who would have to go to the labour colony would be more like the men who now go to the casual wards, than they would be like the prisoners in prison; would they not form a class intermediate between the two, and on the whole be more like the men in the tramp wards?—That is my idea.

938. And on that ground the local authorities ought to have a say as to the management?—You see my idea in referring it to the magistracy is to give a person every opportunity to defend himself, because a three years' commitment is a serious matter, and it ought not to be imposed until after the fullest publicity and the most open inquiry; and the magistrate's court seems to me to be the likeliest and surest ground for securing that to a person involved. That is why I wanted it to be by a magistrate's certificate or conviction, put it whichever way you like.

939. (Dr. Downes.) You spoke of the guardians having a supervision over the colony; you used the word "supervision"?—Yes, sir; it is a word that does not express my meaning.

940. I was going to ask you?—I should say inspection.

941. Exactly?—View; let them have the most ample opportunity to see all that is going on.

942. (Sir William Chance.) Not to manage them?—No, sir.

943. That is your own opinion?—That is my private opinion.

944. (Mr. Davy.) In such a labour colony as you have described there would be some difficulty as to ascertaining the settlement of the vagrant, would there not?—I should fear a hopeless difficulty. In a great many cases I am sure it would be a hopeless matter, but I apprehend that he would be regarded as settled in the district where he was convicted; unless other settlement could be clearly proved, I do not see how they could get out of it.

945. Your solution would still leave administrative difficulties, would it not—an unwillingness to convict?—I do not think so.

946. When you say that magistrates should convict, do you mean magistrates in petty sessions, or quarter sessions?—Petty sessions, sir. I forgot to say that in the working of that commitment personally I think it might be with advantage arranged that for a first conviction the man at the end of twelve months, if his behaviour had been good in the opinion of the director or master of the place, might be allowed out, and the two years might then be remitted; or at the end of two years.

947. I take it this would be a formal conviction, however, involving real detention?—Certainly, sir.

948. It would then be necessary to have a wall round the colony, would it not, or constant supervision of the prisoner?—There would need to be constant supervision.

949. Or a wall or both?—Well, so far as the dormitories were concerned, they would need to be within a wall, certainly; but it seems to me that they might work in gangs under certain supervision as they do in the penal settlements.

950. That would involve the employment of a great number of officers, would it not?—Not such a very great number, sir. In our juvenile establishments in the West Riding they are working in gangs under a foreman; and it seems to me that, in fact, they would need a certain amount of oversight in the work that they were doing if the work was to be done right. I think these establishments, in certain districts, at all events, would need to have trades carried on within them in the hope of leading these men to adopt these trades and send them out to enable them to get their own living in the trades. You would want to keep them there for lengthened periods.

951. At any rate you would have to take adequate measures to prevent the prisoners or the colonists escaping?—Well, we could have three grades of men in the colony. If the man who escaped for the first time could maintain himself when he had escaped I should not fetch him back, but if he did come back I should certainly put him into a second class. If he escaped a second time and maintained himself I should say nothing to him, but if he came back I should put him into a class from which he would not escape.

952. He might come back into another colony?—Into another place; he most likely would; I should think so.

953. (Sir William Chance.) There would be a uniform in this colony?—Oh, yes. That would be indispensable.

954. That would help to prevent escape, to a certain extent?—I suppose so.

955. (Mr. Simpson.) It would be perfectly possible to register the finger-prints of every colonist, so that if he escaped his known finger-prints could be circulated and he could be identified?—Yes, but I submit that whilst he was gaining his own living he would not need to be re-apprehended, and the very possibility of his escaping and maintaining himself, and knowing that he would not be apprehended if he did maintain himself might be the strongest incentive for the fellow to return to decent honest work.

956. (Sir William Chance.) You know the Merxplas colony?—I have read about it.

957. You know the men there are paid; they can earn something for their work, which is given to them when they go out?—Yes.

958. Do you approve of that?—I very strongly approve of the system, so far as I could gather it from the report that was sent to our quarter sessions.

959. The men who are sent to this colony should earn money?—Yes, sir.

960. (Mr. Simpson.) How many unions does your Association represent?—Roughly about one-third of the whole, but more than half of the population of the country. It is the small unions that are not largely represented on the Association; nearly all the large ones are.

961. So it is very representative of Poor Law authorities?—My friend, Mr. Meats reminds me that it is more than one-third; it is very nearly one-half—287 out of 650 unions.

962. You are increasing your number?—We are increasing every year, sir.

963. Have you any idea how your Association would view a system of labour colonies under private management, but subject to inspection possibly by a Government Department or by the Poor Law authorities, the cost being primarily borne, say, by voluntary subscriptions, but the guardians of the union paying so much per week for every man committed from their union to the colony; do you think they would favour that?—I should not like to go bail for them, sir, on that question. It has never been before them, and I do not know how they might regard it.

964. That is the system, of course, of industrial and reformatory schools at the present time. How does it strike you with regard to tramps?—Well, so far as the reformatory schools are concerned, they have worked well. In our West Riding we have three that I know more or less about, and they have done well, unquestionably, but how that system might be made applicable for the vagrant class I do not know.

965. Now, suppose a labour colony were established under voluntary management, and say the Home Office inspected it, and certified it to be a suitable place for tramps to be confined in, would your union feel inclined to guarantee a certain amount per week for tramps committed to the colony from the union?—I do not think they would be willing to do it.

966. It really might be cheaper to the Poor Law authorities than making themselves responsible, or partially responsible, for the establishment and maintenance of the labour colony?—Economy does not always influence their decisions in these matters.

967. No, but they might have the right of inspection just the same, you understand?—I should have no objection to any such scheme; I do not think there would be any valid objection, but there might be a sentimental one; the sentimental often outweighs the practical.

968. I suppose you have no idea how much it would be worth your while to pay a week for a man committed to a labour colony from your union?—No, sir.

969. Would 7s. a week, for instance, be more than you would like to pay?—I should think that would be a somewhat heavy charge, sir.

970. It would be more than you would like to give?—Well, it would rather.

971. (Mr. Davy.) Though you might be willing to pay for one of your own settled paupers, you probably would be unwilling to pay for a tramp?—I am not quite sure, sir, that they would be willing to pay for one of their own settled paupers 7s. a week. Our inmates only cost us about 3s. 5d. a week.

972. There would be more disinclination to pay for a tramp than for a settled pauper?—Undoubtedly.

973. (Chairman.) What is your opinion with regard to seven day sentences, being a deterrent or otherwise?—I think I have expressed it already in my evidence, sir, that they are worse than useless.

974. I think you did say something to that effect?—The men are rather made worse than better. They do not mind going to prison at all and a month is no use to them, and that is one reason why I want the colony.

975. At any rate you think a month would be more effectual than seven days?—Much more effectual.

976. (Dr. Downes.) I understand the Association proposes that the labour colony should be supplementary to the present system of casual wards?—That is so.

977. Then you would keep the present system of casual wards?—That must be so.

978. And would you keep the powers of detention just as they are now?—Everything.

979. Has the Association considered any means of promoting uniformity in the management of the casual wards as they are?—No, sir.

980. We have heard of one place being easy in their treatment of casuals?—Not beyond the colony. The colony would cover a large tract according to the population, and within that colony there would be uniformity, but they have not considered how to secure any uniformity in the whole of the country barring colony treatment.

981. (Sir William Chance.) They have not considered the question of securing greater uniformity of treatment of vagrants in the casual wards?—No, sir, they have not considered that. That would be another big question, because different counties are in different circumstances, and you could not have, I think, identical arrangements in each casual ward.

Mr. MEATS Examined.

982. (Chairman.) Mr. Meats, you come also to give evidence on behalf of the Association of Poor Law Unions?—I do, sir.

983. What is your position as a guardian?—I am vice-chairman of the Hereford board of guardians. I have been a guardian now getting on towards twenty years.

984. Do you agree with Mr. Brown's evidence?—With regard to Mr. Brown's reference to differential treatment of vagrants, I entirely agree with that. I think that the man who is honestly seeking employment should certainly have due consideration in any casual ward. I think that such men ought to have totally different treatment to the professional vagrant whose appearance is periodical, coming again and again. So far I entirely agree with Mr. Brown. This question bears also on the way-ticket system. Now, with regard to the way-ticket system I am bound to differ from my president. I have heard Mr. Brown again and again defend the liberty of the subject and so have I, and I always will defend the liberty of the subject to do right, but I will never defend the liberty of the subject to do wrong; and I consider that the professional vagrant who goes about, although he does not nominally commit a crime, is really a semi-criminal, because a professional vagrant as a rule absolutely refuses to do any work at all. You cannot get them to do any work; they say they never have worked, and they never will. Well, I think, if a man will not work, his liberty should be, in some way or other, curtailed, and I think the way-ticket system would to some extent curtail it. But it would also be an assistance at any rate to an honest man. The way-ticket system originally, I believe, was something after this fashion: that when a man left home he received from the superintendent of police, or some other authority, a way-ticket, showing from whence he was starting and whither he was going, and on his way he took that ticket to officers of mendicity societies; on showing this ticket, he had presented to him a ticket to convey him to the next bread station, and from thence to the next union. That ticket proved him to be a man honestly in search of employment. But now I am informed by the authorities at Hereford that that system has lapsed altogether. The original way-ticket is never asked for; vagrants who present themselves at the proper place receive their way-tickets without almost any question whatever.

985. From whom?—From the police.

986. Then the way-ticket system is still in force in Herefordshire?—It is still in force in Herefordshire by means of the mendicity society, the chairman of which is Sir Richard Harington. The society still continues its excellent work, but I think if that work were to some extent supervised, and that alteration made, it would tend very much to the decrease of vagrancy in the county of Hereford.

987. Supervised by the police?—Yes. If these way-tickets were properly supervised, and men were compelled to bring the proper way-tickets with them showing where they come from, and that they are men honestly in search of employment, I think it would reduce the vagrants in the county of Hereford very considerably, because it would cut out these professional tramps who get the way-tickets.

988. In other words, you say the way-ticket really would be a certificate of honesty?—That is so, sir; not a permit. That is where I differ from Mr. Brown.

989. I mean that is the view you take of it?—Yes.

990. The way-ticket would not be a slur upon a man, but would be a certificate that he is on his way to get work?—That is so.

991. Then you say those tickets are granted by the superintendent of police?—They are granted at the office of the chief constable of the county, in the city of Hereford. I have seen them there time after time.

992. Are they only granted there; how is it worked all over the county?—They are granted there, and then the men are sent on to the next union. I could not tell you whether that ticket covers the county or not, but it conveys the man to the next bread station, which is half way to the next workhouse, and from that he goes on to the next workhouse. Whether he carries that ticket on until the county is exhausted I forgot to ask.

993. I did not know whether the system was that a man could go, say, to any police superintendent's office

Mr. J. Brown.

28 Nov. 1904.

Mr. G. W. Meats.

28 Nov. 1904.

Mr. G. W. Meats. in the county of Hereford and get that way-ticket there?—I should say that would be so.

28 Nov. 1904. 994. You cannot speak with certainty as to that?—I should think that would be so, because the Herefordshire mendicity society covers the whole of the county and therefore we may take it for granted that that would be so.

995. I understood you to say that it was only in the city of Hereford he could get that ticket?—No; I am talking of the whole of the county.

996. You think it would be possible for the man to get his way-ticket at other police stations in the county of Hereford?—There is no doubt at all about that.

997. And that way-ticket would be available for the rest of the county?—I do not think there is any doubt at all about that. In regard to the professional vagrant in the county of Hereford, of course, you are aware, sir, it is a large fruit and hop growing district, and for that reason perhaps vagrancy in our county is more rampant than otherwise it would be. With regard to that percentage of men who seem to be honestly in search of employment, my own opinion is that they would be about 20 per cent. of the people who frequent our casual wards. That is my opinion, but I should say that the opinion of the more charitable people is that perhaps there may be 50 per cent. of these men. I am quite willing to grant that at certain times of the year, just when fruit-picking and hop-picking are commencing, there may be 50 per cent. of those travelling men and women who may be honestly in search of employment, but in the ordinary way I think the 20 per cent. I have put down as my own opinion would fairly well cover the number. I believe a great many of the vagrants who visit the fruit and hop district just about the time these industries are commencing are not honestly in search of work at all. The system adopted by large hop growers in the county of Hereford is this: they have a centre in a certain large town with a ganger or foreman or forewoman. They are ready at a certain time of the year to provide so many hop-pickers or fruit-pickers as the case may be, and arrange to bring them say from Dudley, from Swansea, from Cardiff or any large centre of population. They bring these people with them, their railway fares are paid, they are conveyed from the nearest station to the homestead where bothies are provided for them. A bothy is a large building erected with cells in it for the accommodation of families and single people. There they are bedded down. They have straw or chaff beds provided for them. Their accommodation is all ready, they settle themselves down, and they continue until the hop-picking is over. They get their money, their railway fares are paid back, sometimes nearly a whole train is required to take the large number of hop-pickers back to Wolverhampton, or wherever they may happen to have come from. Well, that is the system adopted by large hop growers. Another system is to pick up these vagrants, these travelling professionals, when they come round. I do not think I have ever heard of more than one large hop grower who has been able to retain their services. They will go on the pretence of begging their way to seek work in the hop yards, but you put them to work, and in twenty-four or forty-eight hours they are off again. I myself once fetched a trainload—I think there were two carriages filled with hop-pickers—out of Wales for a friend of mine who was ill. I think there were about forty or fifty of them, and in three days only five remained out of the whole lot; the lot had started away to take their journey back again. Now that is what the professional vagrant does in connection with industries such as hop-picking. It does not obtain so much in fruit-picking, because they are a more settled class of people. I maintain with regard to a great deal of the vagrancy in the hopping districts, that these people simply come and use hop-picking as an excuse to carry on their vagrancy. Now I do not know whether you would like me to give you certain statistics.

998. Upon this point?—Upon the number of vagrants who have been in the casual wards at Hereford.

999. If you please?—The figures in the union of Weobley—that is a small union in the county—in 1902 were 593; in 1903, 969; 1904, to the end of September, 1,102. You see that is very nearly double.

1000. (Mr. Davy.) Are these individuals or nights' lodging?—Nights' lodging. I could not tell you whether one person was there more than once or not: very likely they would be. In the Kington union in 1901 there were 947; in 1902, 1,337; in 1903, 2,007; and in 1904, 2,439.

1001. (Mr. Simpson.) Up to the present date in 1904?—That is up to the present date.

1002. (Mr. Davy.) Do you know the Kington union?—Yes.

1003. Of what size is the workhouse?—The workhouse is a small one.

1004. Accommodating twenty or thirty people?—I should say sixty or seventy people.

1005. In that case the number of tramps would approximate almost to the number of workhouse inmates?—That is what I want you to notice. In Ross for the year 1902 there were 1,806 casuals; 1903, 2,405 casuals; 1904, 3,187 casuals. Bromyard union in 1901, 2,613; 1902, 3,161; 1903, a very small hop year, 3,133; 1904 to the end of September, 4,315. Leominster for the year 1902, was 2,532; 1903, 4,062; and in 1904, up to the present time, 5,585. Ledbury in 1902, 5,982; 1903, 6,458; 1904 up to the present time 7,338. I may say here that Bromyard has had as many as 600 vagrants in one week, and Ledbury has had 700 in one week, and we have had 619 in one week. Now I come to Hereford union. Perhaps you would allow me to go a little further back in the case of Hereford. In Hereford union in 1898 the total number of casuals was 3,956; in 1899, 3,066; in 1900, 3,752, making a total in the three years of 10,774, which to my mind is a very serious thing. In 1901, 4,473; 1902, 5,531; and in 1903, 7,403; in 1904 up to the present time, 7,496. Making a fair calculation of what we are likely to have during November and December, in all probability instead of being 10,774 in the three years there will be over 20,000.

1006. (Chairman.) Then we may take it that all over the county of Hereford there has been a steady increase during these years?—A great increase. I think the production of these figures, if the Committee were not in possession of them before, is quite sufficient to justify my giving evidence before the Committee on such a grave question, because if this thing is to continue where are we to be landed. I think I need not put anything more before the Committee than that in order to satisfy you that I have not been sent here in vain.

1007. Can you suggest yourself any cause for the rapid increase?—Well, sir, I agree with what Mr. Brown has said in regard to the war. I myself have interviewed these vagrants on leaving the house. A short time ago I saw a number of them. I said, "Why do you men not stay at home and try to get an honest livelihood at home?"—"Home," they said, "how can you stay at home, sir, when you have got no home." I said, "Surely you must have a home somewhere—your birthplace, where you were brought up." "Oh, but then when you have been out to the front and come home and get pitched on the country, thrown on your own resources, without any assistance whatever, how can you stay at home and work; where can you find work?" That might have been a genuine tale or it might not. Perhaps the man had never been at the front at all. I think in all probability that would be so. In the case of one of the men I felt very well certain that he had never been to the front; he was not of that build.

1008. I think that there is a less severe treatment of casual paupers in your county than in others; may that account for your being particularly the resort of vagrants?—Well, sir, I will answer that question honestly. I am afraid we have not sufficient deterrents, if I may use that word; we have not sufficient cells for casual wards to detain these people so long as we would like to. I have shown you what a number of tramps we get in the course of a week. I may tell you that we have only had sleeping accommodation, unless it is the summer time, for about twenty-three men, and twelve women and children in our large workhouse, where it seems to me we are very badly off for accommodation of that sort. We could accommodate about thirty nine more in the summer time, because we can use stone breaking sheds, which we could not use in the winter.

1009. Then where do these casuals sleep when they come to you?—They sleep in the stone sheds when they come, sir, and we have two buildings detached from the workhouse—a loft and an outbuilding; we can put up a lot of women and children in there, but when we are overdone we simply send them out and the relieving officer gives them tickets to go to common lodging-houses.

1010. (Mr. Davy.) And do you detain two nights?—We do not detain two nights; we cannot do it now.

1011. Do you bathe all your vagrants?—Not all.

1012. Do you set them to work?—They are all set to work. Some are set to work stone breaking.

1013. And discharged when?—Some are discharged at 11 o'clock in the morning and some are detained all day.

1014. And I suppose that a certain proportion of them sleep on straw in these outbuildings?—Straw beds on platforms.

1015. Now is there any single regulation of the Local Government Board with regard to the treatment of vagrants that you carry out in the Hereford union?—Well, you have put a very difficult question to me. I will ask the guardians when I go back.

1016. Need you go any further for an explanation of the enormous increase in this vagrancy?—Well, I do not think it would account for the enormous increase, but it may account for a certain increase of vagrancy. But when you get into country districts like ours, we believe vagrancy is caused to a very great extent by these special industries being a temptation for them to come.

1017. Do you know the county of Kent at all?—No, sir, I do not.

1018. (Chairman.) Where you have these deterrents, these systems for the detention of tramps, what is the result?—It is only a local one. The more severe the system is in one union, the more likely it is to drive those tramps away to another union, some little distance away, but it does not attempt to cure them, and for that reason I see a strong necessity for some permanent system such as vagrant colonies to which you can send these people for good and for all, to give an opportunity of trying to reclaim them so that they shall not be able to pursue this kind of life for month after month and year after year without any hope of cure at all. You see if we adopted a severe system we should send them away to tramp among areas somewhere else. If we adopted a severe system we should be relieving ourselves of a difficulty in order to put somebody else into it. For that reason I think the remedy should be general.

1019. (Mr. Davy.) Do you not think your lax treatment induces some people to come on the road and stay on the road?—No, I cannot go so far as that, sir. I hope you will not call it lax treatment.

1020. Well, your disregard of the regulations of the Central Authority on the subject?—Well, I should like to know where we have disregarded. If it is put strongly like that, I should like to be told where we have disregarded them. Perhaps we have not carried them out, but we are not aware that we have disregarded them.

1021. (Chairman.) Perhaps you would answer that you have not facilities to carry them out?—We have not facilities to carry them out, sir. I do not know whether you would like me to go into any details.

1022. You are in favour of the way-ticket system, and I understand from you, that in the county of Hereford, that system is carried out by the agency of the police?—Yes.

1023. I understood you to say that you would have any way-ticket system carried out by the police?—Oh, yes, decidedly.

1024. I mean not initiated, we will say, from the workhouse, but from beginning to end worked through the agency of the police?—Most decidedly, sir. I think the police ought to have a great deal more to do with the tramps than we have, and their attention should be given to these professional vagrants oftener than it is. If the police see a man persistently begging, I really think it is their duty, not to wait for some one to point that man out and say, "I will appear against him," but to take the matter in hand themselves and deal with such a man. I really think that a man who will persistently do that sort of thing is a man who has endangered his liberty by an improper use of it.

1025. If there was some system of general information with regard to labour to be had by those who are really honestly seeking for it, would you work that again through the agency of the police by posting information at the superintendents' offices?—No, sir; I was coming to that. My opinion is that there should be a labour bureau at every workhouse.

1026. At every workhouse?—A labour bureau at every workhouse.

1027. That is, information with regard to available labour?—That is what I mean, sir. It should be made a public matter, and any person requiring labour should be in a position to communicate with the master of the workhouse and his name should be placed on a list, a sort of schedule, and that schedule should be open to the inspection of all these people who frequent the casual ward. They would be able to read the list down, and they would be able to say, "Well, there is a job that would suit me." I think the secretary of the bureau should be in a position to send that man straight away. I may tell you we have followed that to some extent at the Hereford workhouse, and where farmers have had swede pulling or any special kind of labour going on, the master has been in a position to send casual labourers to that farmer or builder or whoever he may be; tailors, tinkers and all sorts of people are tramping and very often such persons are wanted in different trades or different businesses; but this list would show everyone what employment there was to be had, and then if a man refused to accept labour when it was offered to him, I think he should be spotted as a professional vagrant.

1028. It is evidence against him as far as it goes?—It is evidence against him, sir. Well, that is my idea of a labour bureau in a union, and I think that, very likely, would tend to assist the honest vagrant in search of employment. I do not know that I need say any more, sir. If I go any further I should go into some rather more drastic ideas.

1029. (Sir William Chance.) You advocate, I understand, the way-ticket system because it brings the police in?—That is so, and assists the honest tramp.

1030. In your opinion it does assist the honest tramp?—I am strongly of opinion that it would be of great assistance to the honest tramp.

1031. You do not advocate it because it has anything to do with the reduction of vagrancy?—I do not put it on those grounds because I cannot see how it would.

1032. You think it would not?—It may tend to the reduction of vagrancy in certain districts: in large agricultural districts, for instance, it may tend to the reduction. I said, just now, I thought it would reduce vagrancy in the county of Hereford, where the population is sparse.

1033. But it has not done so, as a matter of fact?—Well, I do not think it is likely to do so.

1034. It has not done so in Gloucestershire where they carry it out in every union?—I cannot speak for Gloucestershire.

1035. (Mr. Simpson.) Your system, I understand, is all over the county?—It is worked by the police, and the police cover the county as a matter of course, the county police; therefore I take it that it covers the county.

1036. (Sir William Chance.) Do the police act as relieving officers at all in the county?—Well, not recently. Some years ago the superintendent of a police district acted to some extent as a relieving officer. A man, if he wanted a night's lodging, would go to the police superintendent and the police superintendent kept an eye upon him and did all he could for him if he were a tidy, honest man.

1037. How long ago was the system of using the police as assistant relieving officers abandoned?—Well, I should think that was a system that obtained in Ross only. Ross was the only place in which I heard of it being worked. The superintendent of police at Ross, I think, had £5 or £10 a year paid him by the board of guardians to act in that capacity, but I should think it might be perhaps ten years, or it might be twelve, since that system was abandoned.

Mr. G. W. Meats.

28 Nov. 1904.

Mr. G. W. Meats. 1038. I suppose you would be of opinion that that might tend to reduce vagrants?—I think it would be an excellent thing for the superintendent of police to have an eye upon all professional vagrants everywhere.

28 Nov. 1904.

1039. But still you have no actual experience in the matter?—I have had no actual experience in the matter; I only speak from my own judgment.

1040. Can you give us any particulars about child vagrancy; what is your opinion about it?—My opinion is that this child vagrancy is the most dreadful thing we have to deal with. In a country district like the one I come from, it is painful indeed to see the number of children, and my opinion is that the number of child vagrants is not properly set out in any of the returns received from casual wards; and I have noticed a very peculiar thing amongst these professional tramps. They will come of an evening into the casual ward themselves, and they will perform their tasks and on the following morning at 11 o'clock you will see a woman, wife she may be, or she may not be, come down with her cheese box, a good-sized box on wheels, something of that sort, perhaps an old perambulator, and she has been at the common lodging-house with her children during the night. That is a trait of the tramp which I have very much admired—to think that they should secure a few of the pence or shillings they have got in the day to use part of that money of an evening to pay for the wife and children lodging at the lodging-house instead of taking them into the workhouse.

1041. And do you think that is done to a very large extent?—I have seen it done times out of number. And there is another thing that happens; it is that the man, when he has got to the workhouse of an evening, has emptied his pockets and put the money into the wife's possession, in order that that money might not be collared for his own subsistence.

1042. You are aware that the number of children classified in the returns as relieved in the casual wards is very few; for the whole of the country it is 200 or 300 a day?—That is so; I have noticed that in the returns, and this is how I account for it to a very great extent: these vagrants do not send their women and children into the workhouse, they send them to the common lodging-house, in order that they might get possibly more comfort.

1043. Have you any suggestions as to how you might prevent these children being practically on the road. I understand you do not agree with that; you would like to stop it, I suppose?—There is only one way to stop it, that is to get hold of the professional vagrant—if he will persist in his vagrancy—and separate him from his wife, and thereby prevent the propagation of such a race.

1044. But have you thought how you are to do that?—By putting them into a vagrant colony.

1045. The whole family?—Not the whole family. I should not like to put the men and the women and the children into a colony altogether.

1046. I mean to say if you put the men into a colony, what are you to do with the women and children?—I think a reformatory was suggested.

1047. That may do for the child, but how about the wife?—I think the wife might be very useful in a reformatory.

1048. Do you think you might put her in the workhouse?—Able-bodied women are exceedingly useful in the reformatory to do the work.

1049. You would be glad to keep the wife in the workhouse?—I would be glad to get the women out of the way of the men.

1050. You would not be very particular as to what the settlement might be?—I would very much rather move her. Another thing is the question of gipsies. I think the question of gipsy vagrants is a terrible thing.

1051. (Mr. Simpson.) Have you had the subject of sentences on tramps under your consideration at all?—

Yes, sir; I think that the unequal sentencing of tramps is rather a serious thing. You will find one bench of magistrates giving seven days for an offence. Another bench of magistrates thirty or forty miles away will give twenty-eight days for the same offence.

1052. And in the same circumstances; so far as you could see, there was no difference?—In the same circumstances; there is very great inequality in dealing with them. I might give you an illustration. I will give you a case that occurred in the Hereford union some few months ago. A man came to the workhouse, and my chairman and myself happened to be there, and this fellow absolutely refused to break stone. He had got his three cwt. of stone and refused to break it—said he was unable. The doctor was fetched. The doctor pronounced him perfectly able to break the stone. He was taken before the magistrate, and there happened to be two exceedingly humane magistrates on the bench that morning, and they said, "Poor fellow! he ought not to have been put to break stone at all;" and they remanded him for seven days. Seven days from that time another bench of magistrates sat and they gave this fellow seven days hard labour. As soon as he came out he went away to a neighbouring union; he had 3s. 6d. given him out of the poor box, to carry him fourteen miles to the nearest workhouse, and when he got there the master, who had heard of the case, and happened to know the man, I suppose, recognised him and said: "Oh! look here; you have been in gaol seven days. I do not want to put you to break stone again. Would you like to go and do some easy work in the garden, you cannot feel very well after having come out of prison, where you have done seven days hard labour." He said: "Thank you, governor, I am obliged to you. You are a different man to the others." He went out and he said to the gardener: "Well, but I want to know how long I shall have to stop here?" "You will have to stay here and work all day long." "Oh! that would not do for me; just take me back, governor, and give me some stone to break; I am an old stone breaker; I have been at it all my life." That was the man that was not able to break stone. That is one specimen of these persistent vagrants.

1053. (Chairman.) Have you often heard of cases where seven days imprisonment sentences have been passed on these men?—Oh, yes, frequently.

1054. Well what do you think is the effect of that; has it deterred them at all?—I hardly think many of them like it, sir.

1055. You do not think it is a deterrent any how?—I do not think it is a deterrent at all.

1056. If you had to fix a minimum of imprisonment for those men what would you fix as a deterrent?—I would not like to take upon myself the duties of a magistrate.

1057. I am asking you as an Englishman of common sense?—I would do as an ordinary man of business would do, I would as near as possible divide it. I would make it twenty-one days.

1058. (Sir William Chance.) You would not mind twenty-eight?—I do not mind twenty-eight; but I really have no sympathy with these men. I hope you will not think I am too much prejudiced against them, but I think they are men whose propagation of families ought to be stopped.

1059. (Chairman.) Have you anything further to say?—Will you allow me to explain something with reference to Mr. Brown's opinions with regard to the cost of these colonies? Mr. Brown, I think, gave it as his opinion that he differed from the Association as to the payment of the expenses. (Mr. Brown.) No. (Mr. Meats.) Then Mr. Brown and I agree, if Mr. Brown means that it should be in the hands of the local elected bodies, but under the supervision of the State. I could not agree with Mr. Brown that the control should be in the hands of the State while the ratepayers had to bear the cost, because I do not think the ratepayers in our part of the country, at any rate, would like that system.

Mr H. B. SIMPSON, a Member of the Committee, Examined.

1060. (Chairman.) You propose to give us some evidence from the point of view of the Home Office. You are one of the principal clerks in that Department?—Yes.

1061. Now what position does the Home Office occupy with regard to vagrancy?—The Secretary of State has no statutory powers or duties with regard to vagrants as a class. From time to time questions connected with vagrancy come before him either as Prison Authority or as Police Authority, or because he may have taken a personal interest in the question, but that is only occasional. Speaking generally, the main interest of the Home Office in vagrancy is that the vagrants form a class from which a number of the institutions under the control of the Home Office are largely filled. First, take prisons: of course the vagrants in prison form a large class of the actual receptions in prison. Then, reformatory and industrial schools: a great number of the children in them are the children of vagrants. And again inebriate reformatories: some of the people who go there really are neither more nor less than vagrants. I think that is the chief interest the Home Office has in vagrancy as a question.

1062. Can you at all tell us, as regards inebriate reformatories, what proportion of the inmates can be really traced as having been vagrants?—I am afraid I could not. It is to be remembered that, after all, the inebriate reformatory system is quite in its infancy, and I do not think it would be possible to come to any conclusion on that subject at present.

1063. Can you state the number of vagrants, as such, who are in prisons?—I am afraid there again it is very difficult to get any figures that would be of much use to the Committee. The persons committed under the Vagrancy Act, of course, are by no means all vagrants; in fact, I should think it was probable that the majority were not in the strict sense of the term vagrants. There are pickpockets, prostitutes, palmists, people who have indecently exposed themselves, and a quantity of other people who would come under the Vagrancy Act.

1064. That is under the old Rogue and Vagabond Act?—Yes. I have taken out some figures about persons brought before the courts for begging and sleeping out since 1859, which are of some interest. I take begging and sleeping out as being the typical offences which tramps commit. Of course, there are a great many beggars who are not tramps; and there are men that sleep out who probably are not tramps in the strict sense; but still those figures seem to give the best criterion of the number of tramps, so far as criminal statistics are of any use at all, and they are of some interest. The figures for the last forty years fluctuate a great deal, and the most one can say is that they are higher for the last twenty years, and especially since 1875, than they were for the twenty years before. But there is no very marked tendency that can be seen from the figures. It may be useful to read out the quinquennial averages of persons charged before the courts with those two offences. From 1859 to 1863 the annual average was 12,660; from 1864 to 1868, it was 14,928; from 1869 to 1873, 18,847; from 1874 to 1878, 16,490; from 1879 to 1883, 25,879; from 1884 to 1888, 27,765; from 1889 to 1893, 23,520; from 1894 to 1898, 25,067; 1899 to 1903, 23,794. That last average was brought down by the exceedingly low number of charges during 1900. It was only 18,791 in that year, which was lower than the actual number for any year had been since 1877. No doubt the cause of that was the war—that brought down the number of vagrants; that brought down the quinquennial average, 1899 to 1903, in spite of the fact that in 1903 the number of persons dealt with for those two offences is larger than in any previous year, except 1888. The actual number in 1903 was 29,632. [These figures are given in Appendix XIX.]

1065. I do not know whether you have noted the fact that 1900 was an extremely good year for work. It was the year of the war, and probably there would be rather fewer men in England, but it was also a good year for work?—1900 was the year of the war. Mr. H. B. Simpson.

1066. If I recollect aright, it was a very good year for trade. The cause was the war, but apparently there was a great demand for hands, and that might very possibly have had an effect; I do not know whether you are aware of that?—Yes, and I quite think that the drop between previous years and 1900 is so very marked that it probably requires more than one explanation. 28 Nov. 1904.

1067. Yes?—Neither the war by itself nor the good year for work by itself would cause such a very marked drop; it was probably the two combined.

1068. Then would not that also give us some idea as to the cause of this great increase in the number of vagrants in 1903, namely, that there was a very considerable slackness of work?—Yes, I should think that is very probable.

1069. What is true of the one is also true of the other?—Yes, that is very probable. At the same time I got out figures for 1903 of the prosecutions in each county separately, and these are also curious as showing the very great difference between one county and another, without, so far as I can see, any very clear reason for the differences. I think the only conclusion possible is that the number of persons charged with sleeping out and begging depends far more on the practice of the police than the actual number of tramps in the county. Of course, the number of tramps in the county must make a considerable difference, but I cannot help thinking that the practice in different counties may make even more. It is very hard to compare different counties, because one does not know by what standard to compare them. I thought on the whole the most convenient way would be to arrange all the police counties simply by acreage; population, of course, has nothing to do with it, and on the whole it seemed to me most reasonable to accept the acreage as being a factor in the question of the number of vagrants more than anything else that I could think of. I take first the West Riding of Yorkshire compared with Lincolnshire. Lincolnshire for this purpose is treated as a whole county. The difference in size is inconsiderable; you may take them as pretty much the same. Persons prosecuted for begging in the West Riding, 2,317; in Lincolnshire, 2,307. That is what one might expect. For sleeping out in the West Riding, 1,219; in Lincolnshire, 242. That is rather a startling drop. It is still more surprising when we come to the next, the third largest county, which is Devonshire. There the persons prosecuted for begging are 186; those for sleeping out are 110. In the North Riding begging, 554; sleeping out, 149. And just take the fifth county, Norfolk: begging, 132; sleeping out, 55. In the case of Norfolk one can understand there may not be so many vagrants as in the counties in which more main roads to the north lie. That may be the reason, but if one reads out the numbers of persons proceeded against for begging in the five largest counties in succession: 2,317, 2,307, 186, 554, 132, I think that points more to a difference of practice in the police, than a difference in the number of vagrants. One might illustrate that indefinitely through this table. I will just take two other counties, Gloucestershire and Herefordshire. They lie not very far off. In Gloucestershire the acreage is about 800,000; in Herefordshire, 538,921. The difference in the number of prosecutions is very curious; in Gloucestershire the number of persons prosecuted for begging was 592; in Herefordshire, 65; for sleeping out in Gloucestershire, 305; in Herefordshire, 21. That points, I think, to some difference in practice.

1070. Have you any sort of record as to whether these cases were obtained from main roads which have big places of employment at their termini?—I am afraid not.

1071. You have nothing of that sort?—No; these figures are simply taken from our judicial statistics.

1072. (Mr. Davy.) Shall we have those figures?—I will hand them in if you wish it (Return handed in—see Appendix XIX.)

Mr. H. B.
Simpson.

28 Nov. 1904

1073. You have not compared those figures with the pauper vagrancy figures?—No, I have not.

1074. We can make the comparison?—Yes. There is one other comparison which may be drawn as an illustration of the great variety between one county and another. Take Cornwall and Wiltshire; they are of the same area practically. Well, in Cornwall the number of persons prosecuted for begging was 252, those in Wiltshire were 74; whereas on the other hand for sleeping out, in Cornwall 34 were prosecuted, and in Wiltshire 61. I have brought other figures from the judicial statistics which I think are certainly interesting.

1075. (Sir William Chance.) The persons who are convicted for sleeping out probably do not belong to the county in which they are convicted?—Probably not.

1076. I have here the figures of the mean number of vagrants for the same years for which you have given us figures with regard to the number of criminal vagrants. It is very remarkable; taking the first period of five years, 1859 to 1863, the average of your criminal vagrancy was 12,660, while the mean poor law vagrancy for these five years was 2,508?—Yes.

1077. Then for the period 1879 to 1883 we find the criminal vagrants are 25,879; while the mean pauper vagrancy of those five years is 5,763?—Yes.

1078. Those two periods show both criminal vagrancy and poor law vagrancy to have more than doubled?—Yes.

1079. Now, when we take the next series of years from 1884 to 1903 we find almost exactly the contrary. Taking the five years 1884 to 1888, we find criminal vagrancy is 27,765 and the poor law vagrancy is 4,754?—Yes.

1080. In the last five years, 1899 to 1903, criminal vagrancy is 23,794—a decrease of nearly 4,000—whereas poor law vagrancy taking the day and night return, which I think you must take for the purpose of comparison, was 10,774?—Yes.

1081. Thus, poor law vagrancy has doubled while criminal vagrancy has gone down?—Yes.

1082. Could you give any reason for that?—My own idea would be probably that from 1857 when police forces were first made universal up to 1879, say, they were getting more and more effective and more and more active. On the whole there was a tendency that way. Since 1879 I have no particular reason to think they have been getting more active.

1083. I see?—My own impression, from looking at the figures of summary prosecutions generally, has been that the number of summary prosecutions is very largely, if not mainly, influenced by circumstances other than the number of the offences committed. Such offences as drunkenness, or offences connected with drunkenness, depend a very great deal upon outside considerations, e.g., if there are special efforts made to put down drunkenness in particular districts; so that in certain cases one has come to the conclusion, it may seem paradoxical, but I think there is some truth in it, that an increase in the number of actual prosecutions, means rather a decrease in the amount of offences committed than the reverse, or at all events is coincident with a decrease in the number of offences committed. I think in one or two cases it looks very much like that, and something of that kind may be true of vagrancy.

1084. Do you think it has anything to do with the treatment of vagrants under the Poor Law having become more effective since 1882?—I should think it might very likely be so.

1085. (Chairman.) Have you any idea whether there has been any alteration in the action of the police since the new police authority started in the counties; I mean, have the standing joint committees had any effect upon the action of the police with regard to vagrancy?—Well, we have not had any evidence at the Home Office to that effect. I have got some other figures which I think may be interesting to the Committee (see Appendix XIX.)—the number of prosecutions for the offence of misbehaviour by paupers from 1857 to 1903. Those are the one set of figures relating to people who are undoubtedly paupers and most of whom, I presume, are more or less of the vagrant class. From 1857 to 1903 the number of persons charged as disorderly paupers varies generally between 1,000 odd and 3,000 odd, but in 1868 the number increased from 2,985 to 4,423, and stayed above 4,000 the following three years, falling again in 1872 to 3,213. Such an increase in the range of figures is very marked, and whether it is to be explained by the Local Government Board Circulars, and an inquiry into the London casual wards at that time, I cannot say; it may have been due to a tightening up of the discipline. I think it is probably, because the other exception to the general rule of the numbers varying from 1,000 to 3,000 occurred in 1883, when the number went from 2,841 to 4,262. I should be inclined to attribute that particular increase in numbers to the Local Government Board Circular of 1882.

1086. Would that apply to the whole of England or only to the Metropolis?—To the whole of England in 1882, but that cannot be more than conjectured, and one may say that up to 1899 the figures have fluctuated in a way that it is very hard to say is anything but purely casual, but from 1899 there has been such a curious and progressive increase in the number of persons dealt with as disorderly paupers that I think it is quite impossible to suppose that is purely casual. I will read out the figures: 1899—3,632; in the following years they have been, 3,717, 5,118, 5,959, 6,496. Not only for the last three years have the figures been higher than in any previous year, but they have also shown a very marked upward tendency right up till last year.

1037. Are those offences committed within the walls of workhouses?—Of workhouses.

1088. (Mr. Davy.) Or casual wards?—Or casual wards; I think most of them are committed in casual wards.

1089. (Chairman.) All inside offences?—Yes; in the workhouse and the purlieu of the workhouse.

1090. Within the workhouse premises?—Yes.

1091. (Dr. Downes.) Do the returns distinguish between casual paupers and ordinary inmates?—No, I am afraid not.

1092. (Chairman.) Have you any more figures?—No, no more figures.

1093. Now we come to sentences on tramps. Have you any reliable record as to these sentences?—I am afraid one cannot say more than that they range up to three months, and so far as we know there is very little principle in determining which get seven days and which get a month. The number of courts of summary jurisdiction is over 1,000, and for each court there is a large number of magistrates, and they all have a right to exercise their discretion, and it is only natural that opinions should vary very much. I do not know that the opinions as to what is the right sentence in a particular case vary more among the courts of summary jurisdiction than they vary in the higher courts.

1094. I suppose the court would vary from the action of a single magistrate to the action of a court composed of a considerable number?—Except that a single magistrate is limited in the extent of his powers.

1095. Yes, but he has the power of sentencing a refractory pauper, for instance, to imprisonment?—Yes, for not exceeding fourteen days. It is rather a complicated matter sometimes. It depends upon the actual statute whether one magistrate can act or whether two must act, and I should not like to say, off-hand, when two must act and when one may act. It depends on the statute in each case.

1096. Then the question that I asked you just now was right, namely, that the court may begin with the action of a single magistrate, with imprisonment for fourteen days, and may extend to the court composed of a number of magistrates with much longer imprisonments?—Yes.

1097. I only ask that to note the fact that a court may be very limited in its numbers; consequently, that might bear upon the question of the punishment inflicted?—Yes.

1093. Can you give us any instances of variety of the courts dealing with similar offences: take for instance paupers tearing up their clothes; now that is a common offence?—I am afraid not; the fact is the Home Office hears of so very few sentences of less than a month that one must say that officially we have very little experience of the lesser sentences.

1099. (Mr. Davy.) The Home Office returns do not give the sentences under fourteen days separately, do they?—No.

1100. They lump them together?—Yes.

1101. (Chairman.) Well, then as to the sentences on tramps, what information have you?—The information in the possession of the Home Office does not go beyond the fact that the sentences given vary from the maximum down to being let off with a caution, and that magistrates exercise the discretion vested in them very freely.

1102. (Mr. Davy.) The consequence is there is a great want of uniformity in the sentences given for the poor law offences?—Yes; for that and all other offences.

1103. Have you any suggestion for securing greater uniformity?—I think in the case of vagrancy it would be a very great advantage to fix a statutory minimum. There used to be a considerable number of minimum sentences for various offences punishable summarily. Before 1879 the system of having a minimum was open to an obvious objection. A magistrate might well have in his mind that if a man was found guilty of a particular offence he had to be punished for it, and it was rather harsh to fix a minimum of the amount of punishment to which he must be subjected. In 1879 the minimum sentences were practically abolished, except that a saving was kept for fines under the Militia and Volunteer Acts. Since then there have been some statutory provisions fixing a minimum penalty. There was one under the Cotton Cloth Factories Act, and there are several now under the Factories Acts. The objection which might have been felt to a minimum sentence before 1879 has been largely taken away by the Summary Jurisdiction Act of that year, which explicitly and expressly allows magistrates either to find a defendant guilty, but let him off with a caution, or not to convict him at all, if they think the offence is too trivial to merit punishment. Now I would suggest to the Committee that the reason for making a minimum sentence of imprisonment in such a case as an offence under the Vagrancy Act is really stronger than any reason for imposing a minimum fine. No actual harm need be done by imposing too low a fine; that is to say, if a man deserves punishment at all, it is better that he should get fined a low fine than get no fine at all. In the case of imprisonment it is different. To send a man to prison for a few days is quite likely to do him no good at all, while it causes a considerable expense and trouble to the country, and in some cases to send him to prison for just a few days may really be what he prefers. I would submit to the Committee, therefore, that it would not be unreasonable to say to magistrates that for offences under the Vagrancy Acts, if you do not think that the man deserves being sent to prison for fourteen days, you ought not to send him to prison at all, but should deal with him under section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act. That would, at all events, be an approximation to uniformity by abolishing all those short sentences of seven days and under which give so much trouble, and according to common experience do no good whatever.

1104. (Chairman.) I daresay you are aware that Sir John Bridge recommended very strongly with regard to habitual inebriates that there should be a practice of binding over the convicted man to come up to seek judgment again?—Yes.

1105. Now do you think a similar practice would be useful with regard to the vagrant?—I think it would be rather hard to get your vagrant to come up for judgment. I think the fact of his being a vagrant would make it more difficult than in most offences.

1106. Because he is a vagrant?—Yes, because he is a wanderer.

1107. But, on the other hand, he would have that hanging over him. If there were two recorded convictions against that man on which he had suffered no imprisonment, he would have them hanging over him with a view to cumulative penalty if he came up a third time?—Yes.

1108. I do not know whether you have considered that question at all?—Well, at the present time the magistrates have that power of binding over.

1109. They have the power now of binding over?—Under section 16, I think it is, of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, but I think in the case of vagrants it is very little used.

1110. (Mr. Davy.) The vagrant wanderer is the person of whom we are speaking now?—Yes.

1111. Still there are a good many persons convicted under that Act and sent up for very short sentences who are workhouse inmates?—Not under the Vagrancy Act, surely.

1112. They are workhouse inmates?—Disorderly persons, but it is under a different Act—the Pauper Inmates Discharge and Regulation Act, 1871: they are treated as though they were people under the Vagrancy Act.

1113. Anyway, you can proceed under either Act; but the Chairman's suggestion of binding over would be useful in those cases, would it not?—In the case of disorderly paupers?

1114. Yes?—Certainly, I think it would be very useful.

1115. (Chairman.) Instead of sentencing this man to a sentence of seven days you would bind him over and, if necessary, you might bind him over a second time, but then the third time he would probably be dealt with with some severity?—Yes, that would be very useful in the case of refractory paupers.

1116. (Mr. Davy.) As a matter of fact magistrates do something of the sort now?—Binding men over?

1117. They do not actually bind them over but they say: "We will let you off this time, but if you come up again—" ?—Yes, they do.

1118. (Chairman.) That was the system with regard to inebriates which I said just now was very strongly recommended by Sir John Bridge?—It has been done.

1119. (Mr. Davy.) To go back to your minimum sentences, would there not be the objection that magistrates would be unwilling to convict?—I think if it was clearly explained to magistrates, if their attention was specially drawn to the section which allows them, even though they convict, to let a man off with a caution, perhaps ordering him to pay costs or not even doing that, I think there would not be that objection. There would be the other objection, no doubt, that a certain number of people would escape punishment altogether who at present get seven days, but if the seven days does effect no good at all, but only harm, so much the better that a man should get off without the seven days.

1120. It is better in fact to let a man off than to give him his heart's desire which is to go into a prison?—For a few days and nights, remembering that seven days' imprisonment with hard labour only means four complete days' hard labour.

1121. (Captain Showers.) But that would still get him on his road which is the primary object of his going to prison, inasmuch as he gets taken by rail instead of marching?—Yes, but one need not mind that if he goes to prison for fourteen days; if that was made the minimum.

1122. (Mr. Davy.) You suggest fourteen days as the minimum?—I should suggest that for the consideration of the Committee.

1123. There would be certain advantages in twenty-eight, would there not?—I think there would, but I think that would be too high a minimum undoubtedly for an offence under the Vagrancy Act.

1124. You find there would be a difficulty in putting that in force?—I think so; I think there would be too many tramps let off altogether.

1125. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Would you confine your minimum simply to offences under the Vagrancy Acts?—I think there is something to be said for a general minimum of imprisonment.

1126. Would it not rather exaggerate the importance of the crime of the tramp if that were the only crime for which there is a minimum put?—Yes, there is something to be said for fixing a minimum like that for all summary convictions. I do not wish to suggest it at the present moment because we are only on the subject of vagrancy, and I certainly think there is more to be said for fixing a minimum for offences under the Vagrancy Act than for any other class of offence that I can think of.

1127. (Dr. Downes.) With regard to the suggestion for binding a man over with a view to subsequent cumulative punishment, would not that involve some method of registration of identity; the man might go on to another place and the second conviction might be in another court?—Yes.

1128. How would you identify John Smith for example in the second court, or the third court?—Well, I doubt very much whether it would be worth the labour involved, but it is only well to remember that at the present time finger-printing has furnished the police and the prison authorities with a means of registering and classifying all persons sent to prison, far beyond anything that was ever thought of till just the last few years, and I should not like to express any opinion as to whether it is worth while; but it would be perfectly possible to finger-print every vagrant in the country and have a central registry of vagrants, and probably they could be so classified that it would be perfectly possible to pick out any vagrant in the course of a few hours' notice; but it would be a very big business indeed.

1129. Some system of registration of identity would seem to follow in order to make the system effective?—I think if such a system of registration was to be established there would require to be very much stronger evidence of the necessity for it than we have at present.

1130. (Chairman.) With regard to the short sentences are you aware that in another inquiry, Sir Andrew Clark stated that the worst thing that you could do for an inebriate was to put him into prison for seven days; that at the conclusion of that seven days he would come out in a state of absolute raging thirst for alcohol—in a much worse condition than when he went in?—I was not sure on what authority it was, but I have heard that stated as being the fact, and I suppose no one could be a better authority for the statement than Sir Andrew Clark.

1131. Under those circumstances, looking at the tramp who is also an inebriate, the very worst thing you could do for him, either from a curative or a punitive point of view would be to give him a sentence of seven days?—Yes.

1132. You agree with the evidence given in regard to the diet in prisons by Major Clayton?—Yes.

1133. (Mr. Davy.) Major Clayton said that he did not attribute the rise in convictions to the prison diet at all?—Well, I should not like to attribute the very marked rise to which I referred, either exclusively or even mainly to the improvement in the diet. I think it is clearly attributable to something and should be more inclined to attribute it to the general feeling that in prisons generally the discipline has been made easier. Whether that impression was very well founded or not it would have exactly the same effect on the ordinary man. I mean to say to put it in another way, I should have expected the increase to come about before the prison rules actually came into force, because there had been so much talk about relaxing prison discipline. I should prefer to put it in this way—that I think the increase in the number of refractory paupers brought before the magistrates since 1899 must be ascribed to an impression on the part of the paupers that prison is much easier than it was, but it does not follow that that impression is altogether well founded.

1134. (Dr. Downes.) The increase of refractory paupers did not commence till 1901, according to the table which I have before me?—The rise was much more marked after 1900.

1135. (Mr. Davy.) May I ask what was the date of the abolition of the crank and the treadmill in prisons?—They were abolished gradually. I do not think it would be possible to say exactly when, but as opportunities occurred the crank and treadmill were removed.

1136. Was it within the last ten years?—Oh, yes, all since 1899.

1137. So that apart from any improvement that there has been in the dietary, in other respects the prisoner has been a good deal less hard-worked in prison?—Well, he has been worked in a different way.

1138. I suppose there is no doubt that there has been a general amelioration in the conditions of prison life since 1899?—Prisoners certainly seem to think so.

1139. Will you say here what you think about the prison diet?—Of course, there is the obvious difficulty that a prison diet must be adequate for all the people to whom it applies, and it would be a very difficult thing to apply a different diet to different classes of prisoners; and it is obvious further that the social standard of the average prisoner sentenced to hard labour is much higher than that of the vagrant in the casual ward, therefore unless you can get some system, the possibility of which is very doubtful, by which you can make vagrants a special class in prison, it seems to me inevitable that the diet in prison should be rather higher than what might be actually necessary for them.

1140. In point of fact, the standard of comfort of the vagrant is less than the standard of comfort of the average prisoner?—Oh, very much less. The average of the prisoner on hard labour is raised a great deal by the inclusion in that class of persons of the most respectable position who have been accustomed to live very well.

1141. (Chairman.) Does not what you have been saying point to this: that the only remedy would be somewhat of an increase in the length of punishment?—I think so.

1142. That as to the man who takes himself, we will say, into prison on the ground that he will get better treatment than in the casual ward, the only way of meeting that is to give him a longer period of punishment which might be a deterrent to his wishing to become an inmate of a prison?—Yes, the difficulty of punishing him more by punishing him more rigorously is so great that it would be better to make the punishment longer; put it in that way.

1143. In other words not to imprison a tramp for the sentence of seven days, which you truly say is really, as far as the hard labour goes, only a sentence of from four to five days?—Yes.

1144. There is one other matter. What have you to say with regard to the children of tramps?—So far as the Home Office is concerned we see no reason why the existing law is not sufficient. We believe that section 14 of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, is quite sufficient to meet all reasonable requirements. Under that section a child can be sent to an industrial school if he is either begging or wandering, and not having any home or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence, or frequents the company of thieves. And the Chief Magistrate at Bow Street has, I believe, held, and the Home Office has in consequence taken the view that a child may be rightly held not to be under proper guardianship even when it is with its parents, if they are not the kind of people who can give it proper bringing up.

1145. With regard to industrial schools, is there a sufficient amount of accommodation for children?—Yes, I believe so. In the matter of health, difficulties as to admission sometimes arise, but I can say that during the last ten years there have been 67,567 children admitted into industrial schools who have been begging or found wandering, or destitute, or orphan, without any particular offence.

1146. There is no difficulty with regard to the sexes; I mean there is sufficient accommodation both for girls and for boys?—I believe so. If there was a large increase in the number of committals the difficulty might arise, but experience has shown that it has been met.

1147. And has the practice of sending these children to the industrial schools been satisfactory, as far as you have been able to judge?—Very satisfactory, I believe.

1148. Then you would be strongly in favour of that method of dealing with the tramp children?—I think the Committee might possibly at a future date like to hear the Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools; it is a matter in which he has taken a very keen personal interest.

1149. (Sir William Chance.) You have said that section 14 of the Industrial Schools Act, if it is put in force, is quite adequate for the purpose of dealing with the children of tramps?—So far as we know.

Mr. H. B. Simpson.

1150. Well, now, as a matter of fact, has it ever been put in force?—I was under the impression that it had.

1151. Against children who are wandering about with their parents, or professing parents, on the roads in the country. It has been put in force against children who were found wandering about the streets without any care, or anybody to look after them; but it has never been put in force, I believe, against the actual tramps?—I was not aware of that.

1152. Well, it was for that reason that we wanted to strengthen the law. There has been a great desire all over the country to strengthen the law with regard to dealing with the children of tramps?—Yes.

1153. The Vagrant Children Protection Bill was drawn up and drafted because it was found that neither the Act of 1866, nor the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, was adequate to deal with this particular question?—Yes; well, is it not rather the fact that there have not been people to put the present law in motion, than that people have tried to put the present law in motion and failed? Are there many cases in which people have tried to put the present law in motion against the children of tramps and have failed to do so? I am not aware of any case. There may be, of course, but at the Home Office we certainly believe that section 14 is perfectly sufficient if there are people about the country who will use it in suitable cases for the benefit of tramp children; and that possibly what is wanted is not so much an amendment of the law as more activity on the part of people outside the towns, in the country districts.

1154. I take it your opinion is that under the Act of 1866 these tramp children can be dealt with?—That has been the opinion of the Home Office.

1155. Well, is it not rather a defect in the Act of 1866 that it makes no provision whatever for the punishment of the parents?—I am not sure of that.

1156. A person responsible for the children?—Possibly that was the case. The opinion of the Home Office now is that, so far as we know, that has been sufficiently supplemented by subsequent legislation, notably, the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act.

1157. But that Act does not deal with the parent, or the person who is responsible for the wandering about of the child?—I think the view of the Home Office is that if a parent has been cruel to his child the law allows him to be punished, but if he has not been cruel he ought not to be punished.

1158. And the actual fact of roaming about with a child is not considered cruelty?—Well, at the Home Office we rather dislike extending the criminal law.

1159. You would say "yes" to that, would you not; I know that is the opinion of the Home Office?—Yes; we should be reluctant to admit that that per se is necessarily cruelty.

1160. And that is really the reason I think why these Acts have not been put in force to protect these children; that it has not been considered cruelty within the two Acts, the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, and also the Act of 1866?—I daresay that has been the reason that has prevented more action being taken under the Act.

1161. I think one of the objections of the Home Office to the Vagrant Children Protection Bill is that it creates a new offence?—The Home Office always objects to any new offence being created, unless there is a clear case of necessity for it.

1162. And also that it would give a considerable amount of additional trouble to the police?—I do not think we should mind that.

1163. You would not mind that?—No.

1164. (Chairman.) Then, in your opinion, the industrial school system meets the case of the vagrant children?—Yes.

1165. (Sir William Chance.) And if it does not, it might be possible to strengthen it?—Certainly.

1166. Would it be possible to bring those children under the Industrial Schools Act of 1866?—The law at present allows it.

FIFTH DAY.

Tuesday, 29th November, 1904.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair).

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.
Captain SHOWERS.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary).

Mr. H. B. SIMPSON, further Examined.

1167. (Chairman.) I think the last matter you were dealing with was the industrial school question, was it not?—Yes.

1168. Have you anything more to say with regard to that?—I do not think so, so far as the Home Office is concerned. They think the present law is sufficient if it were put in force, and that to go beyond the present law is unnecessary, and it might possibly be mischievous.

1169. Do you think that the description as given in the Act of the qualification of a child to be put into an industrial school is sufficient?—We believe that it is, but at the same time it is possible that some magistrates would not hold that "not being under proper guardianship" included children under guardianship of parents who are not fit to take care of them. The Chief Magistrate at Bow Street has expressed his opinion and has held that it does include such children, and whenever we have been asked an opinion on the subject we have always said it does, but the mere fact that we have been asked the question suggests that it is possible that in some parts of the country magistrates might take a different view.

1170. That was really what my question was aimed at—the description of children under the control of their parents?—Well, according to the Chief Magistrate's ruling at Bow Street, when once you say that a child is not under proper guardianship, although he is under the care of a parent who is tramping the country, that gives

Mr. H. B. Simpson.

29 Nov. 1904.

Mr. H. B. Simpson. about as wide a power for committing children to industrial schools as you could possibly have.

29 Nov. 1904. 1171. That ruling has never been questioned since?—No; he acts on that opinion, I believe, when it comes before him. I do not know whether many cases do come before him, but I believe he would be quite prepared to act upon that opinion. It has never come before the High Court, so that you cannot say that it is fixed law, but we have never felt any doubt that it would include that.

1172. As far as you know, it has never been questioned?—As far as I know, it has never been questioned in a court of law.

1173. (Sir William Chance.) As it has not been questioned, would you be willing to inform clerks to magistrates of the power?—I think that, if the Committee suggested anything like that, the Home Office would have no objection to giving such notice to magistrates.

1174. (Chairman.) Now with regard to police officers being employed as assistant relieving officers for vagrants, what is the view of the Home Office?—Up to 1888 the Home Office had to decide with a view to the Government grant what duties might properly be discharged by the police other than the duties of peace officers; and the duty of relieving officers was always held by the Home Office to be perfectly proper police duty. As to whether it is a good thing that police officers should do this work or not, it cannot be said that the Home Office has any definite opinion; opinion varies so much. Among our own Constabulary Inspectors at the present time there is a difference of opinion, and we know quite well that among police officers throughout the country there is a similar difference of opinion, and the Secretary of State has not decided; he thinks the local authorities are the best people to decide. To give an illustration of the sort of way in which it may come before the Home Office, and also to show the sort of reason why some police authorities may not think it advisable for their men to be employed as relieving officers, I might refer to the case of Cumberland and Westmorland in 1880. Up to then the police officers were employed as relieving officers, and in 1879 the Local Government Board had a report from one of their Inspectors speaking very strongly of the slovenly way in which the Poor Law was administered in that county, and a part of the laxness of administration was that the authorities employed police officers instead of taking other measures for carrying out the law which might have been better. Of course, so far as regards the administration of the Poor Law, the Home Office was not concerned; but we did see that the throwing of a duty of this description entirely on the police was an evil from the point of view of police administration. For instance, we heard that one police constable, who was appointed relieving officer, was out on his beat all day and his wife acted as relieving officer, and that in a single day she might have to give relief to as many as thirty or forty vagrants. Of course, that is an utterly wrong position for a woman to be in. We could not help having a suspicion, from what we heard, that the vagrants simply blackmailed this constable's wife; it was in an out-of-the-way district and in a case like that the Secretary of State had no hesitation in saying that system ought not to continue from the police point of view.

1175. Cumberland and Westmorland being a very thinly populated part of England, the police are no doubt at a considerable distance from one another, and the time taken on their beat is much longer. Where, as in that case, they are far apart, there would be greater difficulty in combining the duties of police officer and relieving officer?—Exactly.

1176. Probably the Home Office had that in view also?—Yes, I think so.

1177. In counties, where you have, as I say, the police a long distance from one another, there would be greater difficulty in the police officer doing his duty to the police and also as relieving officer?—Yes.

1178. And in that case probably the wife came to be employed, because there were no other stations near?—Yes. I did not mention the case as being typical of what goes on at the present time; I mentioned it rather as the kind of case which might at that time have given the impression, the wrong impression, that the Home Office was against the employment of police as relieving officers at all. We have had nothing like that recently; and supposing the local authority finds the police can do their proper duties as police officers, and also act as relieving officers, the Home Office certainly would nowhere object to that.

1179. (Mr. Davy.) Would it not be less trouble for a policeman to pass a mendicant on to the workhouse, than to bring him to the police station and charge him?—Yes, I suppose it would; but a vagrant is not to be charged at the police station simply because he is a vagrant.

1180. I said a mendicant?—If a vagrant came and asked for bread at a police station, would he be a mendicant? Would he not rather be asking for poor law relief, if the officer there was relieving officer?

1181. What I am driving at is this: if the policeman is also the relieving officer, he might find it easier to get rid of a man, whom he might take in charge for some offence against the laws, by sending him to the workhouse rather than by taking him in charge?—Well, yes, that is true.

1182. As a matter of fact, that was one of the great objections on the part of the police authorities?—From what I have heard of police authorities lately, it seems to me the objection they have in their minds is rather a kind of theory that a police officer should be nothing but a peace officer. If the police authority has an objection—they may give other reasons, but I think it is a great deal that they like to think of a policeman as being a peace officer only.

1183. (Captain Showers.) Do you not think there is an advantage in the police officer being the relieving officer; he sees those tramps who come into the place, whether they go to the workhouse or not; if anything happens he goes to the workhouse and he can identify them?—I have heard that argument advanced for employing police officers as relieving officers; but then, on the other hand, I have heard the answer made to that: "Well, if there is any man who is likely to get into the hands of the police for committing criminal offences he will not apply at a police station for relief. If the police act as relieving officers they do not in that capacity see much of the men in whom they are interested in another capacity." I have heard that answer given.

1184. (Mr. Davy.) You are aware that in a good many unions the police, as a matter of course, look in at the vagrant wards every day?—Yes.

1185. And see the tramps?—Yes.

1186. That would be advantageous, would it not?—I should think it would.

1187. And, speaking generally, I think you would agree that some sort of co-operation between the police and the poor law authorities is necessary in treating vagrants?—I think so.

1188. (Sir William Chance.) The employment of police officers as assistant relieving officers is only for giving an order of admission to the casual ward?—I think that is the only use to which they are put as assistant relieving officers.

1189. Are you aware of the Circular of the Poor Law Board of 1868 which points out the advantage of employing the police as assistant relieving officers:—

"A sound and vigilant discrimination as regards those who apply for relief as casual poor, with a view to distinguish between those whose destitution gives them a claim to such relief, and those who, not being destitute, throw themselves habitually on the public rates or on private charity, is of primary importance; and the guardians will best secure the proper exercise of this discrimination by placing the relief of the casual poor in the hands of officers who, while they relieve the destitute, will at the same time have sufficient firmness to repel the impostor. The employment, where practicable, of some member of the police force, or of some person clothed with the authority of a constable, as an assistant relieving officer for this purpose, is shown by general experience to be the most expedient course. The professional tramp will be comparatively unwilling to confront such an officer, while to the honest but destitute wayfarer his inquiries will occasion no alarm"?—

—I do not think the Home Office would have anything to say against that. If the poor law authorities think that it is good for the administration of the Poor Law that police officers should be employed, the only condition that the Home Office would lay down would be that it should not interfere with the exercise of their functions as peace officers, and though the Home Office have laid down that as a sine qua non, as a matter of fact they do not hear of instances in which their employment as relieving officers does in any way interfere with their more primary duties.

1190. (Chairman.) You have had no complaints?—No, no complaints lately.

1191. (Sir William Chance.) Are any regulations laid down as to how the police should be employed in these duties?—No.

1192. None at all?—Up to 1889 the Home Office had this power of regulation, that the Secretary of State decided what Government grant should be given to the local forces, and he had the power at that time of saying no grant shall be paid in respect of the money paid to officers for doing certain duties. In that way the Home Office had to lay down certain duties that the police could perform, and certain duties which they could not perform; and employment as assistant relieving officers was always a duty that the Home Office recognised. Since 1889 the Home Office has had no such function, and it is a matter for local decision.

1193. (Mr. Davy.) That is by the joint committee, I suppose?—In counties, the standing joint committee.

1194. (Sir William Chance.) I suppose where the police are used as assistant relieving officers they are paid for the performance of their duties?—I believe they are.

1195. By the board of guardians?—Yes, I believe so.

1196. (Mr. Davy.) The system is in very general use, I believe?—In thirty-six counties police officers are employed as assistant relieving officers, and in twenty-one they are not. That is of the county police.

1197. (Sir William Chance.) I think that in Wales they are employed very largely?—Yes, it is largely the custom in Wales.

1198. (Chairman.) Now, what is your opinion with regard to the system of inebriate reformatories; how far may they be taken as a precedent for labour colonies?

—There is great difficulty in drawing any conclusion from inebriate reformatories with regard to labour colonies for several reasons; first, that though the system has made a very promising start indeed, it has only been in force a short time, as the Act was only passed six years ago; therefore, you may say the system is in its infancy. Secondly, most of the people who have been committed under it are women, and comparatively few men. And thirdly, there is not so much difficulty in securing their detention, as there would be in the case of vagrants. But with that proviso, I think the Committee will probably find it interesting to know what is the Home Office experience with regard to these inebriate reformatories. Certainly, up to now, they have made a very good start, and we have every hope of their doing great things in the future.

1199. How many are there now in work?—There are about eleven places certified as inebriate reformatories at the present time.

1200. Were there not thirteen voluntary ones at the time of the Inebriate Inquiry?—Yes, I think that may have been so.

1201. Under Dr. Hoffmann?—Retreats.

1202. Yes?—As a matter of fact, I think two of the retreats were certified as reformatories, but I do not think either of them is now being conducted as a reformatory. The interesting thing about the inebriate reformatory system is that it is purely experimental, and it has worked out entirely differently from what has been expected.

1203. Better?—I think better, but at all events different; the classification is quite different. It should be remembered that there are two classes of people who can be committed to inebriate reformatories—one is the drunkard who commits an indictable offence owing to drink; the second is the drunkard who is convicted four times within twelve months of some petty offence involving drunkenness. It was thought that for the first class it would be well to have a State reformatory, because he really is a criminal: for the second class it would be better to depend on private enterprise in the same way as reformatory and industrial schools. Though the process is still in course of evolution, since the Act was passed a great variety of different institutions have been started. The Inspector, Dr. Branthwaite, a man of most abundant energy, has taken a great deal of pains to foster different types of reformatories. The consequence is that you get one at, say, Chesterfield—it is a private house in pretty grounds—with practically no means of restraining the inebriates if they wished to leave; that is for one class. Then you get another, that was formerly a workhouse, at Lewes; that is for rather a lower class, and now already there is a sufficient variation of type that they can be transferred from one to another. A curious point is that it has been found that the people who are sent to a reformatory under section 1 of the Act, that is to say, those who have committed indictable crimes, are really the more suitable people for private institutions than some of the others; so, though now there are two State reformatories started, one for women at Aylesbury, and one for men at Warwick, the use they are mostly put to is to receive inmates who are too bad for the other institutions. Duxhurst was a retreat, a voluntary place, under the old Inebriates Acts; and at the present time they take selected cases there; but I believe they are thinking of giving up their certificate for a reformatory. Brentry was a pre-existing institution. That was started as a voluntary institution, and that is the only reformatory at present which takes both men and women. Mr. Burden was very much interested in starting these reformatories and he took a great deal of interest in Brentry. A great number of the counties and boroughs agreed to contribute to the cost and reserve beds at Brentry, so that the people could be sent from their districts to Brentry, and they got more and more of the management, and now it is practically given up to the hands of a committee who represent the local authorities interested. The county authorities again have just opened a reformatory for Lancashire. Then there is to be one in the West Riding, which is being managed by the local authority, and there is one that the London county council is managing. So you see in the case of these reformatories there is every type—purely private institutions, local authorities, State management—and that has proved to be a most useful arrangement. I should only suggest to the Committee that it might be interesting for them at a later date to hear what the Inspector himself says; especially for this reason, that it is quite impossible at the present time to say what the cost of maintenance of men at one of these reformatories is. All I can say is that the cost has been reduced steadily at the privately managed ones, and those that have been managed by local authorities have not been established long enough for any opinion to be expressed about that.

1204. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Is there not a State subvention of so much a head?—Yes.

1205. Do you know how much that is?—Well, I believe at the present moment it is being discussed with the Treasury. I forget now what it was started at.

1206. (Mr. Davy.) I think I see what is in your mind, but is it quite clear on the evidence what is the connection between what you are saying now and the labour colony?—The connection is this, that the one practical scheme that has been put in black and white for a labour colony, that is to say, Sir John Gorst's Vagrancy Bill, follows word for word the Act setting up the inebriate reformatory system.

1207. And I suppose what you are suggesting is that as a variety in the character of the different inebriate reformatories has been useful, so a variety in the character of the labour colonies would be useful?—Yes. For instance, it is quite possible that one of the present inebriate reformatories might, if an Act such as Sir John Gorst's Bill were passed, be certified also as a labour colony. It is quite possible that there might be two institutions certified for both purposes.

Simpson.

Simpson.

1208. When you speak of an inebriate colony run privately, would that be by a private charitable society, or would it be run as a commercial speculation?—Well, of the inebriate reformatories there are none being run as a speculation that I know of.

1209. You mean then run by private philanthropy?—By private philanthropy.

1210. (Chairman.) Some of those previous to the Act were run to a certain extent commercially; in this respect, that they took in a large number of private patients?—The retreats?

1211. The retreats, I mean; are they still going on?—They are. Nothing can be a reformatory unless it is certified by the Secretary of State, and I doubt very much whether the Secretary of State would be inclined to certify as a place to which people might be committed compulsorily, any place which was run as a commercial enterprise.

1212. I was not suggesting that those are places to which people can be committed; those are the voluntary ones, of course?—Yes.

1213. They admitted paying patients; I do not say they were paid for entirely, but they were paid for, very largely, by the contributions of the patients?—Yes.

1214. Supported to some extent by philanthropic people?—Yes.

1215. And further supported by the contributions of many of the patients?—I believe it is more usual for the patients' friends or relatives to offer to pay to induce them to go there.

1216. (Mr. Davy.) This seems to me to be a very important point. In your judgment would it be possible to give compulsory powers of detention in labour colonies, or in any other institutions, to societies or individuals who were working those institutions for a profit?—If the powers of certifying the institution as a place of legal detention rested with the Secretary of State, I think he would be very reluctant to give a certificate to any place that was being run for the purpose of profit, but I have no authority to speak for him.

1217. Leaving apart whether it was run for a profit, would there be objection if incidentally a profit were made by some private society; would not that be an objection to giving the society compulsory powers of detention?—I should not like to say that if the Secretary of State certified a place as a proper place for compulsory detention on philanthropic grounds, it would afterwards lose the certificate simply because some profit happened to be made from it. I think probably it would be necessary to make some regulation as to how the profit should be spent.

1218. Some sort of investigation of accounts would be necessary, would it not?—I think certainly the accounts would have to be open to some sort of audit. But I should like to add this, that I think it would be perfectly possible to have an institution free from audit except in one particular department of it, which would be your quasi prison, and have only the accounts of that part of it open to some sort of public audit.

1219. (Sir William Chance.) Sir John Gorst's Bill only referred to vagrants committed under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, or the amending Acts. The persons who may be dealt with under the Act fall into three classes:—(1) idle and disorderly persons; (2) rogues and vagabonds; (3) incorrigible rogues. This Bill would not touch the ordinary vagrant?—It is an extension of the Vagrancy Act, 1824.

1220. Yes, but it does not cover the ordinary casual tramp?—No, it deals with vagrants as offenders against the law, as criminal offenders.

1221. If as the Poor Law Unions Association want, as was told us yesterday by Mr. Brown, our tramps are to be sent to these colonies, this Bill would have to be extended to cover them?—Yes. If they wanted to send any one to the labour colony, besides persons who had committed some criminal offence, certainly the Bill would have to be extended.

1222. (Mr. Davy.) As I understand, as regards the means of detaining in an inebriate colony, the patient makes a statement before a magistrate that he is willing to be committed?—Oh, no; those are the voluntary retreats. In an inebriate reformatory he is committed just the same as if he were committed to prison.

1223. It is suggested that vagrants before going to a farm colony should make a similar sort of statement of willingness to be committed?—Yes.

1224. To sign an agreement in fact?—Yes, to make the labour colony not only equal to an inebriate reformatory but also a licensed retreat.

1225. As a mean between a purely voluntary system and one of committal for a definite period?—Yes, that would be; it seems to me the analogy of the inebriates would make that quite feasible.

1226. That is a form of compulsion which has been very much advocated, as perhaps you know?—I have not heard much about it. I do not think there would be many vagrants who would be prepared to swear away their liberty—if I may put it so.

1227. (Chairman.) Do you think it possible or probable that vagrants would sign themselves away—as the old term was in the inebriate retreats—after experience of life on the road?—I have no means of judging, but I should have thought a priori that it was exceedingly improbable.

1228. (Mr. Davy.) Then as to the compulsory sending to a reformatory—not to a retreat—the suggestion is that as inebriates are sent for their mode of life so vagrants might be sent not for a specific act, but for their mode of life?—I think that seems very reasonable, because that is the marked feature of the Vagrancy Act throughout, that it deals with people not so much for a particular offence as for their mode of life.

1229. For their mode of life?—One might refer on that point to the case of *Pointon v. Hill, where it was laid down very specifically that the Act was only aimed at the persons who led a particular mode of life. That was a case of colliers on strike taking round a cart and asking for alms, and looking at the particular section it was said, "Are they not beggars?" and the courts said "No, they are not beggars, because it is not their ordinary mode of life"—and they quashed the conviction. The Vagrancy Act is a very remarkable Act in that way; it is logically and scientifically drafted though it is a consolidation of a number of pre-existing Acts; it has been drafted in a way which I should think it would be very difficult to find a parallel for in any other penal Act. It has worked exceedingly well, and it has given the opportunity of bringing in other classes easily. Perhaps this is rather off the point, but to illustrate the nature of the Act take the Vagrancy Act of 1898 which is a very good example. What it was wanted to hit was the souteneur who lived on the earnings of a prostitute. It was found very difficult to make that a criminal act; in the ordinary sense you could not define any particular act, but by allowing him to be treated as a "rogue and vagabond," the difficulty was removed and the statute has worked smoothly. And I think there are other cases in which a lot of people living a disorderly mode of life have been brought within the Act of 1824.

1230. That Act anticipates the modern philanthropic way of dealing with crime by allowing magistrates a certain power of relief; I mean they can give way-tickets?—Yes; that provision, if I may say so, seems to me a little out of harmony with the rest of the Act; the rest of the Act is penal.

1231. To go back to my original point, there would be a difference between inebriates and vagrants, would there not, in this way, that an inebriate would not be quite compos mentis?—Not quite; but I am not sure with the vagrant.

1232. (Chairman.) He is supposed to be?—Well, it is a difficult point; the common phrase "borderland cases," I should imagine, might be applied to a great number of tramps just as much as to inebriates. It is very hard to draw the line between defective intelligence and diseased mind.

1233. You are aware, of course, that in the case of an inebriate, he must either plead guilty or be found guilty in order to be committed by the court to an inebriate reformatory for a certain number of years. Would you contemplate a change in the law with regard to vagrants which would put them in the same position as inebriates under the Inebriate Act, namely, that they would be brought before the court and tried, and found guilty of being habitual vagrants, and then committed to a labour colony?—Certainly. The suggestion in the Vagrancy Bill is that any person found by a court of summary jurisdiction to be an idle and disorderly person, or a rogue and vagabond, or an incorrigible rogue, may be committed for trial, and shall be liable upon conviction on indictment, or if he consents to be dealt with summarily, on summary conviction, to be detained for a term not exceeding three years in a certified labour colony.

1234. That puts it exactly on the same footing?—Yes. What occurred to me as being perhaps a little simpler and more straightforward would be simply to give quarter sessions power in the case of every incorrigible rogue sent to them for sentence, to order the defendant to go to a labour colony; it would be a very simple procedure.

1235. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Instead of the twelve months?—Instead of the twelve months' imprisonment. I think that is the weak point in the Vagrancy Act, that the quarter sessions have no power to do anything except whip an incorrigible rogue or send him to prison for twelve months.

1236. (Chairman.) Twelve months in addition to the punishment that he has previously received. The court below may have given him, say, three months?—Yes, well, the court below does not really sentence him; they convict him, and commit him to quarter sessions, and he is put to hard labour in the meantime.

1237. But the words are "further dealt with"?—He serves the hard labour till the quarter sessions.

1238. (Mr. Davy.) Could you give the number of those cases?—There are not very many, I suppose, in a year.

1239. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) I do not suppose there would be a hundred?—There might be.

1240. (Mr. Davy.) Do you ever get a conviction as an incorrigible rogue other than in a case where a man has deserted his wife and children or neglected to maintain them?—Well, we do not hear of many; we certainly know of cases of indecent exposure, for instance.

1241. I am talking of the vagrant?—Of sleeping out.

1242. Well, neglecting to maintain?—I should think not, on the ground probably that for that sort of offence the magistrate takes rather a lenient view, and does not like the idea of twelve months' imprisonment. I think if the magistrates thought that by committing a man to quarter sessions, quarter sessions would then have the power to send him for a long term to a labour colony, it is not improbable that a great number of courts would convict very much more readily as incorrigible rogues.

1243. That may be so, but the fact remains that at present there are hardly any convictions as incorrigible rogues, and when there are they are always in cases where a man has neglected his wife and family?—In the case of tramps.

1244. It is always for neglecting to maintain, in my experience?—I believe that is so.

1245. And I have only known one case in which a man was flogged for it?—I have never known any case of a man being flogged for it, but I have known of some—I should not like to say there are many—in prison as incorrigible rogues, and their only offence was neglecting to maintain. But usually it is thought for that three months is enough.

1246. (Chairman.) Have you any information to give us with regard to the tracing of tramps by the finger-print system?—I think there would be so many tramps that it would be impossible to establish a registry for them. At the same time it is just as well to mention, as it may help the Committee in any proposal that may come before them, that at the present time there are in round numbers about 70,000 records at New Scotland Yard of criminals, and the officers there can pick out in a very few minutes and say whether a record that comes up to them is that of a man whose finger-prints they have. An ordinary search takes about two minutes, and a quarter of an hour is probably the maximum time to satisfy themselves whether they have got a record of the man.

1247. Then I take it those are experts—the men at Scotland Yard; you would not find an ordinary county policeman, however good he might be, do it in that time?—That is so. Mr. H. B. Simpson.
29 Nov. 1904.

1248. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) There would be only one central bureau as for the criminals?—One central bureau. I think that a man of ordinary intelligence could learn to do it in a very short time.

1249. Anybody can take the finger-prints; the identification would be at a central bureau?—At a central bureau; but any one can become an expert with a few weeks' practice.

1250. (Dr. Downes.) Do they take finger-prints alone, or do they take measurements as well?—They have given up measurements now.

1251. (Mr. Davy.) There is considerable pressure in prisons now, I gather?—There is.

1252 Especially for the short time prisoners?—I believe so.

1253. Who can build a new prison: the Home Office, or the Prison Commissioners, with the consent of the Treasury?—The Prison Commissioners.

1254. Do they go direct to the Treasury?—No, they come through the Secretary of State. The legal position as to the vesting of the land is a little intricate, but practically what the Prison Commissioners do is subject to the approval of the Secretary of State.

1255. But do they not have the power of initiative?—Yes.

1256. Is their report submitted to the Secretary of State?—Yes, their report is addressed to the Secretary of State.

1257. And, therefore, published by him on his responsibility?—Well, it is rather hard to say "on his responsibility."

1258. I mean, it is his report?—No, it is a report to him.

1259. The Prison Commissioners would start the idea or report on the necessity of providing a new prison?—Yes.

1260. It would be open to them to have any form of prison that they might suggest. They might have a form of prison like the Belgian farm colony at Merxplas, might they not?—I do not think so, because, historically, while penal servitude has no sort of definition, imprisonment has been most rigidly prescribed by Parliament. In 1898, the detailed regulations laid down in the Prison Act, 1865, were repealed and power was given to a Secretary of State to lay down regulations instead, but that does not give him power to make different kinds of sentences or different kinds of prisons.

1261. So that fresh legislation would be required if the Commissioners desired to start a prison especially for the vagrant class?—I should not like to say that positively, but I do not think the Secretary of State, by the powers he at present has, could make any social distinctions between one prisoner and another.

1262. It appears to me that the compulsory farm colonies are prisons; the people are there for a certain time and they are going to do certain work?—No, I should not call them prisons any more than I should call reformatory schools or asylums, prisons.

1263. What is the difference?—Well, in a wide sense you might say that an asylum is a prison because a man is compulsorily detained.

1264. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Or a casual ward?—Or a casual ward.

1265. (Mr. Davy.) Not for a criminal act?—In asylums there are a great many lunatics who are criminals.

1266. Yes, but they are not detained there as prisoners but as lunatics?—I think not. Take a man who cannot be tried because he is insane; is it not the theory that he is kept there because he has committed a criminal act and you cannot try him?

1267. That may be so of a limited class, but you would not call an ordinary asylum a prison, would you?—Certainly, I would not.

1268. What is the difference between a prison and a labour colony; what is the difference between Parkhurst or

Mr. H. B.
Simpson.
29 Nov. 1904.

Portland and the institution from which you may not escape, to which you are sentenced for a certain term and where you are segregated from your fellow creatures?—Well, it is very hard to draw any clear distinct line, but to my mind the essence of a labour colony would be, not the punishment of the man detained there, but that he should be prevented from doing harm; it is more a preventive than a penal measure.

1269. But all imprisonment also has a preventive side as well as a punitive side, has it not?—It has its preventive side, certainly, but no doubt the main object is punitive. I do not think you can make a clear distinction between a prison and a labour colony and the present reformatory school—the one runs into the other, but still there is a distinction between a labour colony and a prison, as there is between a reformatory school and a prison.

1270. But, in any case, in your opinion, it would not be within the cognisance of the Prison Commissioners, under their present power, to start an institution of the nature of the Belgian labour colonies?—No, I think not; it would mean introducing a social distinction which the Prison Act would not allow of. The Secretary of State could not make rules which would prescribe a particular kind of detention and labour for tramps, any more than he could say, "I am going to prescribe a particular form of labour and detention for bankers or barristers."

1271. I am not suggesting that he should, but I am suggesting it might be possible to have a special prison. I believe you have a prison with special regulations at Borstal, have you not?—Special power is given with regard to age.

1272. Quite so?—Age and sex.

1273. What I am suggesting is that you might have a prison to which should be sent all those persons convicted under certain Acts of Parliament?—No, you can make distinctions with regard to age or sex, or you can make rules for weak-minded convicts; you can do that, but besides that you cannot distinguish between one prisoner and another.

1274. Can you not send invalid prisoners to Parkhurst, for instance?—Yes, you can distinguish in regard to health. There is one thing, as we are on the subject of the labour colony and imprisonment; perhaps it would be useful to the Committee for me to refer to something that Mr. Preston-Thomas said, viz., that it is not right that people should be committed compulsorily to detention except to an institution under State management. I should just like to say with regard to that—of course, I have no authority from the Secretary of State to say what his view of the scheme for labour colonies is; in fact, I am sure that he would prefer to defer forming an opinion until the Committee reports, and personally I can say I have got no opinion upon the subject as yet; but if it were decided that a labour colony was a desirable amendment of the law, then, so far as the Home Office experience goes, there would be no objection whatever to the labour colonies being either under local management or under voluntary management, so long as they are under inspection by the State. So far as the Home Office experience goes, voluntary management for a new attempt at a new institution is the best thing. To give an example: Parkhurst prison was started as a prison for juveniles in 1838; voluntary enterprise started reformatory and industrial schools. As they advanced the necessity for Parkhurst died away, and the reformatory and industrial school system entirely supplanted it. The inebriate reformatories, which I have just mentioned, is another illustration. Prisons were originally under local control; the State gradually introduced more control over them, and in 1877 the Home Office took them over, but they were taken over purely for purposes of practical convenience and economy and administrative advantage; not at all, so far as I know, from any theory that the State ought to manage all places of detention; so that if a new experiment in the way of places of detention for vagrants were started, the precedents rather point to their being started under voluntary or local management subject to State control, than being started by the State.

1275. I suppose you would take advantage of the initiative and the energy of the voluntary societies?—Exactly. We find that there is a great deal of private enterprise.

1276. Have you considered the difficulty of making any system of colonies which would not be universal?—I do not myself see the difficulty.

1277. If the man is paid for out of the rates, the question of his settlement would arise, would it not?—The method which occurred to me was this, that the county authority should agree to pay a certain contribution for every man committed by their quarter sessions, and that the Government should agree to pay a certain contribution too. The county authority having agreed to do that, quarter sessions would have their hands free to commit any incorrigible rogues that they thought fit to the place with which the agreement had been made.

1278. (Chairman.) Have there been petitions received from prisoners with regard to the enforcement of the Vagrancy Act?—Very few; in "sleeping out" I do not think any; we never hear of any at all; begging very few, and those from obvious rogues; a great number from people who are committed for desertion or failure to maintain their families, but certainly no petitions that suggest in any way that the Vagrancy Act is enforced too rigorously at the present time.

1279. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) As a matter of fact, we get very few petitions from men under sentence of fourteen days?—We get a certain number; from people outside we get a great number; for instance, on behalf of people who do not go to prison at all, who are fined. Considering the notices of people convicted of "sleeping out" appearing in the newspapers, and the comments that are frequently made about such cases, it is rather significant that actual cases of hardship are never brought to notice.

1280. (Mr. Davy.) Has the Secretary of State unrestricted power of ordering the discharge of any particular prisoner?—He has always power to advise the Crown to remit any sentence that is passed.

1281. (Dr. Downes.) I did not quite follow what you said about the Secretary of State not having power to assign prisons to certain social classes; you could not make a prison for bankers or a prison for barristers; surely it is not a question of social position; it would be quite possible for a banker to come under the Vagrancy Act, would it not?—I mean, there could not be a special prison for a special class of offenders.

1282. But have you not ample power to transfer prisoners from one prison to another?—Certainly, but the whole theory of the Prisons Act is—I am not speaking of convict prisons—that in prison the discipline should be uniform throughout.

1283. Have you no power to classify prisoners?—According to age and sex.

1284. But not according to offences?—Not according to offences; the classification according to offences has to be done either by statute or by the court itself.

Mrs. HIGGS, called; and Examined.

Mrs. Higgs.
29 Nov. 1904.

1285. (Chairman.) Mrs. Higgs, you have come to us today to give us evidence from your own personal experience in some of the casual wards of the treatment which is accorded to women and children in those institutions?—Yes.

1286. From philanthropic motives, you yourself, I believe, became an inmate for the time being?—Yes.

1287. When did you begin to do this?—My first time was on August 19th of last year.

1288. And where did you first visit a workhouse?—I visited Dewsbury workhouse.

1289. Dewsbury in Yorkshire?—Yes.

1290. May I ask where your residence is; do you live in Yorkshire?—I live at Oldham.

1291. I believe you are the wife of a clergyman, are you not?—Yes, of a congregational minister.

1292. At Oldham?—Yes.

1293. And you were moved to go and visit those workhouses to see what the treatment of women and children was in them?—I have been for a number of years carrying on work among destitute women in Oldham, and receiving into my little home destitute women, and I became convinced that there was some cause driving women down into destitution, and I was surprised that when you asked women to go to the vagrant ward they considered it was no refuge for them. I wondered why this was, and what was the nature of the provision that our country made; and, therefore, I determined to investigate it.

1294. Was it from representations made to you by women that you determined to go and see for yourself what the treatment was in vagrant wards?—Yes, partly from that, and partly because I think that there ought to be some provision for destitute women.

1295. You are aware, of course, what the object of a vagrant ward is; not to provide a home but a shelter for wayfarers?—Yes.

1296. On their way from one place to another?—Yes.

1297. What other visits have you paid besides that at Dewsbury in August?—On the following night at the North Bierley workhouse in the neighbourhood of Bradford. Then I was in Tame Street ward, Manchester, on March 19th and 20th of this year.

1298. And any others?—No, these were the only three times.

1299. Two in Yorkshire and one in Lancashire?—Yes.

1300. Then what did you find was the treatment of the women in those three casual wards?—In the first place, I had to complain very much of the treatment of those admitting to the wards; in one case a pauper admitting women vagrants; and in the other case officials admitting women vagrants. I have to complain of the treatment I received from them.

1301. You personally?—I personally.

1302. You say that a pauper was acting in the position, say, of a porter?—Yes. There was a small hut inside the gate which was practically out of sight of the buildings, and the pauper was there admitting the vagrants, both men and women.

1303. He was acting then, as I say, as porter or gate-keeper?—Yes.

1304. (Sir William Chance.) What casual ward was that?—That was at the Dewsbury workhouse. It was not the principal entrance, but a side entrance which is usually used for the admission of vagrants apparently; this was a little supplementary place used at this other gate, and that would perhaps be why there was a man in charge.

1305. (Chairman.) How did you ascertain that he was a pauper?—I ascertained from the people that were in charge at the tramp ward to whom I complained of the conduct.

1306. Did you make a complaint to the master of the workhouse himself?—No, to the tramp ward mistress.

1307. Did you see the master of the workhouse?—No.

1308. Only the tramp ward mistress?—Only the tramp ward mistress, and a woman who was in charge over night. I complained first to her, and then she brought me to the tramp ward mistress in the morning, and I renewed my complaint to her in order to secure protection for going out.

1309. Yes, quite so. Then what was the nature of the conduct of this man. If I recollect aright, having glanced through your book, I think you accused him of somewhat coarse behaviour?—He practically solicited me, and he tried to kiss my friend. Of course, we gathered that probably he behaved improperly to many women who entered the workhouse.

1310. That, you say, you gathered; you did not see conduct of this kind towards anybody else?—No, I did not; it was simply an observation made by the tramp ward mistress. He said he would have offered me a cup of tea if I had come earlier, and she simply said, "Probably, many cups of tea he has given the vagrants."

I forget the exact words, but she evidently thought that he probably had used his trust in the same way with many other women.

1311. Did you then and there make a complaint with regard to that?—Yes, I made a complaint almost immediately.

1312. To the tramp ward mistress?—Well, there were two people in charge. I made a complaint to the woman who had charge over night in order to have security for the night, and I also complained again to the tramp ward mistress in company with this woman; in fact the woman asked me to remain to see the tramp ward mistress.

1313. The other woman, you mean?—That had charge over night. You see there was a woman who had charge of admission of tramps, and her duties ceased when she had put the tramps to bed, and she went away and left us locked in the ward, and then the tramp ward mistress came in the morning and set us our tasks.

1314. I see; you first made your complaint to this woman who was in charge for the night, and then you made a further complaint in the morning to the ward mistress?—Yes, in company with this other woman.

1315. Was the man then and there spoken to about it?—He was spoken to, to protect me in going out; I had to go to him.

1316. By whom?—By the tramp ward mistress. I think she said she would stand on guard and watch us out, and she did so.

1317. You did not make a complaint to the workhouse master himself?—No.

1318. Did you write to him, or was any further notice taken of it?—Well, no further notice has been taken. Of course, I know inquiries have been made in the workhouse.

1319. I mean to say, there was no complaint before a magistrate, or anything of that sort?—No.

1320. Or before the board of guardians; did you go before them?—No; I took no further steps about it.

1321. You took no further steps?—No; I made no inquiries, but I have since seen a guardian belonging to the union who told me that the matter had been righted; I expect the man would be dismissed from that post.

1322. That in fact is all you can tell us with regard to that. Was the other woman with you when the complaint was made?—My friend, yes.

1323. I did not know she was a friend of yours. I thought it was some one who followed you afterwards?—No, we went two together. Of course, her evidence is available to confirm mine.

1324. I suppose you were dressed in accordance with the character for the time being?—Oh, yes; no one could tell us.

1325. Did you find the wards well conducted?—In this ward it was rather lax, and cleanliness was very poor. For instance, the tramp who came in with us, who was in very dirty clothes, was allowed to sleep without a bath, and also, although of course I cannot positively prove it, the clothes were not stoved, or anything done to them, between one case and another. We saw them put away in a cupboard without being stoved, and the things we put on were dirty. I also saw a couple of insects crawling on the ceiling, and we considered that sufficient precaution was not taken for cleanliness in the ward.

1326. As to that did you make any actual complaint, or forward a complaint to the board of guardians?—I have made no complaint; I have not done anything with regard to the matter except simply to publish this book, which has been sent to every woman guardian and to the chairman of every board of guardians throughout the country. It was published by the Women Guardians' Association, and it was considered that that was the most effective way of remedying the evils.

1327. You did not write to the chairman of the board of guardians of Dewsbury?—No, I have taken no steps myself. In fact, I may say I was at first afraid of being put in prison for having gone. I quite thought they had legal power over me to put me in prison; therefore, I was naturally very chary about making my experiences public.

Mrs. Higgs.

29 Nov. 1904.

Mrs. Higgs. 1328. I see in your book that you say that the clothing was dirty, and that you saw insects on the ceiling; 29 Nov. 1904, were they bugs?—Yes.

1329. With regard to the conduct of the officials when you were in the casual ward itself, was that good?—In that tramp ward the conduct of the officials was quite good.

1330. They were kindly and attentive?—They were kindly and attentive.

1331. You passed the night there; was there any task for you before you went away?—Might I just mention the bed. We slept on a chain mattress, which is adopted in all workhouses now. It is most fearfully cold. You cannot get warm whatever you do; even with three or four blankets you cannot get properly warm, because the metal subtracts the heat from the body. We were quite new to the tramp ward work; we ought to have scrubbed the ward we were told, afterwards, but we swept it up, and cleaned everything, and then we were allowed to go.

1332. You did, I suppose, what was asked of you?—Yes. The food was miserable. The porridge was unsalted and perfectly nauseous. There was a saltbox, but there was no spoon allowed; consequently you could not stir your salt into your porridge; there was no drink of any kind. The bath-room, when we had had our bath, was locked up, and that was the only source from which water was obtainable; consequently, we were without drink with our food.

1333. There was no water obtainable in the casual ward—no jug or bottle?—No, no water at all, no drink.

1334. Tell me, when were the meals; did you have a meal at night and in the morning?—We were put to bed like babies and given our food in bed; and then in the morning we had to get up. We were allowed the use of the bath-room for a short time to get into our things again; and the woman, of course, who had not been bathed, put on her things just as they were—they had not been stoved. And then we worked in our own clothes.

1335. Then did you have a meal in the morning?—Yes, we had porridge and bread; again the same nauseous porridge, and no drink of any kind.

1336. Did you ask for water?—We drank from our hands from the bath-room tap.

1337. But did you ask for water?—No, we did not ask for it.

1338. You do not know that water would not have been supplied if you had asked for it?—We thought of asking for it before we were left alone, but we were left alone the greater part of the time.

1339. When your meal was brought in the morning, having had experience of no water the night before, did you ask for water in the morning?—No; of course we were quite fresh, and I did not think about thirst at the time.

1340. Then in the morning, after you had done what was asked of you in the way of sweeping up the room, you were allowed to go; what time was that?—About 11 o'clock, rather earlier perhaps.

1341. Then did you see this man of whom you complained, as you went out?—Yes, but he did not speak a word; he was under the eyes of the woman.

1342. I suppose that was your one visit to the Dewsbury workhouse?—Yes.

1343. Now, the next you went to was the North Bierley one?—Yes.

1344. Would you give us your experience there in the same way as you have already done?—We arrived just a few minutes before 8 o'clock at night, and our names were taken in quite an orderly way by a man who was in charge. Apparently, he might have been an official, but he told us he was a pauper.

1345. I see?—And we were absolutely alone with him in the place for a considerable time waiting for the portress. There was no impropriety as long as he was taking our names, but when we were sitting there waiting he began to talk to us in a very loose kind of way, hinting that he frequently gave the tramp women breakfast in the morning, and making inquiries about my being a married woman, and thinking I was a bad character, and so on. When the portress came she seemed very angry at first that we had come so late, but we were bathed, and then our clothes were put on one side. We thought, of course, that they would be stoved, as we were very wet, having marched through the rain. But our clothes were left exactly where they were till the morning and not stoved at all.

1346. There was nothing done to your clothes of any sort?—There was nothing done to our clothes.

1347. Did you put them away yourselves?—We put them on the floor as we were told, and if we had known we might have put them near the hot-pipes, but we did not know; consequently, they were damp when we put them on in the morning again. Then the garments that were given us were decidedly dirty. We were allowed to be together. We had the choice of being together or alone. The beds would accommodate two people, and we were shut up immediately until early in the morning in a stone cell, and gruel and bread were given to us. The gruel was perfectly nauseous with sweetness. It was sweetened with a kind of treacle, and was practically like a treacle posset; following on a hot bath and a cold tramp, I should think nothing more contrary to health could be possibly imagined.

1348. The gruel was warm, I suppose?—The gruel was warm and sweetened with treacle, and there was nothing to drink; consequently, with the dry bread, and the sweet gruel, we were positively raging with thirst.

1349. But again, did you not ask the attendant for water; there was an attendant, I suppose?—The attendant shut us up with this food; we did not know it was sweet like that till we had had it.

1350. But having had the previous experience at Dewsbury, did not you think at North Bierley of asking for water?—I do not think you can quite form a sort of conception of the terror that comes over you from workhouse officials. This official was remarkably sharp; she hardly allowed us time to get in and out of the bath; she ordered us about as if we were slaves; we scarcely dared to speak to her; she seemed as if she would snap you up for anything; we were perfectly frightened of her.

1351. To ask for a glass of water would not be likely to cause difficulty?—Well, you do not think of these things when you are in that condition.

1352. But, as a matter of fact, you did not ask?—We did not ask.

1353. Then had you a morning meal as in the other ward?—In the morning we had, through the kindness of a woman for whom we cleaned some boots, some coffee brought us. She brought us part of her coffee, and we had the sweet gruel again which we could not touch, and the dry bread, and then we had access to the water at that workhouse. We could wash out our mugs, and drink water from the bathroom tap after the morning.

1354. Was the water from the bathroom tap drinkable water?—Well, it was like bathroom water generally is; it tasted nasty, but it was water. It was not nice water at all.

1355. It did not taste like rain water?—No; it tasted like water that had stood in the taps.

1356. Water from waterworks, I suppose?—Yes.

1357. Did you make any complaint to the woman in charge of the tramp ward in regard to this man's conversation with you?—No, we made no complaint about that.

1358. Did you make any complaint again to any officials, to the board of guardians, or anyone?—No; I considered you could scarcely complain of a conversation like that.

1359. Of course, I quite understand you would not like to go into the actual words and so on, but did you make any general complaint?—No, we made no complaint; in fact, she was not an official to whom you felt you could make complaint.

1360. Afterwards you did not write, as having been in the casual ward, to any of the officials or the chairman of the board of guardians?—No. They have all been supplied with my pamphlet, which gives them an exact account.

1361. However, you did not do so?—No, I did not do so. Of course my object in going was not to rake up these little things; my object in going was to find out why destitute women were not really provided with a shelter when they were destitute, that was efficient, that was any use to them.

1362. Now, is there anything more with regard to the North Bierley casual ward. As far as the interior of the casual ward went, was it clean; was there any question of insects?—It was perfectly clean there, but the garments supplied were dirty. Evidently a clean garment was not supplied to every person; and they had been worn before; they might have been stoved, probably were, but they were not clean.

1363. Not newly washed?—And then the worst torture of all was the bed. It was a chain mattress, and there was a most curious chain pillow invented—a kind of flat shelf, which was just raised above the bed, and you could not, by any manner of means, get your head comfortable. There was no pillow of any kind, practically; we had to try and get our heads under this pillow and lie curled up somehow. I cannot imagine who invented such a cruel rack for tramps.

1364. Of course, you know as well as I do that one reason for using that mattress is that it is cleanly, that animals cannot take refuge in a wire spring mattress as they can in wood?—Yes, but I think it would be very easy to have instead of that a piece of rough hammock stuff stretched between four pieces of wood; that could be removed and stoved if necessary, and would be perfectly cleanly, and at the same time it would not have this dreadful coldness which comes from that wire mattress. If anyone tried to sleep on a wire mattress without a straw mattress on top, he would soon find out that it is a means of subtracting heat from the body, and in a stone cell, of course, it is necessarily cold.

1365. Was the cell warm; were there hot-water pipes?—No, it was not warmed in any way; it was summer time; there were pipes outside in the stone passages. Then, of course, the work I had to do was very hard for the food. The food was so very poor, and then, after a restless night, I practically did what I should have paid a charwoman about 2s. 6d. to do. I stoned a larder, stoned the steps all down; then when that task was finished I was taken to a place where they stored papers and clothing, and I had to stand on a high pair of steps and reach the bundles out one by one. They were frightfully cobwebby, and I had to dust all this place from top to bottom; all one side I did, and half way round the other, and then I suppose they thought I worked very hard and they let us off, and also gave us our dinner (which was an extra favour) of bread and cheese. Of course, then we were allowed to go; we had expected to be detained two nights, but we were not.

1366. What time were you allowed to go from there?—I suppose it would be about 12 o'clock.

1367. After you had had your dinner?—Yes.

1368. How long were you at work?—I was at work from very early in the morning; I should think it would be about half-past 5, but, of course, we had no means of telling the time; from very early in the morning till then I worked very hard. If I had been a charwoman I should not have worked so hard, and it would have taken me the day to do the work. Of course, the hard work on a slender diet produced a digestive upset; I was violently sick afterwards; the nature of the food is such, the moist food following on a hot bath, and sweetened with treacle, that it is really medicinal in its nature, and I think utterly lacks common sense for that reason; because, if you were to put your own child to bed with that kind of diet, you would expect medicinal results to follow; and, of course, in both cases I have been ill afterwards.

1369. Will you tell me what other women were with you in the ward on that night?—None at all excepting my friend.

1370. Only your friend and yourself?—Yes.

1371. Did you hear of any complaints made by women in the Dewsbury casual ward?—There was only one old woman with us who was tramping to reach a relative and she made no complaint. We told her, of course, of the treatment, and she said it was frequent in workhouses, and told us to avoid Bradford workhouse, because in Bradford workhouse there was a man in charge of the tramp ward—the porters took no heed and the man practically did what he liked with the tramps. Of course we had no means of verifying that, and I have been since told by the Salvation Army officials that women have frequently brought complaints of that kind against tramp ward officials or people in charge of tramp wards, but that they did not believe them. The women really urged that as a reason for not going into the tramp wards.

1372. I see. Do you know if in any of these cases any complaint has been made to the actual officials about this?—No, I am not aware of any complaint. Of course, the word of a tramp woman is so very rarely believed; it is scarcely any use under ordinary circumstances.

1373. However, you are not aware that any complaint has been made about it?—No.

1374. You say there was in the one case one other woman, and in the other case there was only your friend and yourself?—Yes.

1375. No children?—No children.

1376. As far as those two wards go, you cannot say anything with regard to the treatment of children?—No.

1377. Is there anything further with regard to the North Bierley case?—No, I think I have told you the principal points.

1378. Then the third case I think was this spring?—Yes, the third case was on the 19th and 20th March.

1379. That was at Manchester?—Yes. I went to Manchester because there had been assertions in the paper that it was a mistake for the men to sleep out in the brick fields, because there was efficient provision in the Tame Street casual ward, and that regulations had been somewhat relaxed, and, therefore, there was no excuse for men; and I thought I would go in to know what the conditions were and why they avoided it.

1380. Of course, you would not have any experience of the men's wards. You would find out what the conditions were in the women's ward?—I wanted to know whether the women knew about the extra facilities that were afforded.

1381. Quite so. Just tell me, because I do not know Manchester well, is this ward in the heart of the city?—Yes, this is somewhere about Ancoats, I think. It is in the heart of the poorest part. I am not quite sure whether it is only a casual ward or whether there is some workhouse connected with it, but it has been opened there on purpose for the casual paupers; the workhouses are more outside the town.

1382. This is an establishment for casual paupers?—For casual paupers, yes.

1383. Did you go in the evening again?—We went in the evening and we found they did not admit till 7. We had to wait outside for some time, and then we were admitted along with a few women and a number of men; and we had to stand in a ruinous kind of shed for a good long time before we were questioned. Then we were questioned; the women were taken first, and I can only describe the way in which the women were treated as a sort of bullying.

1385. A male?—A male; he was at a kind of little office and he questioned you through the window, and several were questioned before me, and he treated them in such a way that I thought they must be terrible people, a sort of scum of the earth, that he was admitting, because he simply bothered and bullied them so, and if they said they had not been there before—that was the first question he asked them, "Have you been here before?"—if they said they had been there before then he said "Off with you." He would not allow them to come in at all. If they said they had not been there before, then in some cases he absolutely denied it and told them that they had been, that he knew their faces, and so on. In other cases, if they made the slightest answer to him he accused them of cheek. Of course, I thought being a respectable married woman

Mrs. Higgs.
29 Nov. 1904.

Mrs. Higgs. that if I were simply to state that I wanted a night's refuge, and I was going to my husband, it would be all right. I did not expect to be bullyragged; but on the contrary he began with me and insinuated that I was a bad character, and that I was going about the country, and he said all kinds of things to me.

1386. Did he say that he knew you. Did he mistake you for somebody else?—No, he did not.

1387. He did not say that?—He did not say that; but he said, "See you do not come here again." On which I said I should not. Of course, I really got quite confused under his questioning, because I never expected such a thing as that. And then he also treated my friend in just the same way, and accused her of being a bad character, going up and down the country with me.

1388. Then he was the porter?—Yes; I do not know what his position would be.

1389. No, but he was in what may be described as the porter's lodge?—Well, he was in charge. I ought perhaps to mention that at the Dewsbury workhouse I saw one poor man sent off, simply ordered off, because the porter said he had claimed relief for the second time within the month, and also here I saw somebody ordered off. Of course, that is contrary to regulations, because when they order people off they ought to take the names of them and submit the names to the guardians; and at the same time, if people are ordered off like that without any record being made of it, there is no security but that numbers of poor people may be ordered off on the simple word of the porter, and there is no redress for them.

1390. How many did you hear ordered off?—One.

1391. A woman?—A woman in this case; and a man in the other; the man was in the last state of destitution and could not possibly have reached any workhouse for the night.

1392. After this cross-examination, you were allowed to go into the casual ward?—Yes.

1393. Now, what was the condition of the casual ward?—That was spotlessly clean and there was a very kind, stately kind of official in charge, and we were given our food. The food in that workhouse was good. The gruel was nicely seasoned, and the bread was nice and it was palatable. Of course, there was no drink. We were then ordered to the bath immediately after having our food, which, of course, is an insanitary thing. I mean it is not recognised generally as good to go and have a bath immediately after a meal. We were also commanded to wash our hair, which in the other ward we were not obliged to do, and one very small towel was given us for all purposes; consequently, it was quite impossible to get our hair dry. We practically had to go to bed with very wet heads, and the garment that was given us was very scanty, and exactly like a hair shirt—very rough flannel and not a proper size.

1394. Were they clean?—No, not clean; neck dirty; had been stoved. And the blankets were filthy to touch. They were stoved every day; we saw them taken away to be stoved. One or two people when we were there were excused the bath for various reasons, and these people, of course, slept just as they were in these blankets, and these were lumped in the stove; consequently, there would be every night some blankets in which dirty people had slept which had simply been stoved. In other respects that workhouse was beautifully clean, so that it was simply a want of thought with regard to the fact that if dirty people slept in blankets they must necessarily be dirty afterwards.

1395. As to the food, you say there was nothing to complain of?—There was nothing to complain of excepting this; we had there the full Government regulations—the two nights' detention and the regulation food. Now, the result of that food is this; you have four times gruel and dry bread, and the gruel becomes more and more distasteful to you, not only to ourselves but to the others. There was a large number of women in with us there; more and more gruel was left at every meal, until at the last meal which was given us just before we went out of the workhouse, scarcely any one of the women who went out of the workhouse touched it. It becomes utterly distasteful; not only that, but the nature of gruel is such that warm gruel induces perspiration; makes all the pores of the body open; consequently, if you try to do hard work on this gruel diet you simply are covered with perspiration from head to foot and you come out in a terribly weak state. And also the gruel, if it is made over night and left till the morning has a tendency to be sour. In most workhouses they do so. The gruel you have in the morning being slightly sour upsets your digestion. I was thoroughly ill before I came away, and my friend has practically not quite recovered her health from the treatment of these two nights' detention. We were put to sleep on plank beds, with our hair wet, of course, in those rough garments with three blankets. The beds were so close together that you were quite close to your neighbour on either side whichever way you turned. And a large number of the women who came in seemed to be suffering from severe colds; consequently, you were under the double influence of wet heads and uncomfortable bed and bad garments, and then also contagion, actual contagion from your next door neighbour. Of course, it might have been rather different. The ward was large enough for the beds to be more separated. I do not know why they were put so very close together, but you had a woman tossing and turning on each side of you; and then women were continually admitted until quite late hours of the night, and every time the bed was let down with a bump. The portress came in, and in rather peremptory tones ordered the women about; and, consequently, every time a fresh inmate came in your rest was disturbed.

1396. How long did that go on?—Oh, I should think till past 12 o'clock at night, and we were roused about half-past 5 in the morning.

1397. Not after 12?—It might have been later; I cannot really tell; there is no means of telling time; it might have been up to 1 o'clock. There was a woman brought in that evidently suffered from delirium tremens; she was put to bed, but she would not settle down and she was turned out again.

1398. She was taken out when they found she was an uncomfortable companion for you?—Yes; she was, I think, dismissed.

1399. Then after the night's rest?—Rest?

1400. Such as it was; You say about half-past 5 in the morning you got up, and then you had a task, to do. I understand you were two nights there, were you not?—Yes.

1401. What was your task in the morning?—After our breakfast of gruel and dry bread I first of all picked oakum. I was offered a choice of going to the wash-house, but I cannot wash very well; I cannot stand over the wash-tub; so I chose the oakum, and I tried picking it for about two hours. There were two other women picking with me, and they were both of them apprentice hands. One of the women had once picked it before, she showed us how to unravel it; of course it was the hard sort. Then after the two hours the tramp mistress came in and asked if any of us would like to go cleaning and I very gladly accepted. Then I was put to clean down a staircase with three landings, two waterclosets and two lavatories; and I had to scrub all down these stairs. There were some workmen about; they were walking up and down; I had a good deal of trouble to get the stairs clean because the men were always walking up and down making foot-prints. I got it all cleaned by dinner time to the satisfaction of the tramp mistress.

1402. There was no complaint in regard to it?—There was no complaint; it was only the proper work. The only complaint I should make with regard to that—1403. But there was no complaint made against you?—Oh, no.

1404. You did your work to their satisfaction?—She came round to see how I was doing in the first place. When she saw I was doing very well, she left me and I practically did all the work myself.

1405. Then you had your dinner; what time was that?—About 12 o'clock.

1406. What was the dinner composed of?—A very little bit of cheese and bread. I fortunately had a little tea and sugar. I had only a rough apron given to me; of course, I had to work in my own clothes, and that is one of the things with regard to the tramp ward, that women's clothes get so dirty that you are practically, as it were, robbed of something in going in, because your clothes become far less efficient for working. If you had a week in tramp wards you would be utterly unfit to earn your living, because your clothes would have got by that time so dirty that nobody would engage you.

1407. I thought that was the ward you said was clean when you went into it?—Yes, but you put on your own clothes.

1408. Yes?—Then you go and do dirty charwoman work.

1409. You mean that it is not in the tramp ward but in the work outside that you get your clothes soiled?—It dirties your clothes, and you have no opportunity to wash them at all; and consequently you go out of the workhouse poorer to the extent to which your clothes are dirty. If I had to pay a charwoman for the work I did that day I should certainly pay her 2s. 6d.

1410. Then in the evening had you a similar meal, or had you tea or anything of that sort?—After dinner I had to go to work again.

1411. Yes?—Then about 4 o'clock, I think, I went back to the tramp ward.

1412. To the ward itself?—There I assisted my friend by doing another piece of work which she had been set to do. She had been scrubbing the whole of the big ward and was utterly fatigued, and I scrubbed another part, taking part of her task for her, and at 6 o'clock we had our meal for the night—the third meal; that was gruel and dry bread again. And that turned sour on my stomach and I had a digestive upset in consequence.

1413. You had the three meals in that day?—The three meals.

1414. The morning meal of gruel and dry bread; the bread and cheese in the middle of the day; and the gruel and dry bread again in the evening?—Yes.

1415. Was there any difficulty about water there?—No; I asked there and we were allowed to get the mug to drink from the bathroom tap, from the lavatory tap, but the mugs were metal, and they were very brilliantly polished, and they tasted of the metal polish and the soft soap that had been used. We tried two, but one tasted of soft soap and the other of metal polish.

1416. Then the next morning did you do a task again?—Perhaps I should mention that by the kindness of an official there we obtained hot water in the middle of the day to put on our own tea; therefore, we had a drink of tea in the middle of the day. Then the next morning we were dismissed at half-past 6 or thereabouts. I think it was either 6 or half-past, after having gruel and bread again.

1417. Then you had no task the next day?—No task the next day.

1418. You were allowed to leave after you had had your breakfast?—Yes. The bed, I should say, was a plank bed. There were straw mattresses, but they were only allowed to people who were lying ill.

1419. Then with regard to the officials, you say that the man who cross-examined you on your entry was rough and domineering?—Yes.

1420. Have you any complaint to make in regard to the other officials?—There was one that was very peremptory; it was not exactly that she was unkind, but she was so sharp in ordering everybody around; and also there was one case that we thought was a case of great hardship. There was a woman who had gone in—of course, we believe that her story is true, because she told us repeatedly just the same, and she had no reasons for telling falsehoods to those who were with her—she had come into the workhouse under the impression that she would only be detained one night. She had a place of work to go to next morning. She begged to be let out. After a great deal of trouble she was let out and got to her place of work too late. The mistress would not take her. She wandered about Manchester all day and came back and claimed her second night and to be let out next morning. For coming back that way she was condemned to wait four nights. Of course that practically means starvation, and also it means your clothes being in such a state that one would scarcely be fit for employment afterwards. I think that this is an important point.

Mrs. Higgs.

29 Nov, 1904.

1421. You did not see her afterwards, I suppose, because when she came back you would have gone?—We were in the ward with her, you see, when she came back again. We left her behind us. There were quite a number of inmates of this workhouse, but there were only about two who were regular tramps; the rest of them were really the wives of working people who were travelling with their husbands in search of employment. And in one case there was an old woman, and I think you would almost count her amongst the tramps, but she had only been made a tramp by compulsion. She had been supported by a married son until his place of work had been burned down by fire, and he had been unable to support her any more, and then she had been really forced into tramping about. She did not wish to give up her liberty and go inside the workhouse, but latterly she thought she would go inside the workhouse, but she had found difficulty in obtaining admission. She had applied, so she said, and had been refused. I think that is a difficulty very often with these people, when they really get to be vagrants they can scarcely get taken into the workhouse. She waited to see the doctor.

1422. Were there any children in the ward?—Yes, there was a woman with a child who was going to apply for admission to the workhouse the same day.

1423. Was there any difficulty about the food for the child?—No.

1424. What was the food for the child?—I really did not see what was the food for the child, because that person was not admitted at the same time as we were. There were no children admitted with us.

1425. So you practically do not know?—I practically do not know.

1426. (Mr. Davy.) What was the number of female tramps?—At Dewsbury there was only one tramp with us.

1427. Besides yourselves?—Besides ourselves.

1428. Were there separate cells there?—No, it was an associated ward.

1429. Had you access to water at all during the night; could you get into the bathroom, for instance?—No, the bathroom was locked up.

1430. No water in the ward?—No.

1431. Was there a bell?—I did not see one.

1432. At North Bierley, did you go into the separate cells there?—Yes.

1433. There was a bell there, I think?—I think so.

1434. I suppose if you had rung the bell you might have got water?—Possibly.

1435. (Sir William Chance.) You have given us your experience in three tramp wards?—Yes.

1436. When you went into these workhouses you were not dressed as you are now?—Oh, no, I had a shawl on, what they wear usually in Lancashire and Yorkshire.

1437. You were disguised, in fact?—Disguised, yes.

1438. You were complaining that they would not take you at first for a respectable married woman; an ordinary porter of a casual ward would not necessarily take you in your disguise for a respectable married woman?—He began by inquiring why I was there, and I stated to him that I was a married woman rejoining my husband.

1439. I see?—Because he did not believe my word; he simply began to bother me about being a bad character.

1440. Do you think there are many respectable married women who go into the casual wards?—There were two respectable married women in the casual ward with me.

1441. Yes?—One had been an hotel waitress at Middleton, Ilkley, and her husband had been a singer in the church choir, and he was employed at some trade that was rather going out of fashion, and they had had to go from one part of England to another to try and find a place where he could work; and certainly she worked very well; and there was nothing in either her conversation or what I learned of her character, to show that she was otherwise than a respectable married woman. She was bothered the same as I was.

Mrs. Higgs. 1442. This was in Manchester?—In Manchester.

29 Nov. 1904. 1443. A great number of women tramps would resort to that particular casual ward; I suppose there were a good number on the night when you were there?—There would be, at a guess, perhaps about twenty; I do not know the exact number; there might have been fewer.

1444. Then it was only at the Manchester ward that you considered that things were carried out satisfactorily, so far as the general management of the ward was concerned. You complain of the beds being put too close; it was an associated ward?—The Manchester was the worst of all. The carrying out of the Government regulations was exact, and the cleanliness was good, and the food was good; but the treatment, the total effect of the treatment, was the worst of any. The treatment was so hard, that practically I went in in full strength and health, and it took me a month to recover from the effect of the treatment; and my friend, who is a working woman, suffered as well as I did. You were utterly deprived of your health, deprived of your cleanliness, and made in a condition in which it would have been impossible for you to get your living afterwards for some time. I could not have gone to a day's work after leaving that ward.

1445. I understand you made no complaint at all about your treatment in any of those workhouses, because you were frightened of being arrested and fined and sent to prison?—The man who admitted me said he would send me to prison; of course, I went in under my right name, so I suppose the law has no hold on me, and I was practically at the moment destitute; I had no money; I was perfectly destitute.

1446. That is your explanation why you did not make any complaint at the time?—Yes.

1447. (Dr. Downes.) Did the official who admitted you at Manchester suspect that you were not a regular casual?—No.

1448. I think you said that the regulations were strictly observed at Manchester?—Yes.

1449. But did you not tell us that some one was refused admission at one ward?—Yes, I mean the regulations inside the ward itself, the regulations that are up on the wall as to the treatment of casual paupers; but you will observe that in North Bierley and in the other union they were evaded; there was not two nights' detention.

1450. Of course, the strict regulations require that on refusal of admission the circumstances should be reported to the guardians?—Yes.

1451. You have probably forgotten that you mentioned that case?—Yes, but is there not a law that they should be reported to the guardians.

1452. That is what I say—there is that regulation. You have told us that the regulations were strictly observed at Manchester; but a little while ago you told us that some one had been refused admission without the regulations being met. I want to remind you of what you said?—I want to make a distinction between the regulations inside the ward and those for admission; there was an evasion of the regulations for admission, but inside the casual ward the regulations were observed.

1453. Take the regulations inside the casual ward; you told us you had your food before you were bathed at Manchester?—Yes.

1454. The regulation is that you be bathed as soon after admission as possible?—I suppose they would think that was as soon as possible.

1455. That would be an evasion of the regulations?—Well, is it laid down that they should be bathed first?

1456. The words are "as soon as practicable after admission"?—Yes, I see.

1457. (Captain Showers.) Do you not think that, considering your position, and your general comfort at home where you are, you found these hardships more severe than the other people would?—No, I think not; and you see I secured against that possibility by taking a person with me who is actually able to do a good day's washing for seven people. (I mean that my friend, who is a working woman, could do any work, and I suffered less than she did). I am a working woman myself. I am accustomed to do a good day's work; I can do a charwoman's work at home any day; I am a minister's wife on a poor salary, and I have been accustomed to work hard all my life; therefore, I do not think I suffered as much as some of these poor women. I saw women there who appeared to be suffering more than myself, partly because they had been tramping. I went in in good condition, and they came in poor condition; and they were visibly haggard and weary and dispirited; whereas I had to look forward to returning to home and friends, so that I think the conditions were really less hard for me than for others.

1458. In regard to the food now, for instance; the other people, the people who are used to tramping about, would not find the food so nauseous as you would naturally?—They left it just as much as I did. Not only that, but you must remember that the working class diet does not now consist so much of that kind of food. Possibly, when the tramp ward was first created, gruel may have been more of a national food. Now, both gruel and pea soup affect people adversely. They say, for instance, that when children, who have been brought up amongst the working classes, are taken into a home they cannot at first take a porridge breakfast; that they have to be gradually accustomed to the food—to the gruel and pea soup—because they are accustomed to a more dry diet; and, therefore, the porridge and the soup adversely affect them.

1459. (Dr. Downes.) I think you said you had not met with any tramp children in the casual wards you went into?—Only one.

1460. Only one child?—Only one, and that child was suffering from illness, and the mother, on the recommendation of the tramp mistress, consented to go into the workhouse. I only saw them for a short time—they were admitted on our second night—only at breakfast in the morning I saw anything of them.

1461. Did you meet with any tramp children on the road?—No, but I have met them in common lodging-houses very frequently.

1462. Were the fathers in the common lodging-houses with them?—In many cases, yes.

1463. Have you reason to suppose there were cases where the fathers go into the casual wards, and the women and children go into the common lodging-houses?—Yes, I believe that is very frequent.

1464. Have you any knowledge of your own?—I have only from a common lodging-house which I have frequently visited in Oldham, where I have made constant inquiries, and I find that the people that are tramping about from place to place, if they possibly can, get into the common lodging-house. If they are absolutely destitute they will go into the tramp ward, and the father will go to the male side, and the mother will go with the child to the female side.

1465. Is that done so that the women may keep the money?—I think they usually go in, all the family together, because they have no money.

1466. No, but I was asking you about cases where it has been alleged that the men go into the casual ward, but the women and the children go into the common lodging-house?—Oh, I see.

1467. And one reason which has been given for that is, that in that case the women and the children keep the money which would otherwise be taken if they went to the casual ward; have you any knowledge of your own upon that point?—I do not know that I have any knowledge of my own upon that point.

1468. (Chairman.) What has been your experience of the common lodging-houses; have you ever gone in working guise and passed a night there?—I have been in several lodging-houses. First of all, a municipal lodging-house at Huddersfield; then a common lodging-house at Dewsbury; then two women's lodging-houses at Manchester; and finally, a common lodging-house at Stockport; and I have gone, of course, dressed in the same way as to the workhouses and slept in the common lodging-houses.

1469. Could you say what the treatment was in the common lodging-houses. Now, take first the beds: compare those with the beds that you have spoken of in the three different casual wards; were they better or worse?

—First of all, you get a bed and you can sleep; but it is probably swarming with vermin.

1470. The beds in common lodging-houses, you would say, would not compare with the beds in the casual wards with regard to cleanliness?—Well, I would rather go into a common lodging-house any night than to a casual ward. In spite of the vermin you can, at any rate, lie down and you can get some sleep, but you cannot in the workhouse.

1471. It is a matter of personal feeling about that?—I had never seen the animals in my life before I went into those places; it was a terrible thing for me.

1472. No, but what you say is that in the common lodging-house the ordinary condition of things is that the beds are verminous, whereas in the casual ward they are clean?—Yes.

1473. But, on the other hand, the beds in the casual ward are more uncomfortable than the beds in the common lodging-house?—They are not beds, really.

1474. No, they are sleeping bunks, we will say?—Well, they are worse than bunks. I could sleep in a bunk, or anything hard—I could sleep on the floor, really.

1475. One was a plank bed, you have told us?—The plank bed is worse than the floor, because it is narrow and it is so cold. You cannot cover yourself up properly, whereas you could roll up on the floor much better.

1476. In any of those casual wards, was any search made as to whether you had money upon you, and so on?—We were asked, in the first place, to give up our money and our bundle at the door. We gave them up. In the second place, we were searched after a fashion. We were asked if we had any tobacco, and the portress just passed her hand down us in a casual kind of way to see if we had a bulging pocket.

1477. Was there a woman searcher?—Yes, a woman in charge.

1478. A woman, I suppose, whose duty it was, amongst other things, to search the incomers?—She was a portress really.

1479. From what you say, I conjecture it was a somewhat casual search?—Yes, nothing much of a search. We could—in fact, we did—take in tea. When we found we could do it, we took in tea and sugar in our pockets, and that was not taken from us.

1480. That was not taken from you?—And our money was not taken from us the second time.

1481. It seems to me that apart from the conduct of the men, which I hope is not common, your principal complaint is that at Manchester the work was too hard; that in the other two the work was fair, considering it as a task of work to be performed as compensation for your night's lodging?—I do not complain of the work exactly; the work was equally hard in the North Bierley workhouse. What I do complain of is that the amount of work which is required is out of all proportion to the amount of relief that is given. If you did about a quarter of the amount of work, you would have paid for what you had received.

1482. I did not understand you to complain of the work in the other two. In the North Bierley ward was there a hard task of work?—I think I did about 2s. 6d. worth of work in both places and received about 6d. or 7d. of help for it.

1483. (Sir William Chance.) In those common lodging-houses were there cubicles?—There was a sort of partitioned-off place in the second one, Dewsbury, but there was a man sleeping in the bed next, and there was an open entry between the two. We were told for our comfort that he was a blind man, and there was a way in. Anybody could have come in to us at any time; there was really no proper partition—the whole of the upper storey of the house was practically open for anybody to walk about. We were in the married people's quarter, and we were in bed together, and there were a number of married people in the same room, but there was this pretence of a little wooden partition with a door through, without a fastening.

1484. Have you any complaint to make as to the sanitary conveniences in the casual wards?—No, I have no complaint to make about those.

1485. How did they compare with those in the common lodging-houses?—Of course, the sanitary conveniences in the common lodging-houses were fearful. There was only a sink down in the common lodging room, in which men were sleeping all night long, at which people could wash; and you had to come down in the morning, and you could only wash your face and hands, because there were sleeping men on the forms all round; and there was a closet out in the yard which was in the most fearful condition—dry, and apparently had been used by all the inmates of the house. I do not know how many there would be. I should say there would be at least thirty couples, and of course it was perfectly fearful. The condition in the municipal lodging-house was better in regard to sanitary convenience, but again the sink was in an open common room—the kitchen—and you could not do anything but go and wash your hands and face, because men were in occupation of the same room. Again, in Stockport, it was worse. You had to fetch every drop of water from the single men's quarters, hot and cold, and to wash at a little sink where there was a tap, which had no water running from it, in the common room; so, of course, there was no convenience in the common lodging-house practically for a woman satisfactorily to cleanse herself; and I think this ought to be borne in mind with regard to women tramps, because the women cannot help getting verminous. I myself was covered with vermin that night. One night a woman had slept in the bed before me; although there were clean sheets, a woman had slept there who had been there six weeks, and practically not changed her garments the whole of the time, and we slept in that bed with just clean sheets put over. Of course, it was terrible, and I could not have got clean; it would have been utterly impossible for me to get clean again if I had not been able to go home and use carbolic soap and other things to cleanse myself. Under ordinary circumstances I should have remained verminous. And this was so objectionable even to the women who were in the lodging-house themselves. They pitied me; they said: "See, that woman has been sleeping in a lousy bed." That is the word they used. They evidently pitied me for having got into that condition in one night. They said themselves they were afraid of this bed. There was only room for five people in the one room which was appropriated to single women. It was a common lodging-house for men and women, and it is one of the things I found out that everywhere in England there are scarcely any places for single women to go as apart from men, that they are obliged to go into the common lodging-house and to be with men in the common lodging-house, and at most there is a bedroom set apart for single women; sometimes not a room set apart for single women; and also two women are put to sleep in one bed, the two being strangers to one another, and one may be quite verminous; and consequently, all over England there is no proper provision for single women. And that is one reason I am so strong about an alteration in the vagrancy laws in regard to women, because I think there ought to be some place where a woman who is cast adrift in a town, or has come to a town, can sleep, to be under conditions which are suitable for her to pursue her work, and get employment again.

1486. (Chairman.) What you are saying now, I suppose, especially applies with regard to common lodging-houses; it does not apply to the casual wards?—It applies in this way to the casual wards, that it would be better for a woman, who is temporarily destitute in a town, to seek the refuge of the casual wards than the refuge of the common lodging-house.

1487. (Sir William Chance.) On account of the separation of the sexes?—Yes, and also on account of the better sanitation.

1488. So the casual wards have an advantage over the common lodging-houses in that respect; as regards their sanitary arrangements, and as regards the sexes being kept separate?—Yes, but they are worse than the common lodging-houses. If I had to choose—

1489. About the food in the common lodging-houses, how does that compare?—Of course, in the common lodging-houses you find your own food.

1490. (Mr. Simpson.) How much did you pay for the night at the common lodging-house?—3d. to share a bed, or 4d. to have a single one.

Mrs. Higgs. 1491. That was the same in all three, including the municipal common lodging-house you went to?—In the Dewsbury one we had to pay 4d. each to share a bed.

29 Nov. 1904. 1492. And that was the municipal one?—No, that was a common lodging-house. The municipal one was in Huddersfield. We paid 3d. each to share a bed.

1493. (Chairman.) But in all three there was this lack of decency—that women, you say, could not wash and could not cleanse themselves?—Yes.

1494. In any one of the lodging-houses you speak of?—In the lodging-houses you cannot wash yourself.

1495. No?—And in the workhouse you cannot wash your clothes. In the lodging-house you can wash your clothes; you could issue from the common lodging-house more decent and respectable, and more fit to get work than you would from the tramp ward; because you would have an opportunity of washing your clothes.

1496. (Mr. Davy.) You pay 3d. or 4d. to the proprietor of the common lodging-house as a commercial transaction, I suppose?—Yes.

1497. The lodging-house is run for profit?—Yes.

1498. I suppose there is a competition between lodging-houses in large towns?—Apparently. There is a great competition in the men's lodging-houses; but women's lodging-houses are gradually ceasing. In some towns there scarcely is a lodging-house for women. In Leeds I am told they have pulled down some lodging-houses, and the result is that there is scarcely accommodation for women, and women have actually been obliged to walk the streets because they could not get in.

1499. Does that indicate that there is any large demand for women's lodging-houses?—I think it indicates that men's lodging-houses are more popular.

1500. Yes; but I suppose if more women wanted lodging-houses, lodging-houses would be established for them on a commercial basis, would they not?—I am afraid the real explanation is that underneath the lodging-house there is this terrible system of rooms for men and women, and there is a great suction into these; and the proprietors find it much more profitable to run these rooms nominally for married couples than they do to run lodging-houses for single women.

1501. But if there was a demand on the part of single women for lodging-houses for women only, I suppose that demand would be satisfied commercially, would it not?—I do not think you could be sure of such a demand being commercially satisfied when the supply rests on private self-interest; because, naturally, private self-interest will go in the direction in which there is the greatest reward.

1502. You mean to say it pays the proprietor of a lodging-house better to run a lodging-house for men and women, than one for men alone or women alone?—I do not think there are many lodging-houses for women alone.

1503. But what I was trying to put to you is this, that if there was a considerable demand for lodging-houses for women alone, that want would be supplied, would it not; it would pay?—I do not think it would pay; it might possibly pay, but I do not think it would pay so well as the other; consequently, the man or woman goes in the direction of their greatest self-interest.

1504. Why would it not; it must be on the ground that there are not enough women desiring separate accommodation?—No, I do not think it is so. If you have a Salvation Army shelter you get a large demand upon that, or any shelter, where the women are moderately clean, and several go out to their daily work. Single women, or widows, or married women deserted by their husbands, will make use of such a place as that, and live there practically under protection; but supposing there are no such institutions, what happens is that these women are forced into all kinds of corners, into private houses, very often under very undesirable circumstances, into brothels very often; into these common lodging-houses mixed up with men; and it seems to me that it is one of the great public needs that there should be some recognition of the provision for women that have need to sleep under good conditions at night. I do not think you could look to private interest to provide for this great need, because these women are often so extremely poor.

1505. (Chairman.) Then, your suggestion, I take it, would be that there should be further provision made in casual wards for single women?—I should propose that single women should be received into the workhouse proper. I would do away with the casual ward for women. The reason of that would be three-fold. First of all the woman, if she were admitted into the workhouse proper, would receive the workhouse clothes; therefore, she would not work in her own, and her own would not be destroyed. She would go out in as good a state of cleanliness as before. Besides that, I think it is altogether wrong to recognise a class of vagrant women at all. I think it is a great evil to recognise that a woman has the right to go about from place to place in that unattached kind of way. I think she should be received at the workhouse proper; and then I would also propose the appointment in connection with every workhouse of a lady protector. I practically have been doing this work in connection with our workhouse for a long time. When a destitute woman was received under circumstances not favourable to her earning her own living, as a matter of course a form should be sent to the lady protector stating so—this is the form which I use; that form is sent me in the case of women who enter the workhouse (exhibiting form). From those particulars I learn whether there is a case I can assist, and in that way I continually set people on their feet again. No cases of destitution would drift into our workhouse and out again without help, excepting into the tramp ward. Of course, women who enter the tramp ward do not remain long enough for me to come into touch with them; and, therefore, the tramp cases are just the ones that we cannot assist in any way, except occasionally, I get these tramp women. For instance, two sisters drifted away from their home at a town near us and came into the workhouse. I was told about these girls, and I took them to my home, and kept them and sent them back to their parents. Now that is the kind of work that I think a lady protector might do. First of all, a lady protector might watch out for cases of that kind—girls that are wandering away from their homes. Then she might also watch out for cases of women that were in such a state of clothing that they could not earn their living effectively, and by a little charitable help very often set people on their feet again. That is what I am continually doing, taking people whose clothing has got to such a state that they could not earn a respectable living. I find if I take them in at the back door with scarcely a rag on their back, and turn them out at my front door respectable, I can get a situation for them, and in most cases make them self-supporting. It is very seldom I fail to get work for a woman. If I do, it is because she is a vagrant proper, and these vagrants proper are women who have really been educated into vagrancy by our tramp ward system, by being forced as it were to wander from place to place, being obliged when they have taken shelter in the tramp ward one night to pass on to another tramp ward another night to get shelter again; they are educated into vagrancy. I think it is a great mistake for our country to educate any women into vagrancy, and vagrancy among women, I think, ought not to be recognised at all.

1506. Would it satisfy your idea with regard to this, if some of the guardians were ladies who would be able themselves to investigate into the cases of women in the workhouse?—I think the lady guardians have their hands so full with the real work of the workhouse that it needs somebody independent. And then also the work of the guardians is to see that the Poor Law is properly administered, and the work of a lady protector would be similar to that done in France. They have these additional ladies in France. The work would be more charitable, to link charitable aid to relief of destitution. For instance, supposing a girl drifted into the workhouse with a child, probably she could be made self-supporting with a little charitable help. Again, supposing a girl drifted in, who was out of a situation, she could be helped; or supposing the case of a feeble-minded girl, or someone who needed to be put into a home; these cases could be attended to. It is not the work of the women guardians to do that; their hands are full with the poor law relief, but a lady protector would really find that her work.

1507. A lady protector, I take it, according to your view, would be some lady who kindly volunteers to do this work and who becomes a visitor?—Yes, a visitor for this purpose.

1508. There would be no Poor Law control in any way over her, but her duty would be simply to look after these cases as a volunteer, and to assist them in any way that she could?—The advantage of having one appointed would be in the first place that the relieving officer would have to send a paper to this lady; a paper stating the cases.

1509. Then you would have them appointed by the guardians, would you?—Yes, I would have the lady protector appointed by the guardians officially: I mean in an official position.

1510. Appointed or accepted by them; if a lady volunteered to do this, the guardians would accept her or otherwise?—Yes.

1511. (Mr. Davy.) Have the guardians interposed any difficulty in the way of your doing your work?—My difficulty in the work which I have been doing for five years is that though the guardians have officially recognised me and given orders to the relieving officers to furnish me with forms, I do not find that the relieving officers do so, because it is purely voluntary, and there is expense in furnishing me with forms. In the first place, I have to get the forms printed at my expense; then they have either postage or some little trouble in sending me the forms, and as they are not obliged by law to do it, it is voluntary, and they do it or they do not do it, as they like.

1512. The guardians could make them do it, if they liked?—They could not if there was any expense attached to it, of course.

1513. Why not?—I suppose it would not come under the Poor Law, would it; it would not be allowed.

1514. What would be the expense?—There would be the expense of postage, you see.

1515. A few shillings?—It would not be a great expense, of course; but there is all the difference between being obliged to do a thing and it being voluntary.

1516. You would make it obligatory on the guardians to do it?—Yes.

1517. Work such as you do at Oldham is done at a great many unions in the country?—Yes, but it is very often limited. For instance, you will have a number of ladies attached to the maternity ward, who do the maternity work, but they will not touch the lock ward, or they will not touch destitute girls who drift into the main body of the building; and, again, they may not of course touch the tramp ward at all; it is very often very limited work instead of covering more of the workhouse.

1519. Would you make the law compulsory on the lady protector?—I should lay down certain duties as the duty of the lady protector, and get a lady to take them.

1520. Then, if you could not get a lady to take them?—Then you would be obliged to do without her; but in a great number of cases I think you would find a lady protector very easily, and I think, perhaps—this is another advantage of it—it would lead to the training of a great number of ladies in charitable work, and also it would lead to the union of charitable work. I think it is a great evil that there are so many shelters and homes springing up, which work, very often, acts prejudicially with regard to the real interests of the country. I mean that they will take up cases that should not be taken up, and leave cases which should be taken up, and that arises very often from the lack of training of women in the real work of the poor law; and a number of women would be efficiently trained for work in connection with the Poor Law, if this office of lady protector were taken up systematically.

1521. You are aware, of course, that there are provisions for visiting committees of ladies, not guardians?

—I have been the secretary of a visiting committee myself, Mrs. Higgs. and that again is quite a different function.

1522. I suppose you are also aware that the number of the able-bodied women is very small indeed?—I know that. 29 Nov. 1904.

1523. And that in some counties there are practically none?—Yes; but, at the same time, it is an additional feature of the workhouse that women drift into the workhouse who could be made self-supporting with a little trouble. Often the only thing that lies between a woman and self-support may be lack of clothes, and it is not the function of the workhouse officials to assist any women in that way.

1524. (Chairman.) Perhaps, you might put it roughly in this way, that in your opinion it is very advisable that every encouragement should be given to ladies to do this kind of charitable work in the workhouse, and that every assistance should be given legally and otherwise?—Yes.

1525. I am sure you would say this, that it is difficult to lay down any hard-and-fast rule of what these ladies' duties should be. When you are dealing with voluntary help you must allow the volunteer a considerable amount of latitude; but all you would say is that every assistance should be given by the law or by the guardians to ladies who would undertake work of this description?—It would make it definite, if a form were sent for every woman who was admitted under forty who had not more than one child; a lady, if she received such a form, would consider it her duty to investigate that case. She would naturally go to the workhouse and interview that case; in the course of the interview she would learn what the circumstances were and by interviewing the girl or woman she would form some idea whether she could be made self-supporting.

1526. The lady would have to take the account given by the woman in question: that account would not be verified in any way?—This is one great advantage, if you get a woman to your door and you question her, she gives you her own account. If you get the woman in the workhouse, you have the relieving officer at her back to investigate and make sure of the information; therefore, you have a much better chance of assisting a woman whom you get at the workhouse in this way.

1527. You think the information in that case would be more reliable than it would be if you had only an oral account from the woman?—Yes; of course, I also immediately investigate the cases I get. I go to the address given me and find out the truth of the woman's statement.

1528. In the case of a woman who has come from a considerable distance, would you not have considerable difficulty in ascertaining whether her account was correct or not?—You have more difficulty; and if you write to the address and get no information, you know she is telling you lies.

1529. (Mr. Davy.) Your view would be, that by the abolition of the tramp ward for female vagrants a certain additional number of women would be brought into the workhouse and so brought into relation with these charitable agencies?—Yes, I think one very important thing is the detention of the feeble-minded. I think a large number of these women who drift about are really not fit to control themselves, and we might get a more effective control over them.

1530. You would have some compulsory power of detention for that?—For the feeble-minded, yes.

1531. And for the other ones, at all events, they would be in the workhouse a couple of days, and you would get into touch with them then?—We would get into touch with them and assist those that could be really put on their feet, who are really destitute.

1532. What about the women who are going about with their husbands—would you take them into the workhouse?—I think that women ought not to be allowed to travel about like that. I think it would be better if they were taken into the workhouse and the husbands were made to pay for them. I think they could go out with their husbands, if there was a reasonable presumption that the husband was a working man travelling about for work, after the ordinary detention.

1533. Anyway, some special arrangement would have

Mrs. Higgs. to be made for that class, either allowing them to discharge themselves, or taking them away from their husbands and making their husbands support them?—
 29 Nov. 1904. Yes. And in the case of children, it would be very desirable that they should be detained, in order that they should not tramp about with the children. I think it would give us an additional power over this class of vagrants. Of course, a vagrant man who has a wife and child takes that child about with him. He likes being a vagrant, he enjoys the life, and he drags the wife about. We should get a much greater power over this class of vagrants.

1534. Do you think any woman enjoys the life of a vagrant?—Yes, they tell me that it is a very happy kind of life.

1535. Although there is difficulty in getting proper sleep and food, and so on?—After a while, of course they do not mind so much.

1536. They get used to it?—They say it is a very healthy life, and the children who go along the road are remarkably healthy looking, certainly; therefore, they get a love for it, which is another reason for trying to prevent it. My own opinion is that the increase of vagrants proper is mainly by birth on the road.

1537. I am afraid the statistics hardly bear you out there?—No.

1539. They would not like the improved conditions as well as they like the present ones?—I think that one thing that prevents people going to the workhouse is the detention. They hate the detention; therefore, I do not believe it would make any difference. I think it would enable society to catch and to hold the really destitute woman, who was falling out of the home, and who needed to be cared for, who might be induced perhaps more readily to go into the workhouse in order that she might receive succour from the lady protector.

1540. You would not abolish the two days' detention in the tramp ward, supposing the tramp ward were continued?—I would apply the two days' detention only to vagrants—I must now go into the question of men if I mention that.

1541. Well?—I want the men to work in the afternoon, and then be discharged after one night, if they are travelling in search of employment; and for women, who go along with them, it would have to be considered in each case, whether they should be discharged with the husband, or whether they should be detained longer.

1542. You have given some attention to the matter of food. What food would you suggest that they should receive when they are detained two days?—I should suggest that they should have tea, coffee or cocoa for breakfast, with dry bread.

1543. Yes, and then the mid-day meal?—For the mid-day meal, I think they ought to have a larger quantity of cheese given them with the dry bread, and that they ought to have hot water supplied, so that they could use their own tea and sugar or else have some drink given them, but I think it would be sufficient to allow hot water to use with their own tea and sugar.

1544. You would allow women who could do so to bring in their own tea and sugar, then?—Yes, and supply hot water, and then they should share with one another. I do not think they would be greedy. And for the evening meal, I think gruel and bread would do for the first meal quite well. I do not want to pamper them at all, I simply want that the food should be such as would support nature, and I think if there was greater moisture and the drink allowed for the morning with the dry bread, and then if more cheese was given, because the little bit of cheese is not really sufficient to make a meal, that that would be sufficient.

1545. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you think gruel and bread in the evening would be enough?—Yes, when you first go on you could manage on that; and then it is not sour; it would be fresh in the evening.

1546. (Sir William Chance.) If you relieve these female tramps in the workhouse instead of in the casual ward, have you considered how far it would affect the law of settlement?—I think the law of settlement should be abolished altogether.

SIXTH DAY.

Wednesday, 30th November, 1904.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair).

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
 Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
 Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.
 Captain SHOWERS.
 Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary).

Lieut.-Colonel J. CURTIS-HAYWARD and Admiral CHRISTIAN, called; and Examined.

Lieut.-Col. J. Curtis-Hayward and Admiral Christian.
 30 Nov. 1904. 1547. (Chairman.) Colonel Curtis-Hayward, you have been chairman of the Gloucestershire vagrancy committee for some time, I think?—(Lieut.-Colonel Curtis-Hayward.) Yes.

1548. How long?—From 1883 to the 1st of April, 1904.

1549. What is that committee?—It is a committee formed originally by the quarter sessions, consisting of four members of their body and one member from every board of guardians.

1550. How many members are there in fact?—About twenty-four.

1551. Are you chairman of that committee now?—I am not at the present moment; I resigned on the 1st April last.

1552. Now, you have kindly come here to-day to give us some information as to the way in which vagrancy is dealt with in the county of Gloucester. The system in force is similar to the Berkshire system, is it not?—Yes, it is founded upon the Berkshire system.

1553. Can you explain to us what the system is?—Well, a vagrant on entering the county gets a ticket from the assistant relieving officer, who in most cases in our county is a police officer. That ticket has marked upon it his final destination and his description (ticket exhibited—see Appendix VIII). With that he goes to the casual ward, where, of course, he is dealt with in the ordinary way; he gets his food night and morning and he has to do his task. When he leaves, the master puts on the ticket the name of the union which he has to go to next day. It must be on the road to his final destination; and also the name of a bread station. We have got one in nearly every case half-way. Sometimes he has to go a little out of his way to a bread station. It is also a police station. If he arrives there between one and three, he is given a ticket on a baker close by.

1554. May I interrupt you for a moment; who supplies the bread to the police station?—(Admiral Christian.) The bread is supplied by the nearest baker—any baker in the village we go to.

1555. You have no regular stores of supply?—No.

1556. Then to continue?—(Lieut.-Colonel Curtis-Hayward.) If he arrives at the union entered upon the ticket that evening, he has what we call a good ticket; if, on the other hand, he arrives at some other union, or has no ticket at all, he is given a new one and it is considered a bad ticket. Our committee recommend the boards of guardians to detain, for one night only, all those who show they are passing as quickly as they can to the destination which they say they are going to; and to detain for two nights all those without any tickets, or who show that they are not going straight to their destination.

1557. When you say a "bad ticket," is there anything marked on the ticket to show it is a bad ticket?—No, it would show itself. For instance, supposing a man says, "I am going from Gloucester to Cardiff," he would have perhaps "Westbury" marked on his ticket to go to; and suppose he turned up at Stroud, which is directly in the opposite direction, we would say:—"That is not where you are going to; this is a bad ticket; you must have a new ticket, and you will be detained two nights."

1558. You still give him a ticket?—Oh, yes, we give everybody a ticket. That is different to what they have done in Worcestershire and other places, where they do not give a ticket. They tried to discriminate between good and bad; I mean to say—the bona fide working men and those who were not bona fide. We never attempt to make any distinction, because we say giving this ticket is taking away the excuse for begging; therefore, we say every man ought to have a ticket in his pocket.

1559. To take away the excuse for begging and loitering?—Yes; but I must say here, that though our committee have always recommended that those with the bad tickets should be detained two nights, and made to work, personally I have no faith in detention; no faith in it at all. I have stated so publicly on several occasions, I see, looking back more than ten years ago, and I am exactly of that opinion now.

1560. No doubt, your object is to get the honest man on his way as quickly as you can?—As quickly as you can; and even for the bad man I do not think detention has any deterrent effect whatever.

1561. You want to get rid of the bad men?—Yes; but I mean to say I do not think detention acts upon vagrants in deterring them at all, or that they dislike it.

1562. When the system was started, was there a different condition of things; were there more vagrants in proportion to population than now?—In Gloucestershire at that time we had a great many more than our proper share of vagrants. We had about 1 in 40 of the total number of vagrants throughout England, which we thought was a very large number; and, in fact, the admissions were about 60,000 in the year. We started the system on the 1st July, 1882; that is, before the Casual Poor Act had any effect. That did not come into effect till the 1st January following. In the first half of 1882 we had rather a larger number than we had in the first half of 1881; it appeared to be on an increasing scale, but the moment we started our system, it dropped 50 per cent.

1563. 50 per cent.?—Yes; half the number in the September quarter that we had in the September quarter of 1881.

1564. In the first quarter after the system started?—In the first quarter it was 50 per cent. and it continued on. Of course, after that people might have said: "Oh, that is the Casual Poor Act," which, no doubt, did in the first instance deter a good many. And if you look at the statistics of 1883 there were very few vagrants in comparison that year. They increased again almost immediately; the effect went off almost directly; whereas we continued our 50 per cent. reduction with very slight variation till 1891, when we got down to—well, our numbers were 22,000 against 60,000. I calculated that our ratio then was 1 in 94; whereas before that it would be 1 in 40.

1565. Can you say whether that had any effect upon neighbouring counties?—I think that the vagrants went elsewhere.

1566. I mean, did your neighbouring counties suffer?—I think they did; therefore, that is why I should have liked to have seen it thrown over a large area.

1567. Quite so?—Because I do not think the vagrancy throughout the country decreased in anything like the proportion. Then, sir, we have had a steady increase for some time. In 1900, when there was a general decrease all over the country, we had a decrease too. Our numbers then were 30,000—that is higher than our lowest, very much; still it was a reduction. Since then we have gone up. In 1900 we had 30,071; in 1901 we had 36,354; in 1902 we had 44,465; in 1903, 58,019; and this year there will be a still larger increase.

1568. (Mr. Simpson.) Is that the number of persons relieved at the casual wards?—The number of persons who are admitted; of course, many of them appear over and over again. If you want to get at the actual number you will have to divide them by the number of days in the year.

1569. (Sir William Chance.) You have got up, in fact, to what you were in 1882?—Exactly, we have got back to that number.

1570. (Chairman.) Will you proceed?—So that practically we have got back to the same state of things that existed before. Well, I find that while our figures have doubled in fact between the years 1900 and 1904, you will not find anything like that increase in taking the number of vagrants sleeping in casual wards throughout the country on the 1st January or the 1st July in any one year. I find here on the 1st January, 1900, there were 5,579; on the 1st January, 1904, there were 8,519; of course, a considerable increase, but not double; about 50 per cent.

1571. Now, in what way do you account for this steady and alarming increase?—I think, very likely, Admiral Christian would give you information about that—but I should say it was due a good deal to the novelty of our system having worn off, because all fresh systems, no matter what sort, have a deterrent effect for a short time, but it very soon wears off. But our system lasted so long that I was in hopes that it was of permanent effect. I fancy that the effect of it is wearing off to a certain extent, but there is also the fact that a large number of works are being carried on in the county. We have had Bristol in the one end of the county; there are the Avonmouth docks being constructed, which attract a large number of individuals. We had for a long time the Great Western Railway Company making a new line through the middle of the county, and then in the north of the county we have railway works again. I think Admiral Christian would bear me out in this, that it is an established fact that wherever the navvies are at work there vagrants abound. I suppose the ostensible idea of people being there is that they are attracted by the work. I believe they cadge upon the navvy. I am sure Admiral Christian will bear me out in the view that the navvy is a generous sort of fellow, he gets large pay, and they turn up when he is paid and they get a shilling and so forth from him. And on the road they have always got the plausible excuse that they are going down to Bristol seeking for work. I dare say you know similar cases have occurred elsewhere. For instance, while the Manchester Ship Canal was being constructed the number of tramps was so great there that I believe they had to hire warehouses to accommodate them.

1572. Is it not your opinion, Admiral Christian, that when there are large works going on, the idle men make that their excuse for going to a place, and the navy does encourage them ?—(Admiral Christian.) The navy, as a rule, will spend every penny he has got before he starts from one work to another. I have met them and spoken to them myself. I remember a man I met once. I gave him bread and I saw he was a hard working man. I said, "Where have you been employed ?" He said, "At Sodbury tunnel." "Do you mean to tell me you have come here for bread ; you have had very good wages during the last two or three months ?" He said, "That is all spent." They have what you call a "burst," you know.

1573. You account for this increase to some extent by these large works being started, and by the fact that a large number of honest navvies are on the tramp, and that they are accompanied by a good many men who are looking for what they can get ?—(Lieut.-Colonel Curtis-Hayward) I would say they were the majority.

1574. As far as the ticket system goes, has it worked well ?—Thanks to the police. It is essential in this that you should have the cordial co-operation of the police or else the thing is impossible.

1575. Then from first to last that system has been successful ?—(Admiral Christian.) It has practically stopped begging. People on the way-side do not give so much. This was left at every house and every cottage, warning people not to give. (Circular handed in—see Appendix VIII.) (Lieut.-Colonel Curtis-Hayward.) The ticket system has been successful, and I think that the bread system as carried out by us—no doubt it is an immense deal of trouble—is useful, because a man gets bread halfway on his road.

1576. Is this circular sent broadcast ?—Yes, it is paid for out of our bread fund, I think ; and the police distribute them.

1577. It is a notice to householders that the way-ticket system is in force in the county of Gloucester, and that under that system bread is provided for vagrants ; and, consequently, the public are requested not to give money to them. I think that is practically what it amounts to ?—(Admiral Christian.) Yes.

1578. And you have found that answer well ?—Very well. There is no doubt that it has been a great boon to the small people living near the roads ; they are not so much worried by tramps as they used to be.

1579. Probably the poorer people have suffered hitherto more than the wealthier people ?—Certainly.

1580. But they are now relieved from that difficulty ?—The poor people give more than the rich people generally. (Lieut.-Colonel Curtis-Hayward.) There is another thing which I think is very disadvantageous, and that is, if a man is caught begging, or if a man is had up before the magistrates, the seven days' imprisonment has very little terror for him ; I think a great many of them would rather be in prison than working in the casual ward now that the treadmill has been done away with.

1581. I asked just now how other counties did when Gloucester had very few vagrants ?—There is a return by the late Mr. Murray-Browne, Local Government Board Inspector, of four counties in the district, showing that Gloucestershire, which had the way-tickets, compared very favourably with the others ; in Berkshire, the numbers rose very considerably when they gave up their system.

1582. You would say, that apparently the success in Gloucestershire did have the effect of raising the numbers in other counties ?—Other counties rose, but whether it was cause and effect I cannot say.

1583. The numbers rose correspondingly with the diminution in Gloucestershire, I suppose ?—Yes.

1584. (Mr. Simpson.) Really the effect of the way-ticket is that the public do not encourage tramps ?—Well, I wish I could say they did not altogether. That is what we hoped would be the tendency ; but I am afraid there are a great many people who tell you that they have never read the leaflets, or even seen them.

1585. But still that is the only way in which the system really discourages tramps ?—Yes, that is the way ; by constantly preaching to these people that they ought not to give.

1586. (Sir William Chance.) You require the co-operation of all the unions in the county, do you not, to make it a success ?—Oh, yes.

1587. I believe that was the reason it broke down in Berkshire ?—Well, there were one or two other reasons. You remember, of course, that Mr. Henley, a man who was very well known and very influential, objected ; and, of course, it was impossible to carry out the system against his advice. That was the real reason of the breaking down in Berkshire.

1588. Then the employment of the police is an essential part of the system, is it not ?—Yes.

1589. Are the police employed as assistant relieving officers all over your county ?—(Admiral Christian.) Yes, they are.

1590. That contributes to the success of the system, I suppose ?—Tramps have to go for their tickets to the police.

1591. Now, what is the ration that is given at the police station ?—(Lieut.-Colonel Curtis-Hayward.) We started with a pound of bread, and then after five years, we reduced it to half a pound ; we thought half was sufficient.

1592. On the leaflet sent round to the householders the amount that is given is not mentioned ?—No, it is not mentioned.

1593. Is that done purposely ?—I thought it only necessary to say provision was given. Otherwise you would start ideas ; some people would say the man has got no cheese, and so on. I thought I would put down merely the fact that they were given certain food.

1594. If you mentioned that it was merely half a pound of bread which was given, do you think that that would induce the charitable public not to give alms ?—That is very difficult to say.

1595. That is not the reason why you did not mention the quantity ?—Well, partly. We have letters from all sorts of people ; some people asking whether we could not give them a little cheese ; others if we could not give them this and that ; so we thought it was very much better not to particularize in a circular, but just mention the fact that provision was given.

1596. You both agree that it has tended to stop the practice of giving indiscriminately ?—Yes.

1597. You have got no figures to prove that ?—Well, Admiral Christian will tell you the number of people who have been had up for begging.

1598. (Dr. Downes.) Does the tramp know how much bread he is entitled to have ?—Oh, yes ; he very soon gets to know that.

1599. Can you tell us what proportion of those who get the bread tickets use them ?—About 28 per cent. during the last ten years.

1600. Has the proportion varied during your experience ?—No, not a great deal ; from 25 to 28 per cent. I should say it has never gone below 23 per cent. and never above 28.

1601. It has been pretty uniform ?—It has been pretty uniform all through the year.

1602. Did you find the pound ration wasted ?—Well I do not know ; it was in 1887 ; and it is rather difficult to remember altogether. Admiral Christian and myself and several of us consulted, and we came to the conclusion, besides the question of expense, that the half pound of bread would be amply sufficient.

1603. (Chairman.) That is for the one individual ?—One individual.

1604. (Dr. Downes.) What would be the ordinary distance to a bread station ?—About 9 miles.

1605. Have you been successful in getting the support of the guardians in Gloucestershire ?—Yes ; taking all through, we have : of course, some are more keen than others.

1606. And have they maintained their support up to the present time ?—Do you mean financially ?

1607. Well, financially or otherwise ?—Financially, we have only quite recently got their support ; we have always had their moral support, and I may say their working support, but a great number of the guardians have always held that the cost ought to be paid out of the rates; and it is only within the last two or three years that authority has been given by the Local Government Board for a subscription or a donation to the vagrant fund being paid out of the rates.

1608. So that financially you have more support now than you had in the beginning?—Yes.

1609. You did not start with the support of the guardians?—Every board of guardians.

1610. Then with regard to the working support, is that maintained?—Yes.

1611. And on the part of the officers?—Yes.

1612. (Mr. Simpson.) Do the police employed as assistant relieving officers get extra remuneration from the poor rate?—(Admiral Christian.) Yes, in the large towns like Gloucester and Cheltenham, they do.

1613. Not in the country part?—No.

1614. I notice that in that ticket there is mention of the relieving officer for vagrants; does that mean that police act as relieving officers specially for vagrants?—Yes, for vagrants; not for the others.

1615. Not otherwise?—No.

1616. (Captain Showers.) Do you find that the way-tickets are transferred to other persons than those to whom they are issued?—No.

1617. How is the bread bill paid?—(Lieut. Colonel Curtis-Hayward.) Each superintendent sends in the bread bill for his district to the chief constable, and they are all made up and sent to me. I pay them by cheque to the superintendents of police, who send me a receipt. The receipts for the bills are all sent to Admiral Christian, who, when they are complete, sends them to me, so that I get the whole quarter's bills.

1618. Do you not find that the seven days' sentence given to these tramps induces many of them to commit some small offence to get imprisonment, with a view to being helped along by rail to their destination?—I do not think the prison has any terror. For instance, in one union they have had a great number of cases of refractory tramps, and they have always stated, when they have been had up, that they would rather do the hard work in prison than break stones in the workhouse, because it is easier work.

1620. Have they said anything with reference to the difference of the diet?—Yes, I have been told some time ago—this is by the governor of a gaol—that some of the prisoners said that they liked the fare better than they did that of the workhouse.

1621. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Of course, the fare of the casual ward is only for a day or two, and the fare of the prison is for never less than seven days practically; is that not so?—Yes.

1622. You would not propose to reduce the prison fare below that of the casual ward, would you?—No, I should propose increased work.

1623. Do you not think the imprisonment, the actual detention, is deterrent?—I do not think so.

1624. The pleasure of the tramp is his absolute freedom to go where he pleases; do you not think the discipline of the prison, the actual fact of being locked up, acts as a deterrent?—A great many of them appear not to care where they are.

1625. They do not?—In the summer they lie under the hedges; in the winter, as long as they are not at work, they do not care where they are; if they have sore feet, I have heard a tramp tell me they would prefer being detained. They do not like being turned out next morning; they prefer being detained, because they like the rest.

1626. Then you say the seven days' detention is no deterrent?—No deterrent whatever.

1627. Then there is no such thing as deterring people from being tramps?—If you could get the public not to encourage them.

1628. I mean there is no penal treatment which would reduce the number of tramps?—If you could make them work. The tramp does not want to work.

1629. He is made to work in the casual ward, yet you say that does not deter him?—He is made to work; but he does not like breaking two cwt. of very hard stone and then being turned out. The same amount of work is not carried on throughout the day. When they are detained, a great many of them are allowed to dine in the social wards, where they have a jollification and talk; and philanthropic people come down very often and assist them, and visit the casual ward with the idea of reforming the tramps. Well, I do not think it has any deterrent effect whatever, because I find that, whereas 28 per cent. of our tramps during the last ten years have applied for their ration on the way, showing that they have kept their ticket, nothing like that number turned up at the workhouse afterwards with their tickets, though at many of the workhouses the fact of their not having it would have the effect of their being detained two nights.

1630. (Sir William Chance.) As to the effect of large works attracting vagrants, do you remember the year 1886 in Gloucestershire; on the 1st January in that year, the number of vagrants relieved in the casual wards in Gloucestershire was 179?—Yes.

1631. On the 1st January, 1885, the number was 67. On the 1st January, 1887, the number was 120. And 179 were relieved on the 1st January, 1886; 75 were relieved out of the casual wards—probably in common lodging-houses. That seems to point to an exceptional state of things. Do you remember anything that happened in 1886 to account for that; were there large works going on?—1886 was the first year of the tramp census. On the 5th April there were 111 in the casual wards, but, of course, you cannot take one day in the year; you must have the average.

1632. Still that particular year stands out in the whole of the decade?—In 1886 there were 597 in common lodging-houses, but there were 592 in 1887, and 578 in 1885, so there was not many more in common lodging-houses than in the preceding and succeeding years; but in the casual ward in 1886 there were 111 on the 1st April; there were 98 in 1887; 92 in 1885; 83 in 1888; and 103 in 1889; and so on.

1633. I thought probably you might remember some exceptional circumstance in that year?—No, I do not remember that in 1886 there was anything very special.

1634. (Dr. Downes.) Do you know how far genuine working men use your bread tickets?—No, it is impossible to say; you will find the same person described in different ways by different people. (Admiral Christian.) I have got the analysis here of the trades of the persons who slept in the casual wards on the 5th April, 1904. (See Appendix VIII.)

1635. (Mr. Davy.) Can you tell me the proportion of bad tickets to good tickets?—(Lieut.-Colonel Curtis-Hayward.) Yes. During the last ten years 395,000 were admitted to casual wards; 111,300 or over 25 per cent. applied for the mid-day ration of bread; and 88,000 out of the 395,000 brought good tickets.

1636. And can you tell me the cost of the system, so far as the bread is concerned?—Of course, it varies very much. I think it is costing now nearly £80 a year, but taking the average for the whole time the annual cost is about £45.

1637. Quite a small sum?—Yes, quite a small sum.

1638. With regard to sentences, is there any general understanding amongst the justices as to the kind of sentences they would give?—Our committee always requested benches of magistrates to send all prisoners found guilty of begging to prison.

1639. But is there any pre-arranged uniformity with regard to the sentences?—No.

1640. Do the sentences go as high as twenty-eight days?—(Admiral Christian.) No. Seven to ten days is about the average.

1641. Seven days, meaning four in prison?—And, unfortunately, magistrates are very apt to let vagrants off.

1642. Is there any difficulty in securing convictions?—No, I cannot say that. It depends very much on the magistrates. Some magistrates will say: "See him out of the town," and that kind of thing.

1643. Have you any of that class of magistrate who will give a man 1s. and let him go?—Yes, I have known it.

1644. With regard to the point you raised about the tramp not caring where he was so long as he had some leisure: the work in casual wards in Gloucestershire, I suppose, is task work?—(Lieut.-Colonel Curtis-Hayward.) Yes.

1645. The task work was fixed for the average man?—Yes.

1646. Consequently, a stronger man would do his task, and have a considerable amount of leisure, which is what they like?—Yes.

1647. (Chairman.) No doubt, a good many of these tramps are inebriates?—Well, I have no data for that.

1648. What is your opinion with regard to the length of sentence most suitable to the ordinary vagrancy cases as a deterrent?—I think if a man had fourteen days on the treadmill it might act as a deterrent; but I doubt whether fourteen days on the present prison diet and work is any deterrent to him.

1649. Then take fourteen days as against seven days; which do you think is preferable?—Why, fourteen is preferable to seven; it keeps him a little longer.

1650. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Are you acquainted with the prison work at all?—No, I am not a visitor to the prison.

1651. On what do you base your opinion as to the present form of the work?—Well, I know it is very slight.

1652. By hearsay?—I do not mean to say that I have never been to the prison; I have been to the prison occasionally, but I am not a regular visitor.

1653. I suppose it would not come to your knowledge that 50 per cent. of the men who are sent to prison for short sentences are not fit for first-class hard labour, and, therefore, for the treadmill?—No, I did not know that.

1654. That might alter your opinion as to the value of the treadmill for tramps?—Well, I said that from hearing the remarks made at the police court by tramps, that they did not mind going to prison; that it was lighter work.

1655. But do you not think men make these remarks without meaning it; these people are fond of boasting, are they not?—But then it occurs over and over again at a police court. I know of no strike at the workhouse, but time after time men are had up for refusing to do the work and saying they prefer to go to prison.

1656. (Dr. Downes.) Should you be in favour of detaining the habitual vagrant in a reformatory, say, for two years?—I think it would be excellent if you could do it.

1657. The present prison system is too short for any reformatory influence?—Oh, yes, certainly.

1658. And in your opinion it does not act as a deterrent?—No, it does not.

1659. (Chairman.) Have you inquired into or had any experience of the labour colony system?—No, except reading a few articles.

1660. You have not seen any of the labour colonies abroad, have you?—No, I have not.

1661. Now, Admiral Christian, I should like to ask you a few questions. You are the chief constable of Gloucestershire?—(Admiral Christian.) Yes, sir.

1662. You have heard Colonel Curtis-Hayward's evidence?—Yes, I quite agree with what he says.

1663. You agree with it?—Quite. I have got here a report (see Appendix VIII.) with reference to tramps; first of all the numbers and trades of persons who slept in casual wards on Tuesday, April 5th, 1904, and that return goes from 1885. I see in 1885 the number of people sleeping in casual wards was 92; in 1904 there were 226.

1664. Do you agree with what Colonel Curtis-Hayward says as to the new works being the probable cause of an increase in vagrancy?—Yes, sir, as one cause; and I fancy the trade of the country has not been so good in years past.

1665. No?—That is another cause. I have no doubt in my own mind that the degeneration of people into tramps is brought on prematurely by drink, which incapacitates them for work. Half of these tramps are not fit for a hard day's work; in fact, they would not take them on to a railway work.

1666. With reference to the question of short sentences, if a man who has been living a drunken life for some time is put in prison for seven days, do you not think that, instead of being benefited by being put in prison, he comes out more ravenously anxious for drink than he was before he went in?—I think that is human nature.

1667. Consequently, instead of there being any curative effect from a short sentence upon a hard drinking man, it will do him more harm than good?—Yes.

1668. Then, from that point of view you probably would agree, with others, that a short sentence upon the tramp—I would call him an alcoholic tramp—would be doing him more harm than good?—Yes, he is not kept there long enough to do away with the appetite for drink.

1669. (Mr. Davy.) You say that the tramps are not able-bodied, but is not tramp life very hard?—It is a very hard life.

1670. A man must be very tough to go on from day to day?—Yes, but it is a lazy life; they do not dig or work; they saunter along roads, lie underneath hedges, they do no hard work; and you can always tell this by a man's hands.

1671. Oh, yes; but I mean that a man, to endure the life of a tramp at all, must be a pretty tough customer?—He is not a muscular man; he is not the man to do a navy's work.

1672. Do you think that your warning against indiscriminate almsgiving is losing, or has lost, its effect?—No, I have no reason to say so. I think that we ought to issue these notices again throughout the county. It is rather a troublesome job for the police to leave one of these at every house in the county, but this is what has been done.

1673. Have you had any complaints of threats by tramps when begging?—No, very few; and going along the main roads—we will take, for instance, from Bristol to Gloucester—I have often met tramps; in years gone by I walked a good deal; but they never attempted to take anything.

1674. I mean the case of a tramp who would put his foot in the door of a cottage?—Oh, yes, there have been cases, but not many of them.

1675. To a great extent that might be prevented by the vigilance of the police?—Our police patrol the main roads in plain clothes a great deal.

1676. And that is the most effective cure?—That is the only way of stopping it.

1677. Only about 28 per cent., I understand, of the tramps use their ticket for a mid-day meal?—The rest of them have not got proper tickets; they will not get bread without a ticket.

1678. But how do the rest of them, which amounts to 72 per cent., get their mid-day meal?—Probably a good many of them when they start have not made up their minds which way to go.

1679. How do they get their mid-day meal?—They get their mid-day meal if they have a good ticket.

1680. If they have not a ticket?—They will not get a mid-day meal.

1681. Then, as a matter of fact, they must get something to eat in the middle of the day?—Yes.

1682. Is not that a sort of measure of the extent to which the warning against almsgiving breaks down?—I think it has had a great deterrent effect against begging, that ticket system, and it is of great value, in my opinion; it is a protection to the poor.

1683. My point is that 72 per cent., I think, do not get a mid-day meal by their way-tickets; they must get their mid-day meal, therefore, by begging or stealing, must they not?—The average amount of money found on persons arrested for begging is about 6d. The largest amount was 1s. 10d.

1684. (Chairman.) Those are men who are searched ?—Those are men who are searched, of course, when they are arrested for begging.

1685. But I dare say you know that a clever vagrant is a very good hand at concealing his money ?—Oh, very.

1686. If he has valuables or money it is hard to find it ?—They conceal their money before they go into the tramp wards.

1687. They plant it outside very often ?—Yes.

1688. (Mr. Davy.) What do you do with men who are tramping with women ; do both of them get a ticket, the man and the woman ?—Yes.

1689. And what do you do with children ?—Children the same.

1690. They get a ticket ?—Yes.

1691. So that the family going across the county would get quite a considerable quantity of bread ?—Oh, yes, quite a considerable quantity.

1692. (Mr. Simpson.) It is very surprising that so small an amount is found on persons arrested for begging. Do you put it down to the fact that in Gloucestershire begging is not such a profitable pursuit as in some other counties ?—No, no ; I do not say that, I do not say what the other counties happen to have ; but I can say that in the year 1887 there were 480 people arrested for begging in Gloucestershire ; and in 1903 there were 300.

1693. No new orders have been given to the police with regard to that ?—No, none whatever.

1694. So that you may assume that that is a real decrease in the amount of begging ?—Yes.

1695. Do you get many vagrants charged with crime at sessions in Gloucestershire ?—Yes, there is a fair average. I see that the return of tramps convicted for stealing and offences other than begging in 1887 was 274 ; and in 1903 there were 493 : that is an increase.

1696. That means tramps charged with stealing ?—Yes, the average amount of money found on those is somewhat about 7d.

1697. And offences against the person—do you find many ?—No.

1698. Should you say, in your opinion, that the main evil of vagrancy is that the tramps are a nuisance to the public, or that they extract money from the public, or that they add to the amount of crime ?—Well, they certainly add to the crime ; they take an opportunity of breaking into a cottage if the people are away ; that is the crime they generally commit there.

1699. You think it is a serious evil at present which rather requires some remedy, if it can be found ?—Oh, yes, certainly. There is rather a striking return which I have here. Between Chepstow, which is in Monmouthshire, just on the other side of the river Wye, and Westbury-on-Severn—that is a distance of about twenty-one miles—between these two points there is no workhouse, and the tramps simply swarm along that road and sleep out. It is a long distance—twenty-one miles ; they have nowhere to go to. For instance, the number of persons proceeded against in the county during the last nine months for begging was 276 ; but in that district which I have just mentioned, there were 286—more than the whole county put together. That is the road between South Wales and Gloucester and London ; the people tramping have nowhere to go, and they sleep out ; and the number of persons in that district arrested for begging during the last nine months was 121, and for sleeping out 165. We are simply swarmed with them.

1700. What are the occupations of these people ?—196 are described as labourers. Then comes a thing I am not prepared for ; there are thirty-two seamen ; that is, men making their way from Cardiff and Swansea to London to get other ships.

1701. And a great many foreigners, I suppose ?—A great many foreigners.

1702. (Chairman.) What would you suggest as a remedy for that ?—There ought to be some place between Chepstow and Gloucester. Lydney is the place for it ; it is half-way.

1703. I suppose you would agree with me that twenty-one miles is a long distance for men that are not good pedestrians ?—Yes.

1704. And consequently it is hardly a punishable offence for a man to sleep out who is tired and cannot get any further ?—No ; but you see we are obliged to arrest them, because they are extremely dangerous, sleeping under hay ricks, and things of that sort.

1705. (Mr. Simpson.) Would you arrest a tramp if you found him sleeping out anywhere, even if he is in a hay loft or a building ?—Oh, anywhere ; we always arrest them.

1706. Is there a police station to which you could attach a shelter to meet the case ?—No, we have no police station.

1707. You have no police station at any intermediate point ?—We have a police station at Lydney, but we have no room there.

1708. A shelter alone probably would not be advisable. Would there not be a possibility of attaching a shed to the police station, which would be watched by the police, and where the men could go and sleep ?—That would entail work on the police.

1709. Has there been any attempt in the county to deal with this particular road ?—No, there has not.

1710. (Mr. Davy.) I gather, from your description of that road, that you think that under some circumstances a workhouse vagrant ward is useful ?—I think there ought to be one.

1711. As preventing men from sleeping out ?—Yes.

1712. And facilitating their walking on their journey ?—Oh, yes ; certainly.

1713. (Mr. Simpson.) Is the greater part of the road you spoke of in Gloucestershire ?—The greater part is in Gloucestershire.

1714. And the other part is in Monmouthshire ?—There is a station within a mile and a half of Chepstow on our side of the Wye, and we have had a great many people sleeping out there in that short distance.

1715. (Captain Showers.) In regard to these way-tickets, are they served out only at police stations, or are they served out by constables at villages as well ?—All at police stations.

1716. You take a census of vagrants every year, I think ?—Yes, every year.

1717. Would not the weather affect the numbers that are in the lodging-houses ?—Well, it is cold in April. I do not think that would affect them. Of course, it would if the census were taken in June ; it would be quite a different thing altogether.

1718. Have you any fruit picking in your county ?—Oh, yes ; the fruit pickers do not give us very much trouble. There is a very large fruit establishment at Toddington, and they have got shelters for their people ; there are hundreds of women ; and where they shelter these women they keep them in very good order ; they must be in at 9 o'clock ; there is excellent discipline, and we have little or no trouble with them. But the people we have trouble with are the pea-pickers, and these are the refuse of all the towns. You see the pea-pickers and the hop-pickers going into Worcester from Cheltenham, trains full of them at a time.

1719. (Chairman.) Where are the pea-pickers lodged ?—Wherever they can.

1720. There are no bothies ; no arrangements for them as we heard of in the case of the hop-pickers ?—No.

1721. (Mr. Davy.) Are there bye-laws in force as to hop-pickers ; do the sanitary authorities enforce bye-laws, as we do in Kent ?—No, we have nothing of the sort.

1722. I think yours is the county that came to a conclusion as to what is the proportion of the whole number of the vagrants who go into vagrant wards ?—Yes.

1723. You make it about a quarter, do you not ?—About a quarter.

1724. Is that pretty uniform all through the year ?—Yes, I think you will find it so. (Lieut.-Colonel Curtis-Hayward.) We have more in the casual ward this year ; but taking the average for twenty years, you will find a quarter is about right.

1725. (Chairman.) You could not say the number of the tramps this year, could you ?—(Admiral Christian.) No, not for this year.

1726. (Mr. Davy.) The tramps, that is, homeless persons, who are not in vagrant wards sleep elsewhere : where do they sleep ?—At lodging-houses.

1727. Anywhere else ?—No, I do not think so.

1728. Only in lodging-houses ?—With reference to lodging-houses, a fact came to my knowledge. A few days ago I was talking to the Local Government Board Inspector, and he told me that in Gloucester they have not room for all the tramps, so they send them to the lodging-houses. Well, by law, tramps in the workhouses are obliged to have bread given to them, but we gave nothing to the men sent to the common lodging-houses, so that tramps who go to the common lodging-houses do not get any food given them.

1729. (Chairman.) But their bed was paid for, I suppose ?—The guardians paid for their bed.

1730. They had their bed paid for, but they got no food ?—They got no food.

1731. (Mr. Davy.) Is it within your knowledge that the tramps prefer the lodging-house without food to the workhouse with food ?—I think so. The food they get is only bread.

1732. And as a matter of fact they prefer going to the lodging-house to remaining in the workhouse ?—Yes.

1733. I suppose there are many in the lodging-houses who have food and share it ?—Yes.

1734. Lodging houses are under the jurisdiction of the sanitary authority ?—Yes.

1735. Have you any lodging-houses for women alone ?—No, we have not.

1736. All mixed ?—They are all the same.

1737. What is the ordinary sum paid for a bed ?—Threepence.

1738. Have you any municipal lodging-houses ?—Not in the county. The lodging-houses in Gloucester and Cheltenham are all visited every night by the police.

1739. (Chairman.) In the large towns have they any municipal lodging-houses ?—No, they have not except in Cheltenham and Gloucester.

1740. (Sir William Chance.) I understand that you agree with Colonel Curtis-Hayward that the carrying out of the Order of 1882 as to detention has had no effect on vagrancy ?—No, it has had no effect.

1741. I suppose you would consider that the effect of carrying out that Order as to detention would be rather to keep the vagrant away from the casual wards ?—To protect the poor people on the side of the road, that live there.

1742. Therefore, that you would have a smaller number in consequence ?—I think so.

1743. Would not one of the results of the way-ticket system be that the tramp would be rather induced to go into the casual ward because he knows he would get a mid-day meal next day to help him on. He cannot get the ticket without going to the casual ward ?—I can hardly say that, because after all it is only half a pound of bread.

1744. Half a pound of bread would not attract him into the casual ward ?—No.

1745. You gave us figures as to casuats relieved in the casual wards. Have you got the numbers in the common lodging-houses for the same date ?—The number in the common lodging-houses was 594 in 1888.

1746. You gave us the numbers for a day in April, 1885 and 1904. You said there were 92 casuats relieved in the casual wards in 1885 ; how many were there in the common lodging-houses on the same date ?—In the common lodging-houses 570.

1747. Then you said 226 casuats in 1904 ; how many in common lodging-houses ?—465 in 1904.

1748. That is rather remarkable, is it not ?—It is.

1749. It shows that the casual wards are rather more appreciated now than they were ten years before ?—It shows that the number is constant in the common lodging-houses ; but the increase is in the casual wards.

1750. You mean, of course, the common lodging-houses have only got a certain amount of accommodation ?—They have only got accommodation for a certain number.

1751. Therefore, it must keep pretty constant ?—They then go to the casual wards.

1752. They go to the casual wards if they cannot get into the common lodging-houses ?—Some of them ; there are fewer common lodging-houses to-day than there were twenty years ago.

1753. Have you got any figures showing men, women and children separately ?—Of the 226 in casual wards in 1904, 195 were males, and 31 females ; 10 were under sixteen years of age and 216 were sixteen years of age and above ; 225 were strangers, and one was a known resident.

1754. Then of the 465 in the common lodging-houses, have you got the figures for men, women and children ?—Yes, 384 were males, and 81 females ; 19 were under sixteen years of age and 446 above ; 268 were strangers, and 197 known residents.

1755. It has been asserted that sometimes a tramp who is wandering with his family, say a wife and child, goes into a casual ward, and leaves his money with the wife who goes with the child into a common lodging-house ; is that frequently done ?—Oh, yes, very often done, there is no doubt about that.

1756. I suppose in the Gloucestershire unions there is a considerable want of uniformity in carrying out the regulations of 1882 ?—That I have no knowledge of.

1757. Have you at all considered the question of labour colonies in connection with the tramp system ?—No.

1758. (Dr. Downes.) Does your census extend to persons found sleeping out ?—Yes.

1759. Could you give us the numbers of those ?—The number of persons proceeded against for sleeping out, between January 1st and September 30th, 1904, that is nine months, was 276, that is for the county, bar the district I have just told you of ; of these 207 were convicted and 69 discharged. Then, in that road of twenty-one miles that I told you of, 286 were proceeded against for sleeping out and begging, of whom 221 were convicted and 65 discharged.

1760. Did you count those sleeping out in the particular night when you took your special yearly census ?—No, I did not.

1761. Is your census for your own purposes or part of a general return ?—No ; it is taken by the police on the 1st of April.

1762. Is it taken all over the county ?—All over the county.

1763. All over England ?—Oh, no, only our county.

1764. (Mr. Davy.) Do these figures entail a great amount of work in their preparation ?—A good deal of office work. It is a very large county, and every station has to send in its return.

1765. (Dr. Downes.) This system of the way-ticket and also that system of taking the census promotes a special knowledge on the part of the police of the vagrant class, I believe ?—Certainly.

1766. And that I take it is very advantageous ?—Very much so.

1767. (Chairman.) With regard to the railway work, probably at the end of the job there would be a lot of men on the roads ?—Yes, they would be travelling for other work.

1768. Yes, quite so ; but for some weeks, I suppose, after the completion of the railway you would have a great number of tramps on the road ?—Yes.

1769. Would that to some extent account for the large numbers last year and the year before last ?—Yes, I think it would.

1770. That would be an exceptional circumstance ?—Yes.

1771. In the casual wards in the county of Gloucester, I believe the system both of baths and search is universal ?—(Lieut.-Colonel Curtis-Hayward.) Yes.

1772. Can you say whether or not that has been found to be beneficial?—I think so; I do not think tramps like being searched or being washed.

1773. That would rather prevent the idle man seeking the casual ward, and rather incite him to go elsewhere where he would not have to bathe and would not be searched?—Oh, I think, if a man can get into a lodging-house, he will do so in preference to going into the casual ward.

1774. What is against that is that he will have to pay threepence for the one and nothing for the other. Did you find any difference at the end of the war?—During the time of the war our tramps got down very considerably. There is no doubt a large number of men on the tramp who either are reservists or have been in the Army.

1775. Can you give an estimate of the number of tramps all over England and Wales?—Well, I could only do that by establishing what the ratio of Gloucestershire was as compared with England and Wales. Some years ago I went through various statistics and I made it one in seventy-two.

1776. (Mr. Davy.) Was that the proportion of vagrants?—Yes; the proportion that Gloucestershire bore towards the rest of England and Wales in vagrancy. I worked out all the statistics I could get at, and I made the proportion of Gloucestershire one in seventy-two. The late Mr. Murray-Browne also worked it out and made it one in seventy-seven. We got pretty near, and he wrote to me afterwards and said "Your estimate no doubt is rough, but I think it is practically correct." I have shown since then that the proportion Gloucestershire

(outside the city of Bristol) bears to the rest of England is one in seventy. Taking that proportion, I calculate that there are 22,000 persons who go to common lodging-houses and the rest to casual wards. There are practically 30,000 people wandering about the country.

*Lieut.-Col.
J. Curtis-
Hayward and Admiral
Christian.*

1777. We have had some evidence dealing with the insanitary condition of common lodging-houses; can you say anything about that?—No, I cannot. In the country the number of common lodging-houses has decreased; in the towns I suppose there is about the same. In Northleach, a small country town, the only common lodging-house there has been closed. The tendency of late years has been for all the common lodging-houses in villages or small towns to disappear.

1778. Then what becomes of those who naturally would go to lodging-houses?—They are obliged to go to the casual wards, which has rather increased the number in the wards.

1779. Are you aware that in the 22nd Report of the Poor Law Board there is a reference to a return issued by the police as to the number of vagrants known to them; there were 32,528 in 1867, and 36,179 in 1868?—Yes.

1780. Closely approximating to your figures?—Yes.

1781. But for a different date?—Yes, for a different date.

1782. Rather tending to show that the stream of vagrants is more or less constant?—I think my data is fairly correct—Gloucestershire one in seventy.

Mr. A. C. MITCHELL and Captain STERNE, R.N., called; and Examined.

1783. (Chairman.) Mr. Mitchell, you are, I believe, chairman of the Wiltshire vagrancy committee?—(Mr. Mitchell.) Yes.

1784. That is a county committee?—May I explain the formation of the committee very shortly.

1785. If you please?—The committee arose out of a motion which was made originally at quarter sessions in the year 1881, when it was resolved that a committee should be formed partly of members of quarter sessions with representatives from boards of guardians. We worked on until the days when the administrative functions of quarter sessions were done away with and the county councils and standing joint committees came in. Then this committee was transferred to the standing joint committee, and it is now composed of members elected from the standing joint committee and representatives of all the boards of guardians in the county.

1786. In what proportions are the joint committee and the guardians represented?—About equal. We are not limited as to the number elected from the standing joint committee. We invite boards of guardians to send one representative each.

1787. How many boards of guardians are there?—There are eighteen unions within the county and one bordering on the outside with two parishes in Wilts.

1788. You say there is no fixed number of the standing joint committee representatives on your committee?—The standing joint committee is not tied down to any particular number. We elected seventeen members this year.

1789. Do you elect them every year?—We elect them annually. The standing joint committee can add to that number; at the same time they are not bound to fill up a place if one member lapses.

1790. It is a co-opted body you may say?—Yes, well it is elected from the standing joint committee and each board of guardians is invited to send a representative.

1791. We have heard Colonel Curtis-Hayward's evidence as to the way-ticket system in Gloucestershire. You have, I believe, in Wiltshire a way-ticket system?—Yes.

1792. Now will you describe to us, please, your way-ticket system. I presume you know the Gloucestershire system?—Yes, sir; we were before Gloucestershire by a few months. This committee, that I referred to just now as having been appointed by quarter sessions in the year 1881, was to inquire into all the systems with regard to vagrancy, and the committee made up its mind to recommend to quarter sessions the adoption of what was then called the Berkshire system, which was this ticket system. That was adopted, and a few months afterwards Gloucestershire adopted the same system, and it was shortly this, that on a tramp applying at the first union he arrived at in the county for relief he was given a way-ticket on which was entered his description, his final destination and the places where he would call. Here is a sample of the way-ticket (way-ticket handed in—see Appendix VIII.). Arrangements were made at convenient places where a police constable was stationed, where the tramp could get bread between workhouses which necessitated a fair day's march. This ticket, as long as he proceeded in the direction to the final destination to which he declared himself to be proceeding, entitled him to eight ounces of bread (in Gloucestershire it was a larger amount at first, now it is eight ounces) between the hours of twelve and two at the given stations. As long as he kept on his way to his final destination that held good between union and union.

1793. Was this ticket signed or viséd, I mean, at the end of each day?—Yes.

1794. It seems to be, as far as I can see at a glance, like the Gloucester one?—I should think the Gloucester one is absolutely the same.

1795. The man is passed on from point to point, as long as he keeps on the route he originally described, and he obtains his meals of bread at a given point in the middle of each day?—Yes, sir, between the hours of twelve and two.

1796. Well, suppose that that man varies his route; what happens?—If that man varies his route, according to the recommendations of our committee—of course we cannot be responsible for the actions of boards of guardians; we have done all we can to get every board of guardians in the county to follow our system—if he varies his route he would then be in the same position as the man who arrived without a ticket at all, and would be liable to full detention under the Casual Poor Act, 1882.

1797. But does his ticket cease to be operative if he leaves his route?—Yes; then he would start afresh. If the board of guardians follows our advice he would then start afresh with a fresh ticket, and if he kept to his route then he would be entitled to the advantages we offer. We advise the board of guardians that if a man has his ticket in order, that he then shall be forwarded on his road at the earliest possible time after having broken the portion of stones for his one night's detention. And I may say I have found a most excellent plan some years ago, when I was a guardian at Chippenham, when we first started separate cells there. We had a system by which each man had a whistle in his separate cell and as soon as ever he had completed his task of work he went out independently of any other casual; and that avoided numbers of men getting on the road at the same time, because each man went off independently and got away by himself on the road; we found that a very good plan. I may say that at Chippenham we had separate working cells as well as separate sleeping cells, one leading out of the other. I consider this a great point as giving complete isolation: it is a benefit to the real wayfarer, and a deterrent to the professional vagrant.

1798. Can you tell me what is the total cost of the bread that is given under your ticket system?—I have here the last report; it is dated 21st January, 1904. The total sum paid for mid-day meals to 11,430 persons was £43 18s. 9d.

1799. Now has the cost materially increased during the last few years?—Yes, sir, it has.

1800. We were told in Gloucestershire it had nearly doubled?—It has considerably increased. Is there any particular year you would like to compare with?

1801. Take about six years ago, say 1898?—The number relieved in 1898 was 10,687.

1802. And the cost?—£40 4s. 10d.

1803. Then £43 does not mean a very large increase?—Oh, no.

1804. But that is probably for 1904; that would not be for the whole year?—I only read you the date of our report which was naturally for the previous year; the accounts are made up to December 31st, 1903.

1805. The increase then from 1898 to 1904 is only a matter of £3?—(Captain Sterne.) There was a considerable decrease in the interim.

1806. There were special circumstances in Gloucestershire which apparently brought an influx of tramps; for instance, the Avonmouth docks near Bristol, and the very large additions to the Great Western line. These circumstances did not apply to Wiltshire?—Against that in Wiltshire there is the new barracks that the Government are building at Tedworth. That is the cause in a great measure, I think, of our increase. (Mr. Mitchell.) With regard to our increase of two years ago, there were two very important additions to the Great Western Railway going through the county.

1807. You would confirm what the witnesses from Gloucestershire have said that great works like that cause an influx of this vagrant population into your county?—Oh, certainly. (Captain Sterne.) No doubt.

1808. Have you any contributions from boards of guardians to the cost of this bread, or is it all paid by voluntary subscriptions?—(Mr. Mitchell.) We approached the Local Government Board many years ago as to whether we could not get help from the guardians. Our great object on the committee was to make this thing permanent as far as we could, and I think you would agree with me that a thing dependent on voluntary subscriptions cannot hope to be permanent; but we were advised that the Local Government Board could not authorise any payment to funds such as ours as for mid-day relief. Two years ago the Local Government Board were again approached on this matter, and they then said that they would sanction any reasonable contributions by boards of guardians to the funds of the committee. We then made a scheme taking as our basis 1d. per £100 of the rateable value of each union. We did not know how best to make a basis, but we thought that that would be as fair as any other; and on that basis we applied to boards of guardians to give us contributions. With the exception of two boards of guardians all subscribed at that rate. Of these two, Swindon has far the largest rateable value of any union in our county, and their contribution would have come to £10. They said that they would not give us that amount, but they gave us a smaller amount. The Warminster union declined to give us anything at all. Swindon have since raised their contribution to £5; Warminster still does not give us anything. Every other union in the county accepted the 1d. per cent. on the rateable value and have contributed accordingly. I need not read the amounts, perhaps.

1809. Oh, no, if you will give us the total contributions, that will do?—The total of contributions from guardians and subscribers is £46 15s., that was for the year 1903.

1810. Then they pay very nearly the whole?—We estimated at that time, from experience of a long time, that if we got £50 a year from the guardians—and the 1d. per cent., if all the guardians gave it us, would bring us in about that—we should be clear of private subscriptions, but last year owing to the large increase in vagrants we had only a few shillings balance.

1811. You got £46 from the guardians and you say the cost last year was £43 18s. 9d.?—I must tell you that I only gave you the cost of the bread; there is the cost of the postages and printing which comes to £6 17s. 10d.

1812. Then we may call it £50 practically?—About £50; the total expenses last year were in round figures £56.

1813. Then from what we have heard, you get a larger contribution from the guardians in proportion than Gloucester does?—I do not think Gloucester gets a contribution on a regular basis as we do.

1814. They certainly do not get as large a one in proportion to the total as you do?—Before we were advised by the Local Government Board that their auditor would pass these contributions from the unions, several unions in the county used to pay their representative a certain amount which they could do under an Order of the Local Government Board for attending conferences, £1 or something of that sort, and he of his own generosity instead of taking it used to give it as a contribution from his union. He might have put it in his own pocket; it was purely a voluntary act and nothing to do with the auditor.

1815. Now what have you got to say as to the effect of this way-ticket system; have you issued any circular like they did in Gloucester to the inhabitants?—Oh, immense numbers from time to time.

1816. Warning them against tramps?—That is the circular which Captain Sterne has through his men circulated to every householder in the county from time to time during these twenty years.

1817. Like the one circulated in Gloucestershire?—I do not know that.

1818. It looks to me very similar?—That, sir, is a circular that we issued at the time the parish councils were first instituted. And this is our main circular; boards of guardians are apt to forget these things, and from time to time we have had occasion to issue this circular to boards of guardians reminding them of the main points of this system in the shortest possible way we could put it. (Circulars handed in—see Appendix VIII.)

1819. Calling their attention to the existence of your way-ticket system?—Of the regulations and what we recommend.

1820. And the regulations as regards begging and so forth?—Not so much with regard to begging.

1821. (Mr. Simpson.) Detention in casual wards beyond the single night?—Yes, that is so; that the man travelling with what we call the good ticket should be only detained the one night with his one night's task of work, while the man without his good ticket should be detained the whole time he could be under the Act with the fullest task of work.

1822. (Chairman.) Do you think the effect of that is to assist the honest wayfarer and at the same time act in any way as a deterrent to the persistent tramp?—I think it is. I am not in a position to prove it in any sort of way. That was our contention, and I think that speaking broadly it is. Do you agree to that, Captain Sterne? (Captain Sterne.) I do up to a certain point, sir, but the more you consider the subject of vagrancy the more difficult it gets, I think. I have many times arrived at conclusions that I was obliged to capsize afterwards; they were entirely wrong.

1823. At any rate, we will take the first half of that: that the honest wayfarer is assisted on his way by the fact that he is able to continue his journey, which he probably would not be able to do otherwise?—(Mr. Mitchell.) Yes.

1824. Now with regard to the numbers of tramps?—I think you have already told us there has been a considerable increase during the last few years?—Except during the war.

1825. I am speaking simply of the last few years?—They have increased since 1900; we were down to 18,900, and we have gone up to 28,500. Our last annual report gives you the increase for the year, and the increases for each quarter in the admissions and the nights' relief. You understand our expression "nights' relief." The admissions, of course, are those admitted into casual wards; what we express by "nights' relief" are the number of nights on which relief is given; that is to say, that one man may be two nights in a place; his admission is one thing, his nights' relief is another.

1826. His nights' relief then would be two against the admission one?—Yes, exactly, and Sunday we always compute; I think as far as they are able, all, or if not all the great majority of unions detain over Sunday, unless the wards are over-crowded.

1827. The man who enters on the Saturday afternoon is kept till Monday morning invariably if there is room for him?—As a general rule, I will not say invariably; I will not answer for the boards of guardians.

1828. But if there is room for him it is the practice?—It is the practice. (Captain Sterne.) In fact, sir, we have found that Sunday was the best day for the professional tramp to beg.

1829. Do you think that your system has reduced begging?—(Mr. Mitchell.) Yes, I do think it has reduced begging; I do think that it has certainly reduced what tramps get from the better-off classes; I am afraid that they still get a great deal out of the poor, and I think they get it in a great measure from fear. They go to the cottages; a great extent of Wiltshire is very sparsely populated, and I think they go to the cottages when the women are alone; they are afraid to refuse them, and they give them either food or pence.

1830. Are there cases of that sort brought before the magistrates?—(Captain Sterne.) I do not think they are often caught.

1831. When persistently begging in that way?—Whenever we catch them.

1832. Of course?—There is a great difficulty in getting poor people to give evidence.

1833. But I suppose when cases of that sort are brought up they are adequately dealt with?—(Mr. Mitchell.) They would, probably, if there were threats. (Captain Sterne.) Magistrates are not all alike, I am sorry to say.

1834. But as far as you are concerned, Captain Sterne, the police proceed against these people?—Oh, certainly.

1835. (Dr. Downes.) Have you any return of the convictions for begging?—I have not got any here; I can furnish the Committee with statistics; they are in my annual report.

1836. (Chairman.) Perhaps you will kindly send the return to the Secretary?—Yes, I will.

1837. Just giving the number of the convictions for begging, and the sentences?—Certainly. (The return is printed in Appendix VIII.)

1838. Have you, Mr. Mitchell, any information with regard to the length of sentences on vagrants?—(Mr. Mitchell.) Yes, I have.

1839. We are very anxious to hear it?—I think that under present conditions the sending of vagrants to gaol is utterly useless. They want to go to gaol; the conditions in gaol are better than those in casual wards, and particularly in bad weather they prefer going to gaol. Over and over again it has come before us. I live on the borders of Wiltshire and Gloucestershire, and I am a magistrate of both; a man commits some petty offence in order to go to gaol for a short period.

1840. Now is that more in the winter time?—In bad weather, yes; he takes his chance of sleeping out in fine weather, very likely; I should say, generally speaking, more in bad weather.

1841. What was present to my mind was that the cell is always kept warmed, and that probably would be a recommendation?—And the dietary is better, and the work is less as a rule.

1842. Do you mean the class of food is better, or the actual bill of fare?—There is more of it, and the bill of fare is better generally. The casual ward bill of fare, sir, is a very modest one and it is tied down by the Local Government Board. I have not got the prison dietary with me; but the casual ward dietary is a very modest one indeed. (Captain Sterne.) The vagrant has frequently expressed his satisfaction at being sent to prison, because he is better fed and has less to do.

1843. (Sir William Chance.) What is the length of sentence that magistrates ordinarily give?—It varies considerably; it depends on whether the fellow has been there a short time before, or circumstances of that sort, or whether he has been violent, drunk, and so on; it varies from seven days up to a month generally. (Mr. Mitchell.) Very seldom, I think, more than seven to fourteen days.

1844. But if the magistrates were to sentence for a longer period, say twenty-eight days, possibly the vagrant might not like prison so much?—So long as the food is better than in the casual wards, I do not think he would mind that.

1845. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) You do not think he minds being locked up for a month?—I do not think so.

1846. A man accustomed to the open air?—I do not think so.

1847. (Captain Showers.) Suppose a man wants to go from one place to another, if he breaks a window he gets help on the journey; instead of walking he goes by train to where he is remanded, or where he is sent to prison?—Unless he is caught past the prison and has to go back again, but as a rule he gets helped on his way.

1848. As a rule he knows his road about the country and where prisoners are sent?—Yes.

1849. (Mr. Simpson.) All your prisoners go to Devizes?—All ours; it is the only prison we have. May I, sir, refer to what was one of the reasons originally of the quarter sessions in Wiltshire approving of this plan. The first thing was to take away the reason that the man had for begging; when he was discharged out of the workhouse having been searched when he went in, he was discharged with nothing but the regulation amount of bread which he received in the morning, and he could not, until he got to the next workhouse at night, get any relief. The mid-day relief was put on to take away that excuse for begging; but it was also put on for this reason: that the magistrates of the county very largely found it difficult to convict a man for begging when he said that he had come out of a casual ward and had had nothing but eight ounces of bread and could get nothing but eight ounces of bread on the following night. I have sat myself on the bench when magistrates have said, "How can you convict a man for that? If he did not do that, he would have to steal and that would be a worse crime."

1850. (Chairman.) Steal or starve?—Yes; and that was an argument which was used when we originally started this before the quarter sessions, and I think I may say it was considered by the magistrates of the county at that time as a very strong argument in favour of the man who was travelling to a destination being given some relief in the middle of the day.

1851. Then you are of opinion, on the whole, that the way-ticket system has worked fairly well in the interests of the honest man?—Yes.

1852. And also as preventing begging to a large extent?—Yes, sir. Amongst the better-off classes, the more educated classes; and we have always held to it that it was a good principle.

1853. And also taking away from the man the excuse that he was a starving man?—That is so; that is the point.

1854. Then, as far as you are concerned, and in that I believe you are supported by Captain Sterne, you are prepared to continue the way-ticket system and you would be glad to see it adopted in other counties?—We should be very glad to see it universal.

and Capt. Sterne.

1855. Especially, I suppose, in counties that are neighbouring to yours?—Certainly.

1856. Is there any other neighbouring county to Gloucestershire which has the system?—No, not now; Berkshire gave it up some years ago; it really fell through in Berkshire, so I was told, owing to the subscriptions falling off and the bother of getting them.

1857. Was there any attempt made there to get money from the boards of guardians?—Oh, no; at that time we were advised by the Local Government Board that they would not pass it. I do not think it was ever attempted, so far as I know, in Berkshire; it was purely voluntary subscriptions there.

1858. It was discontinued before you got permission of the Local Government Board?—Oh, several years before; I do not think it has been going in Berkshire for, say, the last fifteen years.

1859. Now as to the administration of casual wards, is there any considerable difference in the various workhouses as to the treatment of the casuals?—Oh, immense. I have got a paper before me which was prepared by the Highworth and Swindon board of guardians, and they obtained it no doubt from the different poor law authorities. It shows you at a glance how very different the task work is. In dietary there is not a very great deal of difference, but in the task work there is an enormous difference.

1860. (Sir William Chance.) And detention?—The detention varies very much.

1861. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) And accommodation?—Yes, in every union.

1862. (Sir William Chance.) You would say then that there is a very great difference in the treatment of the casuals in the various casual wards?—Oh, an enormous difference. From time to time we have sent round to the different boards of guardians, and have had statements of what their treatment was, whether they had separate cells, what their task work was and all the other conditions that prevailed; and the difference is enormous.

1863. Can you give any special reason why there should be so great a difference?—Oh, yes; there is a very simple reason, that each board of guardians merely treats the casuals in the way that they think is cheapest and that they may get rid of them quickest from their own union. They do not in the least care about the casual pauper as a whole, they only want to kick him out as quickly as they can and on the cheapest terms.

1864. Then I suppose the worse accommodation they give, the more likely they are to get rid of him?—Well, it does not follow.

1865. Does it not?—No, I do not think it does; I think the professional man likes bad accommodation, where things are slack and he can smoke, and an old pauper looks after the casuals, and there is no bath and he can do pretty much what he likes, and there are no separate cells: even if the accommodation is nasty and disagreeable, the professional tramp prefers that to where the regulations are strict and he has more task though he may be warm.

1866. He prefers dirty association to cleanly separation?—I think so.

1867. Have you any opinion as to how uniformity could be secured?—We have been at this vagrancy question a pretty good time; but what I should like to say is that tramps as distinct from the local poor should be put under a separate organisation altogether from one end of the country to the other.

1868. (Chairman.) Would you suggest, in the first place, that every casual ward should have an arrangement of separate cells or some system of separation?—Certainly, that is my opinion.

1869. That would be one thing you would recommend?—Certainly, I should.

1870. I suppose as far as you could you would have a similar task for them, having regard to the men's health and strength?—That would depend upon the nature of the stone they had to break, if stone breaking was the task.

1871. Yes, quite so?—That is a very great difference; you cannot put down any hard and fast amount of stone to be broken throughout England, because the nature of the stone is so different.

1872. And more than that, the expert stone breaker would break double the amount of stone that a man who was raw on the work could do?—Yes.

1873. But you would wish, as far as possible, to have similar tasks in each case?—Yes.

1874. And you say that is not the case at present?—Oh, entirely different.

1875. (Sir William Chance.) I understand your answer to be that you want a radical reform of the system?—Yes.

1876. You want the administration as regards vagrants taken away from the guardians altogether; is that it?—Yes.

1877. But to whom do you want the looking after of tramps transferred?—Well, the only body at present that that could be, is the police; that is the only answer I can give to that, because I know of no other body that covers the whole country more or less under one system of organisation.

1878. (Chairman.) In that case you probably would have to attach the accommodation for casuals to the police station instead of to the workhouse?—The matter of cost comes in there.

1879. Yes, quite so?—In all future cases I should like it, but I would not advocate that the large sums of money which have been spent on casual wards should be thrown away.

1880. (Sir William Chance.) But you think possibly the question of labour colonies may come in?—It does; yes.

1881. (Chairman.) What do you say on the subject of labour colonies?—In the first place for clearness I want to express a definition. I call a wayfarer a man who is at any rate travelling with an object, and a vagrant a person who is wandering about aimlessly picking up what sort of a livelihood he can. I think that the general public opinion will never allow you to say that no man shall travel the country to get to a place who cannot take a railway ticket; you must provide something; you must acknowledge that there is some small percentage of men who legitimately are travelling the country without the means of any sort of conveyance and have to walk and depend on what they can get legitimately from the workhouse. There, I think, comes in the necessity for the way-ticket system. I think that a man on starting, say that he wants to go from Southampton to Bristol, should be able to get a ticket, from the police, we will say. It should contain his description and the place that he is going to and the workhouses that he may properly stop at with a good day's march in between and a place between those workhouses where he can get food. Then I think as long as he proceeds to that given destination you may consider that that man is a bona fide wayfarer and not a vagrant. The moment that he gets off that line to where he is going—the only criterion that I can see is the destination, because there is something absolute about that and it is not the account that he can give himself of wanting particular work—the moment he gets off that line I think we must presume that he is a vagrant and not a wayfarer. In that case my idea would be entirely a new departure—that he should be liable to be committed for a very long term to some sort of labour colony or labour institution. The reason why I am repeating what I said before in advocating the way-tickets is that they take away from the public the excuse for thoughtless almsgiving to strange beggars, and that you must have something to show the public that a man is provided for who is travelling; and that, I think, is one great importance of the way-ticket system.

1882. And also, as you said, helping the honest man?—Yes, I take the honest man to be included in the wayfarer as distinct from the vagrant.

1883. (Sir William Chance.) But then how would you provide for the bona fide wayfarer; you said you wanted to take the casual wards away from the guardians; you would require some kind of night accommodation for these bona fide wayfarers who had tickets. Who would provide that?—I want all to be under the same authority; as long as the man is travelling straight to a given destination, I think he should do his task of work in the morning and should be liberated at once from the casual ward. He must take his chance in the casual ward.

1884. You would leave the casual ward as it is?—Well, I should like the casual ward to be separated from the guardians; that is the great difficulty, because as long as it is under the guardians you get this great variety of administration all over the country. I want the casual ward not to be under the authority of the guardians.

1885. That is what I tried to get at?—That is what I want.

1886. Therefore, the present casual wards would have to go?—Well, I suggest they could be used by the new authority, whatever it may be.

1887. (Mr. Simpson.) They could be transferred to a county authority?—Yes.

1888. (Sir William Chance.) Or to the central police authority?—Certainly.

1889. The police ought to have entire control of vagrants, whether bona fide or professional?—Yes, that is my idea. And the distinction between the two should be the man who holds on his way to the destination he has given, and the man who is found to be wandering off that given track.

1890. (Mr. Simpson.) At the present time, the police are appointed assistant relieving officers throughout the county, are they not?—Well, with the exception of one union; we had it universally; there is now one union in which the police are not assistant relieving officers in the county of Wilts, and I hope we shall get the police back there again.

1891. Do you know if there are other assistant relieving officers besides the police?—(Captain Sterne.) There are the regular relieving officers.

1892. Do the police get extra pay for that duty?—Yes.

1893. From poor law funds, I suppose?—Yes.

1894. (Sir William Chance.) Your returns show that from 1893 to 1898 the number of vagrants in possession of good tickets when relieved never fell below 7,000, and in 1894 the number was 11,170; since 1898 they have never reached 6,000, and in 1903 the number was 4,688, so that between 1899 and 1903 the number of vagrants with good tickets has been very markedly less than between 1893 and 1898. Does any explanation of that occur to you?—(Mr. Mitchell.) It depends a good deal, I think, on the total number of vagrants relieved. I think you will find the proportion is about the same.

1895. Is that so?—Well, in 1898 there were 29,000 relieved and there were 7,000 in possession of good tickets; that is about a fourth. Then take another year, say 1901; certainly then the number of vagrants with good tickets was not quite so large in proportion; it was say 5,000 out of a total of 24,000—less than one-fourth. Then we come to 1903; 28,000 relieved and 4,600 good tickets, that would be about one-sixth.

1896. It is much less in 1903?—Yes. There is this to be said about 1903—that there were large works going on, and whenever that is the case an immense number of navvies are travelling, and there is always a certain percentage of men following after those navvies that are not navvies at all; they follow them and cadge on the navvies.

1897. And those people would not use the tickets?—They would not use the tickets.

1898. It looks rather as if the bona fide tramp had been to a certain extent driven off the road?—(Captain Sterne.) Well, he is not very numerous after all, when you come to the census of the individual; it is the multiplication that makes him look so numerous.

1899. (Chairman.) Mr. Mitchell, you were speaking of the remedies you would suggest?—(Mr. Mitchell.) As shortly as I can put it, this is my idea: to draw the distinction between the wayfarer and the vagrant, and when we are satisfied that the man is not a wayfarer, that is to say that he will not do any work, that then he should be subjected to very long terms of what one would hope would change his life.

1900. He would be the man you would want to put into a labour colony, if one existed?—If it existed, yes. Because, as I think I mentioned before, prison has utterly failed as a deterrent to vagrants and that very much longer terms of detention are required. There is one thing I would say; over 10 per cent. of the tramps that we now have in Wiltshire are men whom we have every reason to believe, from the police having examined them, have served in the Army. That is a point which I think is very unsatisfactory at the present time.

1901. Do any of the men give any account of themselves in that matter?—Not that I know of. They are men who have served their time.

1902. How come they to be in that position?—(Captain Sterne.) Looking for work they say; nothing more than that.

1903. (Dr. Downes.) Do they produce their parchments?—Not always.

1904. (Chairman.) Your committee have found great difficulties in regard to the uniformity of treatment?—(Mr. Mitchell.) Oh, great difficulties.

1905. That I suppose has been your great stumbling-block?—Our great stumbling-block. We have been at it ever since 1882; I have been at it all that time, over twenty years, and that has been from beginning to end the greatest difficulty that we found.

1906. And you would gladly welcome any change which would bring about something approaching uniformity?—Certainly.

1907. (Sir William Chance.) There was a decrease of vagrancy in the county, was there not, after you started the system in 1882?—Yes.

1908. For a certain number of years?—Yes, for several years.

1909. How long did that decrease go on?—I should think it went on for about five or six years. We had a very large decrease the first year.

1910. (Chairman.) Without going into actual figures, that continued over some years?—I think for five or six years.

1911. (Sir William Chance.) There was no substantial rise for ten years afterwards?—No, I should think not; but it began to rise in about five or six years, and then it went down again for a bit.

1912. Now since 1890 there has been a considerable increase has there not?—Yes, a very large increase. (Captain Sterne.) That in a great measure is due to the men home from the war.

1913. The works on Salisbury Plain have not been going on all those years?—No.

1914. During the whole period from 1890 to the present time there has been a gradual increase going on?—(Mr. Mitchell.) Yes, with a fall during the period.

1915. There was a fall in 1900 apparently?—Yes.

1916. Now about the tickets, is it not possible for these to be changed for drink?—(Captain Sterne.) No, nobody would give drink for those. It is not like the Dorsetshire system; there they get bread you know, and they can change the bread for liquor.

1917. Is there any possibility of the tickets being passed from one vagrant to another?—(Mr. Mitchell.) The description is on it.

1918. But is there not a possibility of a man passing his ticket on; he gives his name, but very little is known about him?—(Captain Sterne.) His description is on his ticket.

1919. His description is on his ticket, but still he could say "I am the man who answers to that description." There is a possibility?—If the man on the ticket was six feet high and the fellow presenting it five feet four there would be a marked difference. Of course, if he were anything approximately like him he might pass.

1920. Now about almsgiving, do you think the system really has prevented that in the county?—I think in a great many instances it has; but I am afraid you will never prevent the poor people from giving alms.

1921. That I should imagine?—The better-off class of people do not do it so much.

1922. I suppose you would say that if one could prevent the poor from giving to these vagrants, they would possibly go off the road?—A good many of them.

1923. There would not be so many of them, you agree with that?—I do. It is certain that a large amount is given by the poor themselves, at any rate in Wilts.

1924. Now as to begging on Sunday. Is it the rule in the casual wards in Wiltshire to detain over Sunday?—It is; in one or two unions they have never been able to do it; they have not had accommodation; and then it has occurred—at one union I know in particular, Wilton—where the next union did not detain on Sundays, that they had not accommodation for all that came in when they detained them; in self defence they were obliged to get rid of the casuals on Sundays.

1925. Was that in consequence of one union not detaining the full time?—Of one union not detaining the full time.

1926. So that one union got more than they ought?—Yes.

1927. If every union were to carry out the Order of 1882, that surplus in the one union and the small number in the other union would not occur?—No; you must go to the other counties as well. (Mr. Mitchell.) To bear out that, we have had continual complaints on the committee from border unions, where vagrants come from other counties where no system prevails, of being overcrowded on the Sunday, because they not only have those they detain from Saturday, but they have those coming in from a neighbouring county on Sunday where no such rule prevails.

1928. That of course is an argument for uniformity throughout the whole country?—We have had that over and over again from border unions.

1929. I suppose, Mr. Mitchell, you have been a guardian?—Oh, yes.

1930. And for some time?—For a great many years.

1931. Are you a guardian now?—Yes, but not in Wiltshire. I should tell you I live in a union which is partly in Wiltshire and partly in Gloucestershire.

1932. I suppose you have discussed this question with other guardians?—Yes.

1933. Do you find a very strong feeling among those unions which you know, in favour of transferring the care of the casuals to the police entirely?—Yes; most people that I have spoken to about the poor law would be very glad to get rid of the casuals; they are not local poor.

1934. That is a strong opinion?—I should say certainly the great majority of the opinions of those I have spoken to about that would be in favour of transferring casuals from the poor law.

1935. And also there is a strong feeling, is there not, in favour of transferring them gradually to the State—making them a State charge instead of a local charge?—I should think there would be an overwhelming opinion amongst guardians about that; I never knew guardians disagree upon any point on which they could transfer expenses to the State from the local rates.

1936. But I understand that, apart from that, speaking not as a guardian, you are of opinion that they should be under some kind of central control?—Even as a taxpayer.

1937. And that would mean naturally their being put on the Imperial exchequer in some kind of way?—Yes.

1938. And you are in favour of that?—Yes; even as a taxpayer in contradistinction to a ratepayer.

1939. (Dr. Downes.) One difficulty, I think, in the way of transferring the administration of the casual wards would be, that the existing casual wards are in many cases bound up as it were with the workhouse?—Of course, that is so.

1940. It would introduce another administration into the workhouse premises?—No doubt that is a very great difficulty; but the more modern casual wards, those that are more up to date and have separate cells, although they are on the premises of the workhouse, as a rule I think, have generally, as far as possible, a separate access to them; that is to say, that in all the better workhouses they have kept the vagrants going in and out of the casual ward, separate from the ordinary paupers, as far as they can.

1941. You have told us that in Wiltshire, Warminster is the only union that declines to bear the financial share in your work?—Yes.

1942. Does Warminster assist in the working of the scheme apart from financial assistance?—Yes, they send us returns.

1943. And do they detain men who have not got their good tickets?—I do not know. You see these unions from time to time have followed our advice, and then they have dropped out with regard to that; and we on the committee have from time to time sent round circulars asking the different unions exactly their rules as regards detention; but we have not done so, certainly, within the last year or so.

1944. I think you told us that there is considerable diversity of procedure amongst the unions as regards detention and treatment of casuals generally?—Oh, yes, there is no uniformity at all, practically.

1945. What is the amount of bread you give?—Eight ounces.

1946. Was it always eight ounces?—Yes.

1947. Have you had any complaints of insufficiency?—No, I do not remember any.

1948. How is it given?—At a constable's house, that Captain Sterne chooses. First of all, of course, the relief station has to be in a convenient position, as near as may be midway, securing a good day's walk to the next workhouse; as far as we can they are selected with regard to that, and then from Captain Sterne's knowledge of his men, it should be a man that is fitted for that particular work.

1949. It is not necessarily a police station then, it may be a constable's house?—(Captain Sterne.) It may be a constable's house.

1950. But would not the constable be taking his rest?—Not at two o'clock; he would be having his dinner. Suppose he came off at two or three in the morning, he would be up before twelve.

1951. Does he give the bread, or the ticket for the bread?—Well, in some cases where the baker in the village declines to supply it, he gives the bread; but if the baker in the village will supply the bread—of course it is a troublesome matter to cut off eight ounces of bread and so on—then he sends the man there.

1952. Have you any long routes on which there is no workhouse?—Well, from Mere to Warminster; I should think that would be about the longest: there is also no casual ward between Devizes and Salisbury.

1953. I mean the longest route you have between casual ward and casual ward?—Yes, that would be supposing a man was going straight to Salisbury, he would have to go over the Plain; that would be more than twenty miles to Salisbury.

1954. Would many go that way?—Well, the real working men I think; it is the tramp, as a rule, that goes round villages.

1955. Where does the man sleep who goes that way?—Oh, he will do the twenty miles in a day.

1956. If he does not?—If he does not, he would sleep under a rick on the downs in the summer time; that is where we are likely to find him.

1957. Have you had any special difficulty with regard to begging and charges on that route more than on any other?—No.

1958. Do you make any census?—Yes, once a month really, but I only return once a quarter.

1959. What does the census include?—Houseless poor, that is fellows we found lying out anywhere, under a rick or anywhere else; those relieved by the police; and those found in common lodging-houses.

1960. And also casual wards?—No; relieved by the police covers that.

1961. (Mr. Simpson.) "Relieved by the police" would mean men who go to a casual ward?—Certainly.

1962. (Dr. Downes.) Have the works on Salisbury Plain affected your numbers?—No doubt they have.

1963. Since when?—Within the last two years. The work became general about two years ago; in fact they are very extensive works; I think there are as many as 2,000 men at work on them.

1964. That is a special cause for the rise in your numbers for the last two years?—(Mr. Mitchell.) Yes. As regards the census there is a rather curious thing; I cannot give any reason for it, but my friend Colonel Curtis-Hayward was telling me that the numbers in Gloucestershire in common lodging-houses, as shown by the census, exceed those in casual wards. With us in Wiltshire it is entirely the other way. For instance, taking the night of the 1st December last as an example, there were 77 in casual wards, and there were 13 in common lodging-houses.

1965. (Chairman.) Gloucestershire is a more thickly populated county than Wiltshire?—Oh, yes, it is so, but it is exclusive of the city of Bristol; it includes, of course, the two large towns of Gloucester and Cheltenham.

1966. I mean you have a great number of small villages in Wiltshire which would scarcely have a common lodging-house, I should think?—Oh, yes.

1967. In Gloucestershire, the villages are larger?—Yes. I was rather surprised at it even with that, because it is a tremendous difference between having 77 persons in casual wards and only 13 in common lodging-houses.

1968. (Dr. Downes.) That depends upon the accommodation in the common lodging-houses. I do not know what accommodation of this sort they have in Wiltshire?—(Captain Sterne.) We have got 18 common lodging-houses in the county.

1969. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) One question about prison treatment. You say you would reduce the dietary and increase the labour and alter the treatment in prisons so as to make it more severe than the casual ward?—(Mr. Mitchell.) At any rate not less severe.

1970. You would reduce the diet for seven day prisoners to the casual ward diet as laid down by the Local Government Board?—I want to guard myself on that; for a short time.

1971. For seven days?—Yes.

1972. And you would keep a man on 22 oz. of bread and one and a half ounces of cheese per day, for seven days, and expect him to do a hard task of labour?—I have not got in my head what the Local Government Board regulation is, for a man in for twenty-four hours.

1973. It is that. You know the prison dietary was settled on the recommendation of the Committee of 1898, and you would alter it in the case of tramps only?—Yes.

1974. Only tramps?—So as not to hold out the inducement of their going to prison rather than to the casual ward, but I have in my mind, at the same time, the other remedy which is now proposed of long terms of detention. That would only be where a casual had done something more than begging to bring him within the law.

1975. You are speaking of begging?—No. I am not speaking of begging.

1976. May I ask what offence you are speaking of?—Insubordination, for instance.

1977. Workhouse offences?—Yes, in the casual ward. Are we supposing things to go on as they are now, or under a different régime?

1978. I want to know exactly what you mean. You say special dietary treatment and task work should be given in prisons to vagrants committed there, so as not to render prison preferable to casual wards. I want to know how you propose to do it. As far as the diet goes you would reduce that to the level of the casual wards?—Yes, and give them the same labour that they have in the casual wards.

1979. Then it would come to this that you would punish a man more severely for an offence in the workhouse than for an offence such as stealing. Do you think the magistrates or the people would accept that position?—They used to.

1980. Did they?—I mean till this new prison dietary came in we used not to have the vagrants preferring to go to prison;

1981. You are drawing a distinction between the different crimes; that is what I want to get at?—Yes;

1982. And you would give more severe treatment for offences in the casual ward than offences outside, such as stealing and that sort of thing?—Your vagrant is going about the country under State protection as it is, and the State on one line prescribes certain regulations for him; and then, when he gets into prison, the State, although he has now committed an offence, provides another line and he is better treated than if he had committed no offence.

1983. Do you not think you might meet that by levelling up the treatment in the casual ward to that in prisons?—Then you make it too attractive.

1984. (Captain Showers.) What is your opinion, Captain Sterne, as to the casual wards being under the police?—(Captain Sterne.) Well, I would like to have nothing to do with them at all. I think the police have quite enough to do as it is; we are everything now pretty nearly.

1985. Supposing the police had charge of these, it would be very likely to lead to their being exposed to risk of infection from the tramps?—Possibly.

1986. I do not know that the chief constable could make a constable undertake this duty?—I think you would have to increase the force; you would have to have men specially appointed for the purpose.

1987. You would require to have special constables?—Some arrangement might be made, I think, with superannuated men.

1988. But you could not order a man to be in charge of a casual ward?—Well, you could order a man to do anything.

1989. Quite so, but he would have the right of appeal?—I should not like to tell him; of course, I would not do it on my own initiative.

1990. I do not know how the law stands on that point; the police are liable to do almost anything, but I do not know that you could make a policeman take charge of a casual ward?—It is very doubtful, I think.

1991. (Mr. Simpson.) It is doubtful, but, at the same time, could you make such a clear distinction between an assistant relieving officer and the manager of a casual ward, as to say the employment of a policeman in the one capacity is legal and in the other is illegal; the two run rather close together, do they not?—Yes. But the assistant relieving officer is not put in charge.

1992. (Captain Showers.) In addition, the policeman would have to see to the bathing and see the men do their work, and so on; it is hardly police work?—No.

1993. (Chairman.) It would be quite special?—It would be quite special.

1994. (Mr. Simpson.) In your experience, do you find that the fact of policemen being employed as assistant relieving officers does help them in the discharge of their ordinary police duties?—Well, I think it does, sir, in this way; the tramp is brought under their notice, they have got information from all parts of the country, and in that way on many an occasion we have been able to apprehend criminals, if not for ourselves, for other counties.

1995. I suppose if a tramp has been to a police station to be relieved, and then gets drunk or commits some crime later—it may be easier to take him?—Yes, it would be; but what I mean is this—information comes in of, say, John Smith, and a full description is given of him; he is a tramp coming from London; a man comes up as a tramp that night for a shelter, and the description is referred to, and he probably may be the man wanted. In that way it is a great assistance.

1996. (Chairman.) Especially if you have telephonic communication?—I have been trying for that for a good many years. I am happy to say I have got the telephonic communication on trial at three or four of my stations.

1997. (Captain Showers.) Do you have bills placarded about your county with reference to beggars and vagrants?—Bills are posted up periodically and one is handed to every cottager, every householder in Wiltshire, periodically; and the whole expense is met by the police.

1998. (Sir William Chance.) In your census of vagrants on the night of the 1st December, you divide them into

Mr. A. G. Mitchell and Capt. Sterne.
30 Nov. 1904.

Mr. A. C. Mitchell and Capt. Sterne. houseless poor, relieved by the police, and found in common lodging-houses?—Yes, sir.
 1999. I observe that in these returns of yours, the houseless poor are returned as nil?—Not in all, I think. In some cases we found as many as four or five.

30 Nov. 1904. — 2000. It is merely accidental, then, that in all these returns I have here the houseless poor were returned nil?—There were none found.

2001. That is accidental?—(Mr. Mitchell.) There have been fewer lately. In our later reports there have been fewer found houseless than there used to be.

2002. In your census of your common lodging-houses, do you make any distinction of men, women and children, or do you merely take the number you find there?—(Captain Sterne.) Men, women and children are distinguished.

2003. And as to those relieved by the police, as assistant relieving officers, are the men, women and children shown separately?—Yes.

2004. Is it at all the practice, from your observation, for a man who has a wife and child, to go into the casual ward himself and send his wife and child into a common lodging-house at the same time?—Very often.

2005. That is very often done?—It is very often done. (Mr. Mitchell.) I would like to say, with regard to women and children, that it has been my own observation and it has been the observation of masters of workhouses to whom I have spoken, and of guardians who take an interest in this matter, that there are not as many women and children about the road as vagrants as there used to be. I can give no statistics for it; but simply from observation my own opinion is that, and the opinion of others I have spoken to is the same.

2006. (Chairman.) There was a report that you made some years ago, Captain Sterne, as to vagrancy?—(Captain Sterne.) Yes, sir. I was ordered at quarter sessions in 1871 to make this report. It is ancient history, but still it may be of some value. I will read it if I may.

(Captain Sterne then read the following report.)

"In compliance with the order of court of quarter sessions, held at Salisbury on the 4th of April last (1871), directing me to collect information on the subject of vagrancy in the county, and report to the next quarter sessions some plan to remedy the increase thereof:—

"I have the honour to report that I communicated with the chief constables of counties in England to ascertain their views, and what system had been tried in their several counties for the suppression of vagrancy and with what results;

"I find that in twenty-one counties where the Vagrancy Act has been strictly enforced, vagrancy has considerably diminished—in one (Warwickshire) the chief constable states that two years ago stringent measures were brought into operation in that county, for the suppression of vagrancy, magistrates deciding to punish all persons infringing the law. Circulars cautioning persons against begging have been kept constantly circulated, which, with extra zeal on the part of the police, and the knowledge of certain punishment in the event of their being caught, has had the effect of ridding the county of the bulk of itinerant mendicants which hitherto infested it. Vagrancy has been reduced to a minimum; the public have also expressed their gratification with the satisfactory change which has taken place.

"In seven counties the Vagrancy Act is carried out in an indifferent sort of way with no sensible diminution of vagrancy.

"In Dorsetshire a mendicity society has been established which is reported by the chief constable as having had a very beneficial effect.

"In Kent the bread system is being introduced, but not being in work no opinion can be expressed.

"In Essex bills are circulated discouraging the public from giving indiscriminate relief, with a good effect.

"In Berkshire a new system is recommended, viz:—carrying out the Vagrancy Act strictly, giving a uniform punishment of fourteen days on conviction and one month if the vagrant has been impudent.

"I caused a census of vagrants to be taken on the nights of April 2nd, May 1st, and June 1st, by which it will be seen that on the night of the 2nd April last, the number of houseless persons was forty-four, and relieved by the police forty (the number found in common lodging-houses was not taken on this occasion), making a total of eighty-four.

"On the night of the 1st of May last, the number of houseless persons was twenty-nine, of vagrants relieved by police twenty-three, of vagrants found in common lodging-houses thirty-three, total eighty-five.

"On the night of the 1st of June instant, the number of houseless persons was seven, of vagrants relieved by police thirty-three, of vagrants found in common lodging-houses, twenty-three, total sixty-three.

"On the 12th of April last, I gave special instructions to the police under my orders for the suppression of vagrancy, and on the 18th of the same month I caused bills to be circulated throughout the county warning beggars, and requesting the public not to give money or direct relief to them; the result up to the present time has been highly satisfactory. The number relieved by the police for this quarter has been 2,994, against 4,110 relieved by them during the corresponding quarter of last year, showing a decrease of 1,116.

"Fifty-seven vagrants have been apprehended during this quarter, of whom forty-four have been convicted and thirteen discharged.

"There has been a very sensible decrease in vagrancy for the year 1870, as compared with 1869, which I attribute in a great measure to carefully searching all vagrants applying for relief.

"I communicated with the governor of the Oswestry house of industry, where a most successful system for the relief of vagrants has been in operation for three years, which I strongly recommend for the consideration of the court of quarter sessions, and boards of guardians.

"The system which I would recommend is as follows:—

"First. Proper tramp wards fitted at all our unions, as in Oswestry house of industry.

"Second. Labour test and treatment as applied at Oswestry.

"Third. A person with the powers of a constable appointed to take charge of vagrants at the several unions. A superannuated constable at a small salary would do for this work.

"Fourth. Keeping bills circulated warning beggars. Strictly carrying out the Vagrancy Act on the part of the magistrates, as well as the police, and giving a uniform punishment throughout the county.

"Fifth. The poorer classes to be constantly urged by the magistrates and the police in their localities not to give relief to strangers, but to hand over the vagrant to the nearest police officer.

"I think it very desirable that honest poor, who are sometimes compelled to travel in search of work, should be provided at the unions, or lodging houses, with a better description of food than a regular vagrant, and without the labour test. I, therefore, suggest the following for the consideration of the court:—

"That the police be authorised to give passes to any person whom they know to be honest, and compelled to travel in search of work; such passes to show the place travelled from, the place of destination, and the route to be taken. Any person presenting such a pass to be entitled to a better description of food and lodging at the several unions on the route. The pass to be endorsed, with date, where relief is given, and to be given up to the police at the end of the journey, and returned by them to the police at the place of issue.

"To make this system work well it should become general, and made public; the regular vagrant could then be easily detected and treated as such, as all bona fide or travellers, knowing they would get better treatment on their journey, would apply to the police of their locality for a pass before setting out on their journey.

"If the magistrates will support the police in carrying out the Vagrancy Act strictly, if the unions will adopt some such system as that adopted at Oswestry, and every parish look after their own poor, and no others, vagrancy in Wiltshire will be very soon at a low ebb."

2007. Have you had any reason to change your opinion given then?—Very little, sir. I think our system in Wiltshire carries out a great portion of what I proposed. We have not the power to go as far as I suggested.

2008. But to a large extent, your suggestions and recommendations as to the way-ticket have been followed out?—Yes; except that as a man does not come from the police we do not know that he is really an honest wayfarer; he does not come with a certificate. Mr. A. C. Mitchell and Capt. Sterne.

2009. (Sir William Chance.) You recommended in your report that the casual wards should be put under a super-annuated policeman?—I did; you want a man with the power of the constable. 30 Nov. 1904.

2010. (Chairman.) Have you anything more to say?—(Mr. Mitchell.) There is one thing I should like to emphasize, sir, and that is that if we could only once stop the giving, we could stop the vagrancy. If we cannot stop the giving, I am afraid there will be people who will live on what they can cadge.

SEVENTH DAY.

Tuesday, 17th January, 1905.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair).

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.
Captain SHOWERS.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary).

Mr. J. HOWE, called; and Examined.

2011. (Chairman.) Mr. Howe, you are, I believe, the master of the Cuckfield union workhouse?—Yes, sir.

2012. I think you are aware what the object of this Committee is?—Yes, sir.

2013. You have kindly come to-day to give us evidence from your experience as workhouse master. How long have you been in that position?—I have been master of the Cuckfield workhouse for nineteen and a half years. Previous to that I was master of Daventry workhouse, and before that I was schoolmaster in three or four workhouses. I have been in the Poor Law service about thirty-five years altogether.

2014. What is the number of the inmates at the Cuckfield workhouse?—At the present time, 224.

2015. I believe you are also president of the Workhouse Masters' Association?—I am, sir.

2016. How long have you held that office?—Only for the year.

2017. It is an annual appointment?—Yes. I was appointed last July.

2018. What have you to tell us with regard to the number of vagrants coming to the casual wards of your workhouse?—Well, in 1885 we had 9,359, the next year 9,400, and they varied up to 1893 when we got to 10,262; in 1894 there were 12,988; in 1895, 12,115. Those figures are for the year ending Ladyday. In January, 1895, we started stone pounding, and the consequence was that from 12,115 in the year 1895, we reduced them to 5,576 in 1896; and for the year ending Ladyday, 1904, the number was still further reduced to 2,194.

2019. The recent increase in other places has not occurred in Cuckfield?—No, sir.

2020. I mean that in the last two years, when we have been told there has been considerable increase in other places, you have not had any increase?—We had a few more last year than we had the preceding year. We had a decrease last quarter of 18 over the corresponding quarter of 1903; but I attribute the increase more last year to the return of soldiers for one thing, and I am given to understand that the Workmen's Compensation Act will still further increase the unemployed, because employers will not employ people of mature age: they would rather employ younger men.

2021. Then you attribute the decrease in your numbers to the application of a fresh labour task?—Yes, sir; and more stringently carrying out the Local Government Board Orders. Mr. J. Howe. 17 Jan. 1905.

2022. Would you kindly describe to us what that task is?—The task is pounding one cwt. of beach flints like this (showing a stone) in a stone pounder. I have brought a photograph of the stone pounder for you to see.

2023. It is practically a pestle and mortar?—That is so, sir; the rammer has an enlarged end which pounds the stone. The stone is broken to go through a sieve, twenty-five meshes to the square inch; we are not over particular to see that every piece should go through, but that is the idea. The pounders are fixed in the concrete floor.

2024. How many of these have you?—A dozen, sir.

2025. Have you different sizes to suit varying capabilities?—No, sir, they are all alike.

2026. I did not know whether you had heavier or lighter ones for different men?—No, sir, they are all the same.

2027. I suppose you take into account a man's physical capacity?—Oh, yes, sir; they are not all set to the stone pounding; I think you have a printed report of mine for the year ended Christmas, 1903. (The report is printed in Appendix XXXIX.) That shows that we only put 518 to stone pounding out of a total of 1,635 men; that would be about 32 per cent.

2028. But I suppose all vagrants now are thoroughly well aware that if they go to Cuckfield there is a possibility, if not a probability, of their being set to this particular work?—Decidedly so.

2029. Have you heard any statements made by vagrants about the stone pounding?—Of course, they do not like stone pounding, and where it has been adopted it has tended to decrease the number of tramps.

2030. (Mr. Davy.) Did not the chairman of the Nantwich guardians visit your workhouse and do the task?—Yes, sir.

2031. How long did it take him?—About three and a quarter hours; but I cannot say that they all have the same kind of material; the material differs.

Mr. J. Howe. 2032. It was flints?—I believe so, sir; we have them sent to us from the beach at Shoreham.

17 Jan. 1905. 2033. I suppose the chairman of the Nantwich guardians has no special skill in stone pounding?—I should think not.

2034. (Mr. Simpson.) Is he a specially powerful man?—Fairly, sir.

2035. (Chairman.) What quantity did you say was the task?—One cwt. is a day's task. With regard to the ability of a man to do it, some five or six years ago we had a man in from Hayward's Heath, a regular loafer who would not work. My guardians instructed me to put him to stone pounding. After he had been at it four days, he did it before dinner; the consequence was the remaining part of the day he was idle, he had done his task of work.

2036. Evidently, you see, it is not so hard a task for an expert as it is for a beginner?—It requires no skill whatever; it is perfectly unskilled labour.

2037. I thought you said that a man after four days' experience could do it better than he could when he started?—Oh, he would naturally, but we do not get casuals to work quite so hard as he did.

2038. Now, what would you say was the value of the work of an average man doing that task, say per hour?—Well, sir, I do not know; it would all depend on how you can get rid of the stuff; the stone costs us about 9s. per ton delivered at our place.

2039. Getting the material?—Yes, sir, and I can sell it for about 15s. per ton; but, of course, we do not make a ton out of a ton; there is a certain amount of waste naturally.

2040. Is that as remunerative a task as you can give?—Well, I cannot say it is remunerative; it is more preventive than remunerative; we do it more for prevention than remuneration.

2041. What other tasks have you tried?—Gardening, pumping; of course, we have to do that even now; we have got eight acres of land to cultivate.

2042. Both these are remunerative?—Yes, sir.

2043. You must have your water pumped?—You will note that in my report it is stated that we put 557 men during the year 1903 at other work.

2044. But your opinion is that this stone crushing tends to keep men away?—Undoubtedly, sir.

2045. And you would, I suppose, recommend that it should be tried in other places?—Well, if we could make it universal and uniform over the country; because they would naturally leave Cuckfield, or any other place where they have this stone pounding, if they possibly could.

2046. Have you had any cases of men refusing to do this particular task?—Yes, sir; there were 45 prosecutions in 1903.

2047. With what result; were the men punished?—Yes.

2048. What punishment did they get?—Now they get twenty-eight days. During the whole of last year not a single one was let off for less. If there was only one magistrate on the Bench he could not give twenty-eight days, but the case would be adjourned till next day in order to obtain two magistrates.

2049. Now, can you tell us something about the diet for casuals?—The diet we have at our place is the minimum diet allowed by the Local Government Board. My opinion and the opinion of my brother masters, too, is that the diet requires a certain amount of consideration. Now, I will give you an instance; about two months ago the Brighton guardians gave orders that the casuals should have gruel in the morning. It is well known that the casuals passed by the Steyning workhouse at Shoreham, in order to reach Brighton to get the gruel.

2050. (Mr. Davy.) Was the result a great increase in numbers at Brighton?—They had a large increase at Brighton.

2051. (Chairman.) Did Brighton imitate your good example with regard to stone pounding?—For a certain number, sir; so they do at Shoreham, and at several workhouses in the county of Sussex.

2052. And do you know with what result?—Well, they get less vagrants.

2054. Have you heard at all that casuals prefer to go to prison rather than perform the task of work?—They do, some of them. I will give you an instance of that. I had a man prosecuted a month ago; he was sentenced to twenty-eight days' imprisonment. He came out of prison last Friday and we took him before the magistrate again yesterday and he got another month. He told us he would not do his task of work. He said "I did not do it a month ago, and I do not intend to do it now."

2055. Why did he come back to Cuckfield?—I cannot say.

2056. Do you think he came there with the express intention of getting another month?—I do not know. I did not ask him that question. The case is headed in the paper this morning "Preferred Prison."

2057. (Mr. Davy.) That man had two months for refusing to work?—There was a discussion amongst the magistrates as to whether they should not give him four months this time.

2058. He was discharged from prison at Lewes?—Yes, sir.

2059. He could have gone to any of the neighbouring casual wards?—Yes; he said he had been at Brighton, but whether that was so or not, I cannot say.

2060. Are you aware that he would not have got more than fourteen days at any other petty sessions, except at Hayward's Heath?—I never heard of twenty-eight days anywhere but at Hayward's Heath.

2061. You do not know why that man came back to Hayward's Heath?—No.

2062. There are many other workhouses within a few miles?—Oh, yes; he could have gone to Uckfield or Newhaven.

2063. (Chairman.) Have you many children in your casual ward?—No, sir. Here are the numbers of males, females, and children from 1887. (Document handed in, see Appendix XXXIX.)

2064. Taking last year, there were 72 children as against 1,764 men. The year before 73 children against 1,638 men. The year before that 71 children as against 2,184 men?—I think I have had as many as 900 children in one year.

2067. Have you any knowledge of what becomes of the children; if the parents go to the casual wards, are the children located elsewhere?—I do not think they are, sir. At the present time I do not think there are so many children travelling about our county as there used to be, particularly in our district; because they know full well if the children are not properly kept and properly seen after we take notice of it. I have the instructions of my board of guardians to communicate at once with the office at Brighton of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. I have on one or two occasions been able to get the consent of the so-called parents to the children being taken away from them. I could not, of course, say whether they were the parents or not.

2068. Have you any idea what becomes of the children when the male and female in charge of them come into the workhouse?—Well, if they have got children I think they bring them with them.

2069. You do?—I should think so; there would be no means, for instance, of leaving them at Cuckfield; there is not a common lodging-house at Cuckfield. There has not been one for several years. We feel the great want of that.

2070. That would suggest that these vagrants have not many children; either children of their own or children in their charge?—You see they will not come to us. For instance, if they say they are going to Brighton, I send a letter or a wire the night before saying, look out for certain people at Brighton. The officer then will be on the look out. They know that; the casuals soon spread it abroad themselves.

2072. The proportion of children to males appears to be small?—It is very small, sir: still these are the facts.

2073. To go back for one moment to the stone pounding task; it is not imposed in all cases?—Oh, no; in 33 per cent. last year.

2074. Do you select men on account of their physical capacity?—Yes, sir; and particularly if we know they are habitual tramps, or if they have paid us a visit on previous occasions. Of course, we use our judgment as to whether we shall put them to stone pounding or not.

2075. Would you kindly tell us what you do with regard to the bathing and searching of vagrants?—This is strictly carried out. We have two good baths and plenty of hot water; and they are always searched.

2076. Do they object to the baths?—Some do, sir.

2077. Even although you give them hot water?—Yes.

2078. Have you found that the bath has been effective in the way of detecting contagious and infectious diseases?—Well, we want to make a suggestion to you. I am requested by the Workhouse Masters' Association to suggest whether it would not be advisable for casual paupers to be medically inspected by the medical officer either weekly or fortnightly, all over the country, as a preventive of disease.

2079. I suppose there is always some attendant who sees a man while he is bathing?—Yes; my instructions are that the labour master, or in his absence the person who does his work for him, ought to see the man; and if they see any sign of eruption of any kind, they are to inform me.

2080. We have heard a great deal of the spread of disease by tramps. Evidently the bathing system would be a very material factor in the detection of disease?—Oh, decidedly so. But, of course, that is not done everywhere.

2081. (Sir William Chance.) Is the water changed for each vagrant?—About every two, sir.

2082. Every two?—Yes, sometimes for every one. It depends on how many we have got; sometimes we have not many men.

2083. (Chairman.) And it would depend on the condition of the men too?—Oh, yes. Recently my labour master told me that he had a man who had not had a bath for a fortnight, and he had never seen such a dirty man in his life. It was on Sunday night that he came to our place. He said that he and sixty-two others were discharged from a workhouse, not in our county, but not far off it, and there were none of them bathed on the Saturday. That might have been through some defect in the apparatus or otherwise, but they were all discharged on the Sunday morning because there were so many of them—sixty-three; and this man said none of them had had a bath. Of course, you could only take his word for it.

2084. With regard to searching, do you think that is unpopular with the vagrants?—Of course it is, sir; especially taking his pipe and matches away.

2085. Do you know whether the men hide any valuables they may have, outside before they come in?—It is very seldom they bring any money to our place.

2086. The money may have been put in some safe place?—Yes, I have seen people hiding valuables, and money at any rate, along a hedgerow before they got to the workhouse. I recollect an instance nearly forty years ago when I was a schoolmaster at the Stow union; an old man found 17s. which had been placed beside an old tree on the opposite side of the road by a vagrant before he was admitted to the workhouse.

2087. Did he claim it?—I think the old man got it. The tramp lost it. I told him it served him right; he should not have thought of coming there with that amount of money on him.

2088. (Captain Showers.) You return them their pipes and matches?—Oh, yes.

2089. (Chairman.) With a man genuinely in search of work, what do you do to assist him?—Give him every facility; let him go next morning, if he is genuinely in search of work; and if I can tell him of a place where employment is likely to be obtained, I send him on. You will note in my report that in 1903 there were only 21 out of 1,635 that I let off.

2090. There were only 21 that impressed you with the idea that they were honest men in search of work?—Yes. For me to allow them to go, they must by some means or other convince me that they probably will get work; the men would naturally say they were in search of work.

2091. We have had evidence from Gloucestershire and Wiltshire as to giving wayfarers a way-ticket which includes an allowance of eight ozs. of bread in the middle of the day, and passing them on from one place to another; have you considered that system at all?—Yes, I have, sir.

2092. What are your views?—We had a meeting I may say on Saturday—a committee meeting of the Workhouse Masters' Association, of which I was chairman—and our opinion is that if a mid-day meal were given it would be a very good thing, and it would prevent begging. It ought not to be given at the workhouse: our opinion is that it should be at some centre where they could obtain it. They would have then a way-ticket given to them by the master or attendant at the casual ward to prove that they had been in the casual ward the night preceding; and our opinion is that if you could recommend that a mid-day meal should be given, it should be given at some centre on the production of this ticket, and that the person should eat it there and not take it away. Then the general public would know that the vagrants had a mid-day meal, and that there would be no necessity for them to beg.

2093. With the exception of requiring the men to eat the bread at a certain place, you have described pretty well what the Gloucester way-ticket system is. The man takes the ticket to the police station. As a rule he is given a loaf there, or he is referred to the village grocer or baker, and then he is passed on. But there is something more than the mid-day meal: I should like to know your opinion with regard to the way-ticket as giving the honest man a certificate that he is on his way. There is marked upon it the man's name, his description, his starting place, and the place to which he is going. If he carries out that journey, do you not think that it is good evidence that he is genuinely on the way to get work?—Undoubtedly; that is exactly our idea, sir.

2094. Then if that could be done, do you not think it would be an advantage?—Oh, yes, if it is made general. As to everything that is suggested by the Workhouse Masters' Association, there should be uniformity.

2096. Throughout the country?—Yes; there is no use doing it in one county and not in another, or in one part of the country and not in another.

2097. Now, what is your opinion with regard to the tramp wards being suitable for the bona fide working man in search of employment?—Of course, certain tramp wards are unsatisfactory. I know some tramp wards which are some of the most horrid places a man could get into; but if the separate cell system were adopted, I think they meet every requirement, provided they are thoroughly good ventilated places. It has been said, of course, that the bona fide working man does not like to associate with casuals; but you must not lose sight of this one thing, namely, that if he has sufficient money to go to a common lodging-house, you can find as bad characters in the common lodging-house as you can find in the ordinary casual ward.

2098. I take it that the regular loafer would rather be in association than otherwise?—Of course, he would, sir.

2099. If he gets into the common lodging-house he gets the association, but do you agree with other witnesses who have told us that common lodging-houses are often

Mr. J. Howe. very filthy. A man would get a more comfortable bed as far as the softness of it went, but it is generally infested with vermin ?—Of course, they are not under such supervision as casual wards.

17 Jan. 1905.

2100. What is your opinion ?—I have been in some bad common lodging-houses, and I have been in some casual wards that ought to be swept off the face of the earth ; they are not fit for human beings to go into.

2101. Who is responsible for this ?—To a certain extent possibly the guardians, because they will not build.

2102. (Sir William Chance.) Are there any of those in your county ?—We have one or two in our county which are bad enough to be done away with.

2103. (Chairman.) You would say there are some casual wards that require renovation and alteration ?—I will not say a great number, but I know several that require renovation and alteration ; I have seen them personally.

2104. Would you go so far as to say a considerable number ?—Well, a considerable number.

2105. A considerable number of casual wards that require a good deal of attention ?—Yes, certainly. And I know lots of instances of men, who would rather come to our casual ward than go to a common lodging-house ; I mean casual wards similar to our own, because a great many of them do prefer cleanliness, and we know full well, with regard to our casual wards, that we should naturally have our Inspector calling us over the coals if they were not to a certain extent clean. Then again, of course, in common lodging-houses, they do not have the same facilities for disinfecting their bedding or having it cleansed as we have in the casual wards.

2106. Are you speaking now of the South of England or of England generally ; do you know the North of England at all ?—No, I never was in the North ; I have lived in Northamptonshire and the Eastern Counties, and Kent and Essex.

2107. Surrey and Sussex ?—Not Surrey, sir ; I have only been in Sussex since I have been at Cuckfield.

2108. I mean when you are giving us this account, that there is a considerable number of casual wards which require looking after, you are speaking of the counties in which you have resided ?—Yes, sir.

2110. I mean, if it is carried out in its entirety ?—Yes, I am of opinion that there should be more uniformity with respect to the treatment of vagrants ; that the task of work should be irksome and troublesome, and not skilled labour ; that workhouse masters should have absolute discretion to act in every case as circumstances may require ; that much good is done where there is co-operation between the masters and the police authorities ; that there should be more uniformity with the magistrates in dealing with those who do not conform to the rules and regulations of the Casual Poor Act, and who set the authority of the workhouse officials at defiance.

2111. As to the co-operation of the police : have you got that ?—Yes, sir ; very materially so.

2112. You have found the advantage of it ?—Both with respect to the chief constable of the eastern division of the county, and also the superintendent of Hayward's Heath, and the police constables under him. We have two police constables in Cuckfield ; very often one of them walks round in the morning when the vagrants are being discharged ; and sees that they go away and do not loiter about ; and they sometimes come up of an evening.

2113. Do the police near you act as assistant relieving officers ?—No, sir ; the tramp has simply to come to the casual ward and make his application to the labour master.

2114. But if there were a general system of the police acting in cordial co-operation with the poor law authorities, you think it would be very beneficial ?—Very beneficial indeed. I may say, too, that I noticed in the paper the other day that the chief constable of one county had given orders that his police were not to go and apprehend the casuals. That is not the case at Cuckfield ; we simply say to the police, " I have a man who refuses to work," and the policeman comes down and takes the case, and we get a telegram to say when the case will come on at Hayward's Heath.

2115. The tramp leaves your workhouse having had breakfast. Is any sort of provision made in regard to a mid-day meal ; is he allowed to take anything with him ?—We should not object to his taking part of his bread if he had not eaten it.

2116. If he chooses to take half or a third of his bread away, he can do so ?—Yes. I was only speaking to a gentleman the other day who keeps fowls, and he told me that his fowls were kept by the bread thrown over his wall by the casuals leaving our house.

2117. There is, as you know, no legal provision made for a mid-day meal ?—No legal provision.

2118. I think, from what you have said, that you are of opinion that something of that sort would be advisable ?—If it could be made universal ; there must be uniformity in everything.

2119. I am speaking of a general provision in all cases ?—Yes, sir.

2120. You are in favour of dividing vagrants into certain classes ?—Yes.

2121. Take first those who can, but will not work ?—Our idea is that if we could have colonies something similar to the one at Hadleigh, it would be of great advantage in stopping persons from tramping about the country. If they will not work put them into a colony, and give them every facility in order to better their position, to raise themselves, if they will ; if they will not, keep them there.

2122. (Captain Showers.) You mean a penal colony ?—Yes, sir.

2123. To which a magistrate may order a man to be sent for a year ?—Yes.

2124. (Chairman.) Have you had any experience of those colonies ?—No, sir ; only from hearsay.

2125. No doubt you have read of the foreign ones ?—Yes, sir.

2126. I take it that you would advise that something of that sort should be tried ?—We strongly advise that, sir.

2127. Is that the opinion of your association ?—Yes, sir.

2128. Pretty unanimous, is it ?—Well, it was the unanimous opinion of the committee on Saturday, and we were a pretty representative committee ; we were appointed by the whole body.

2129. You would divide the vagrants, as I think we have had them divided in this committee before, into three categories : those who can and will not work ; those who would work if they could get employment ; and, finally, those who are incapable of work ?—Yes. With regard to the second class, that is, those who would work if they could get it, that only opens up the labour question again—a very wide one that is. As to the last class, I think some provision should be made to take them off the road if they are proved to be habitually tramping.

2130. In what way would you attempt to assist the men who are willing to work ?—Well, I read that at Bury St. Edmunds the town council are to open a roll there of names of those willing to work to see if they can possibly find work for them ; but if there are some who would not work if they could get it, would it not be possible to have a kind of colony for them, not a penal one, but one in which it might be found out if they would work ?

2131. Do you think it would be advisable to have information given generally, either at the police stations or at the workhouses, as to where work is obtainable ?—Yes, sir. Now, for instance, at our place in the busy season, hay making or harvest time, some of the farmers send round to me to know if I have one or two men they could set to hay making or threshing, as they do not get enough hands ; but I am sorry to say that if I send any men, five out of six do not get there, and those that do go only do an hour's work and then go away. It is very seldom you get a man to go and take up three or four days' work.

2132. At any rate they get the chance ?—Certainly.

2133. Can you tell us what your idea is of the proportion of honest men who are on the tramp and want to get work, compared with the total number of vagrants?—Well, my information for 1903 gives not quite $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; but the general opinion of all workhouse masters is that it is under 3 per cent.

2134. That it is under 3 per cent.?—Yes.

2135. Do you not find that large works attract vagrants?—Even casuals who do not want any work will flock to the place where any new scheme is being started, or any new work going on. For instance, we are going to have new sewage works at Hayward's Heath; they have not yet commenced. I have had several men pass through my casual wards, who said they had come to see if the work was begun at Hayward's Heath. I think I had four; but not one of the four, if I had been clerk of the works or foreman, would I have put on to the works at all.

2136. I suppose you find, what we have been told of elsewhere, that a certain number of tramps go to trade on the honest men that do go to work?—That is it. But one of the suggestions is whether this Committee, in their recommendations, could not recommend that in future, where large works are to be started, the authorities who are responsible for those works, either the council or whoever they may be, or the contractors, should not be required to provide accommodation for their workmen that flock to that place; because it is well known that in several places where large works have been started, even the men who honestly go to work will go to the casual wards the first few nights in order to get the night's lodging for nothing, or because they cannot get it elsewhere.

2137. I am afraid that at present there is no provision in the English law by which you could enforce that?—No, sir; but it could be a recommendation from this Committee.

2138. Quite so; but, no doubt you are aware that at present there is no provision in law by which you could enforce that?—Oh, I know that.

2139. But it would be advisable if such provision could be made?—Yes.

2140. (Captain Showers.) If these men are really working men and cannot get accommodation elsewhere, could you not lodge them in the casual ward and charge them some little fee?—We could do so, sir, but we are not permitted. I mean the law does not allow us to make a common lodging-house of the wards.

2141. (Chairman.) The man must be destitute in other words?—Yes.

2142. (Captain Showers.) We have heard of cases where they have taken 6d. for the night?—I have done so, sir; but it does not prove that it is legal.

2143. (Mr. Davy.) What is the staff at Cuckfield for dealing with the vagrants?—A labour master and a labour mistress.

2144. They look after the tramps?—Yes.

2145. Who receives the tramps on admission?—The labour master, sir; or, in his absence, one of the other officers.

2146. Does a pauper receive them?—No, sir; not exactly receive them; there are two men there to assist the labour master.

2147. Who receives the women?—The labour mistress.

2148. A paid officer?—Yes.

2149. When a vagrant has been received, what is the next step?—He is bathed.

2150. Is he searched?—Searched and bathed.

2151. Searched and bathed; then he gets his supper?—Yes, sir.

2152. What is the supper?—Bread and water for the men; and bread and tea, or bread and broth, for the women; and gruel of a morning for the women.

2153. Then after supper they go to bed?—Yes, sir.

2154. Do they have separate cells?—We have not sufficient separate cells for all the men; we have eleven, sir.

2155. Are those separate cells warmed?—Yes, sir; hot water pipes go through them.

2156. What is the bedding?—We have hammocks. Mr. J. Howe.

2157. Canvas hammocks?—No, they are made of cocconut matting; they are made in Cuckfield. 17 Jan. 1905.

2158. What covering have they?—They have two rugs.

2159. Is there a bell in each cell?—They have got a bell pull.

2160. So, if a man wants water at night, he can ring the bell?—Yes, there is an old man in a separate room, who can be rung up at any hour.

2161. At what hour do casuals get up in the morning?—At the present time, before seven o'clock.

2162. Then they do their task of work?—Yes, sir.

2163. And get their food in the middle of the day as you have told us?—Bread and cheese.

2164. Then at night?—They have bread and water for supper.

2165. And when are they discharged next morning?—At the present time about eight o'clock; after they have had breakfast.

2166. It is your duty, I suppose, to see that the cells are well warmed?—Yes.

2167. Well lighted and ventilated?—Yes.

2168. Kept clean?—Yes. I can vouch that each cell is well warmed, because I have often made my labour master put a thermometer in to see how hot they were.

2169. You have told us you know some very bad wards?—Yes, sir.

2170. The same class of wards that you have at Cuckfield are, I think, in every union in Sussex with the exception of one?—Yes, I think so.

2171. You have told us that you set 33 per cent. only of the casuals to stone crushing?—Yes, sir.

2172. The rest do the same sort of work that was in force before you introduced stone crushing?—No; one of the tasks used to be picking oakum. I do not set any one to pick oakum now.

2173. So that your decrease in vagrants is due partly to your setting 33 per cent. of your men to stone crushing?—Yes, sir; and more strictly carrying out the Local Government Board Order. We keep them two nights now instead of one.

2174. And with that, your men have decreased from 10,600 to 1,760?—Yes, sir.

2175. In ten years your women have decreased from 1,534 to 358?—Yes, sir.

2176. The children have decreased from 993 to 72?—Yes; but there has been a little increase this last year.

2177. So that putting 33 per cent. of the male tramps on a certain task and observing the Local Government Board regulations has resulted not only in the decrease of the men, but in the enormous decrease of the children from 993 to 72?—With regard to the decrease in the women and children, I attribute that partly to our seeing that the children are properly cared for, and to our informing the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children if they are not. That is always done.

2178. So that they avoid your workhouse?—Yes; because they know the consequence if they do not.

2179. Have you formed any idea as to where these tramps have gone, who used to come to you and do not come to you now?—Possibly some of them have gone to seek "fresh fields and pastures new."

2180. Have you received any complaints from neighbouring unions that you are forcing tramps on to them?—Oh, yes, I have.

2181. Have you received any recently?—Only from the masters who say, "the way you carry on your stone pounding tends to make the numbers increase in our houses." I have not heard that officially of course.

2182. Do you think there is anything in it?—Not so much as they say.

2183. The stone pounding is now introduced pretty uniformly, is it not, all over the county?—I believe so, sir.

Mr. J. Howe. 2184. Is not stone pounding a purely unskilled operation?—Oh, yes, anybody can do it.

17 Jan. 1905. 2185. A woman can do it?—Yes; but still it would be rather hard work for a woman.

2186. Still it can be done?—It can be done.

2187. The boulder once broken, the work is comparatively easy, is it not?—Yes. All you have to do is to break it. I may say where the stone pounding is done, they do not in every case break them to the size that we do.

2188. Do you receive any complaints of sore hands?—Very few, if any.

2189. What do you do then?—If a man has got a sore hand, I take him off the work.

2190. You have seen those stone crushers with wooden handles?—I cannot say I have.

2191. What do you do with the broken produce?—Sell it.

2192. For what purpose would it be used?—We sell some of it for cutting stone. They use it as grit. It is beautiful stuff for that. Some we sell for chicken feeding.

2193. Do you break any to a size suitable for making paths?—We use some for paths. We have had our front yards covered with this stuff.

2194. Do you sell any for making concrete?—Yes.

2195. Who buys that?—The builders and some private individuals.

2196. There should be a considerable sale for it?—I should say so.

2197. You attribute the decrease of vagrants mainly to the strict carrying out of the regulations of the Local Government Board, and the introduction of a proper task; but you admit, I suppose, that a great proportion of the decrease is due to the action of the magistrates?—Yes.

2198. They support you?—Yes.

2199. You have an absolutely uniform sentence?—Yes, it is absurd to go before a magistrate and get a casual sentenced to two or three days' imprisonment; they simply laugh at you; the day he is committed counts as one day; the day he comes out counts as another; and if he is sentenced to three days' imprisonment, he is really only one day in prison.

2200. Put it at seven days: what then?—He is only there five.

2201. Which gives him a rest?—Only four days really; the day coming in; the day going out; and they only count six days to the week.

2202. What number of men did you actually charge before the magistrates last year?—Forty-eight.

2203. Now for the year ending Christmas, 1904, you relieved how many casuals?—2,198.

2204. How many did you charge for refusing to work?—Twenty-two. There were twenty-six prosecutions altogether during the year. Four were prosecuted for other offences.

2205. Twenty-two were prosecuted for refusing to do work?—Out of 2,198, sir.

2206. They were convicted and sentenced to twenty-eight days?—Yes.

2207. As to the other offences?—Two were convicted for wilful damage, one getting twenty-eight days and the other twenty-one. And two were convicted for destroying clothing, one getting fourteen and the other twenty-eight days.

2208. Nobody that you charged escaped conviction?—No, sir.

2209. Supposing a man says that he cannot do the work, as he is too ill—what do you do?—Send for the doctor. No man who says he is incapable of doing the work is had up before the magistrate unless we have the medical officer's certificate.

2210. You always take the doctor's opinion?—Yes; we never fail. We never take a man before the magistrates, who alleges that he is unable to do the work through any physical defect, unless we get the certificate of our medical officer.

2211. Your medical officer is an eminent physician, is he not?—He is an M.D. of London.

2212. Do you in every case, where you take proceedings for refusal to do work, ask for his opinion?—Not in every case; only when the man says he is unable to do it.

2213. You give him the option?—Yes, and when the doctor comes to see a man he examines him in every department, and if he says "I do not see any reason why he should not do the work," I turn to the man and say, "You have heard the doctor's opinion; are you going to do it, or are you not?" He has the option. If it is midday, I say, "Well, I will not be too hard on you; I will give you half the task." If a man says he will try to do it, I will let him go and do it. If he flatly refuses to do it, I get the doctor to give me a written certificate, and the man is charged.

2214. Supposing a man absolutely refuses to do any work at all—do you ever send for your medical officer?—Yes, if he pleads that he is incapable of doing it. Now for instance, yesterday, I did not send for the medical officer for a man who said that he was perfectly well, but that he would not do his work.

2215. A man may say "I am not well enough to do that task"?—I am not a doctor. I send for the doctor and let him certify.

2216. Or he may say, "I will not do any task"?—If a man says he will not do any task, I do not send for the doctor.

2217. Do you ever get the case of a casual who says, "I will not be examined by a doctor"?—Oh, yes, I have had cases like that.

2218. And he goes up for twenty-eight days or longer?—Yes.

2219. Do the police at Cuckfield visit your casual wards?—Yes.

2220. Just look in to see if they want anybody who is there?—Yes; the superintendent wishes them to do it as part of their duty, and there is no doubt that in that case it prevents some people from coming to our house; it acts as a preventive.

2221. Now, let me ask you a question or two about the food. You have told us that the food taken away from workhouses is very often thrown away?—Very often, sir.

2222. Do you consider vagrants to be an underfed class?—No, sir; look at the quantity of food you find on them when they come in of an evening.

2223. What do you do with that food?—We take it away from them at first, and give it to them when they go out again.

2224. Even the meat?—Yes.

2225. Do you ever allow them to consume any of the food that they bring into the workhouse?—I do not recollect any permission given except yesterday morning. A man who was breaking stones, and doing his work fairly well, said to me, "I beg your pardon, sir; it is an awfully cold morning; I have a piece of pork in my parcel; I could not eat it last night; may I have it to eat now?" I was not inhuman enough to say he should not; it was very cold yesterday morning.

2226. Usually you keep them to the prescribed diet?—Yes.

2227. Do you often find men coming in pretty full of liquor?—Very often, sir.

2228. Suggesting that they have spent their last sixpence in having a drink?—I have overheard men in Cuckfield say they are going to spend their last money, and give the master a wake up at 11 o'clock at night. I have occasionally gone down myself and turned them out, or would not let them come in. They can walk right up to our front door, as our front gate will not lock.

2229. If a man had sixpence is there any place in Cuckfield where he could sleep?—I do not think there is any place where he could sleep, unless he were a very respectable man.

2230. There are no common lodging-houses at Cuckfield?—No; nor at Hayward's Heath.

2231. And you think that fact increases the numbers in the casual wards?—I am sure it does.

2232. Are you aware that the guardians of a neighbouring union to yours use the workhouse as a common lodging-house?—Yes, I have heard of it sir.

2233. For sixpence?—There is no doubt in my mind that if our guardians were to wish me to do that, and I was bound to do it, I could get plenty of applicants, because our casual wards are very good ones, and a man would rather come there and give sixpence, if he were allowed to go away next morning, than he would sleep out.

2234. You have told us that, in your opinion, the proportion of honest wayfarers in search of work is about 1½ per cent.?—That was my experience in this particular year, sir.

2235. And you formed that opinion from talking to the men?—Yes.

2236. I mean it is a carefully formed opinion?—Yes.

2237. You are aware there are several people in your parish who would always be willing to give a man a job?—Oh, yes, if he would work.

2238. They cannot get them?—No. On several occasions I have sent men down, but I never knew them to keep to the work. One morning I sent a man five or six of the casuals, but only two or three turned up, and then they did not work. They worked for half a day, and when they got 2s. 6d. or 3s. he did not see them any more.

2239. Did you not make the reforms in the way of dealing with tramps on account of the complaints of begging in the streets?—Yes.

2240. It was very bad at one time?—It used to be very bad in our district.

2241. You knew of scores of cottagers being disturbed in their homes?—Yes, I knew it for a fact. Naturally if we decrease the tramps from 12,000, or nearly 13,000, in one year to a little over 2,000, there is a less number of people perambulating our neighbourhood, and there is the less likelihood of cottagers or anybody else being disturbed during the day.

2242. In your opinion it is a great benefit to the community at large?—It is an undoubted fact; the magistrates and also the police will tell you so.

2243. Everybody appreciates it?—Yes.

2244. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you find that the opinion of the other members of your association on these subjects is much the same as yours?—I am voicing to-day not only my own opinion but the opinion of my confrères.

2245. And it is that the proportion of inmates of casual wards, who are really honest working men going from one place to another, is so small that they have to be treated altogether exceptionally?—Yes.

2246. With regard to the way-ticket system, would you be prepared to let the holder of a way-ticket go out of the ward next morning without a task?—I should, sir, if it were made universal. I think they ought to if they are honest working men; every facility should be given to a man if he is willing to work.

2247. I did not quite gather what exactly is the advantage of stone pounding over stone breaking; I suppose you had stone breaking before you brought in stone pounding?—No, we never had stone breaking.

2248. Do you consider that you get a better sale for pounded stone than you do for broken stone?—Oh, no, I should think we could sell broken stone just as easily as we could sell pounded stone. We should require a greater quantity to be done, but I do not think it is such a preventive task of work as stone pounding.

2249. You consider it a good kind of work from the point of view that the men dislike it more?—Yes. We introduced it more as a preventive than as a remunerative scheme.

2250. (Mr. Davy.) Is not the main advantage of stone pounding that it is absolutely unskilled?—That is so.

2251. Anybody can do it?—Yes.

2253. And therefore the biggest blackguard, who has Mr. J. Howe. served his apprenticeship in the gaol and workhouse, does his work easiest?—Yes. 17 Jan. 1905.

2254. Whereas in stone pounding they all start pretty level?—Yes.

2256. Do I understand you really attribute the decrease in the number of women and children, especially children, who receive relief, to the fact that if children are treated cruelly, you report them to the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children?—Yes, I think half of it might be attributed to that. At the same time I think with the great reduction in men naturally would follow a great reduction in women as well; and with the reduction in women naturally there must be a great reduction in children. It is very seldom that children come alone.

2257. Do you know what is the result of these prosecutions of tramp children; do you hear of their being sent to industrial schools?—I have done so, sir.

2258. Even if they are with their parents, but if they are not being treated properly, will the magistrates send them to an industrial school?—If their parents are treating them improperly.

2259. If their parents are not treating them properly the magistrates will send them to an industrial school?—Oh, yes. I might mention here that if I do by chance get a child admitted into my casual ward by himself or herself under the age of sixteen, I never allow him to depart until I make every inquiry as to where he comes from, or who he is. In that way I have been the means of sending children back to their own homes. Of course, we know that sometimes boys run away for all sorts of excuses and ideas. I never allow a child under sixteen to depart from my casual ward, until I have kept him sufficiently long to make every inquiry about him.

2260. (Sir William Chance.) You find you have sufficient accommodation now in your workhouse for all the casuals that like to come?—Oh, yes; one ward we have not used for years; it is an associated ward which could hold ten.

2261. What is the period of the year in which you have most vagrants coming to you?—In the winter time.

2262. What part of the winter particularly?—Well, all the winter, I should say.

2263. And when have you least?—During the summer months.

2264. The late summer?—Yes, sir. For instance last quarter I had 711; in the Michaelmas quarter I only had 578.

2265. That is the time of year when there are least vagrants?—Yes.

2266. There is more doing, I suppose?—There is more doing. I could give you statistics for any time.

2267. How long have you been going on with the existing system of co-operating with the police?—For some years.

2268. Ten years?—Yes, about that.

2269. You did not begin to co-operate with the police previously to introducing the stone pounding?—No, probably not.

2270. As to the communications with the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, when did you start that?—I think it is about eight or nine years ago, sir.

2271. So that it is since you established the system of stone pounding that you began this?—No, it is not so long ago as that. This is a resolution passed by my board in 1899: "Resolved that the master be empowered, in the case of a vagrant parent leaving the casual wards with a child or children, to communicate, by telegraph or otherwise, as he thinks fit, to the nearest inspector of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children."

2272. Having regard to the fact that you introduced this system of co-operation with the police, and also with the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, subsequently to your introduction of stone pounding, would you not attribute some of the decrease in vagrancy to that?—Oh, yes, I do not attribute the whole of my decrease to stone pounding.

Mr. J. Howe. 2273. So I understand ?—But of course the greater part of the decrease would be attributable to that.

17 Jan. 1905. 2274. In regard to the men ?—Yes, the stone pounding.

2275. And that would reduce the number of women and children to a certain extent ?—Yes.

2276. You have made some reference, in the statement you have submitted, to the question of the children. You say: "It is a question whether it would not in time tend to diminish very materially the number of casuals, if the State could see its way to get an Act passed to take away the children from those who continually tramp the country, as it is an undoubted fact that the great majority of these children eventually help to swell the number of vagrants, as a roving life is naturally instilled into them." Could you explain what is in your mind now, with regard to making the law a little more stringent in regard to the children of vagrants ?—Well, it is not only my own idea, but it is the idea of the workhouse masters generally.

2277. That is what I want to get at ?—If it were possible that a law could be passed that the children should be taken off the road if found continually tramping, it would naturally tend to diminish the number of casuals in time, because the children are constantly travelling about the country, and once they get on the road they receive no education, except in every kind of vice. If they are female children, the people they are with are very often not their own parents; sometimes they are, but more often they are not. Very often they are with their mother, but the man is not the woman's husband, even though he is the father of the children. We know cases where the parent has subsisted partly or benefited by the daughter's prostitution; secondly, we know that the females in the great majority of cases become mothers; and the children are carried about the country, tramping about from one part to another. They must naturally swell the number of vagrants. It is a floating population still increasing.

2278. You are aware there was an Act passed in 1866 called the Industrial Schools Act, which has this provision: "Any person may bring before two justices, or a magistrate, any child apparently under the age of fourteen years that comes within any of the following descriptions." And one of the descriptions is "found wandering and not having any home or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence" ?—Yes, sir.

2279. Now, is that Act used very much in regard to these children ?—I do not know of any cases in our neighbourhood where it has been used, sir.

2280. It has not been used ?—No.

2281. Therefore you consider it does not entirely meet the case of these children ?—Oh, no, sir; not by a long, long way.

2282. What is the conclusion that the Association of Workhouse Masters have come to on this question; in what way do you want to strengthen the Act of 1866; do you want to extend that Act or do you want a new Act ?—I should say they want a new Act to empower the proper authority to educate the children so that they will not go continually tramping about the country. It would naturally have to be a State affair, because it would not be fair to put it upon the rates of one single area. And we are of opinion that if that could be done, in the course of time that class of tramp would become deleted from the road altogether.

2283. You are aware that Bills have been introduced lately to deal with those children ?—Yes.

2284. On poor law lines ?—Yes.

2285. Have you studied any of these Bills ?—No, I cannot say that I have.

2286. Anyway, I take it from you that you do not consider the present law strong enough ?—No, sir, I do not.

2287. Do you keep your vagrants over Sunday ?—Yes, very often, sir.

2288. Do you ever let them go on Sunday ?—Sometimes.

2289. For what reason ?—If we happen to be a little overcrowded, for instance; we have not much accommodation for women. Or if a man wanted to go, to get on the road. But we nearly always keep them over Sunday.

2290. And you would approve of it being the rule that these vagrants should be kept over the Sunday ?—Yes, not allowed to go out on that day, if it could be avoided.

2291. Why ?—One particular reason is that they are a nuisance to the inhabitants in the particular neighbourhood.

2292. Do they beg more on Sundays ?—I do not know that they beg more, but there are more people about on a Sunday; therefore they must become a great nuisance to them.

2293. You think there might be more chance of their picking up something on Sunday than on any other day, owing to the people going to church, and being in a charitable frame of mind ?—It might be that.

2294. As to the success of labour colonies, have you formed any opinion on the subject ?—We were discussing the question on Saturday with special reference to Hadleigh colony, and one gentleman, who seemed to understand a good deal about it, said it was the best he had heard of. There were greater facilities for a man to raise himself up.

2295. Which colony was that ?—Hadleigh. If a man goes there he starts on a new line of life; he has something in front of him there. He knows that if he goes on conducting himself well and doing his work properly, he will go from one grade to another.

2296. You have had no facts put before you to show whether those labour colonies are successful in redeeming these men ?—I have not.

2297. Is it surprising to you to hear that the labour colonies abroad are not successful ?—It is not surprising at all, sir. Probably if it is to be suggested that labour colonies should be established here, they must be established on different principles to the previous ones.

2298. Is it your opinion that it is desirable that the care of vagrants should remain under boards of guardians, as at present ?—No, sir.

2299. Or should it be transferred to the police entirely ?—Our opinion is that it should be taken away entirely from the workhouses. It should be under the Home Office.

2300. It should be under the Home Office ?—Yes; or the police.

2301. Will you tell us your reasons for that, or the reasons of your association ?—We believe they will be better dealt with in every respect. A man naturally would not care to be under the police.

2302. You think it would have the tendency to make the life of vagrancy not quite so inviting as it is at present ?—That is it, sir. We workhouse masters do not think we ought to be troubled with them.

2303. I was putting it on higher grounds, but you do go further than that ?—Oh, yes; we are of opinion that it should be taken away from the workhouses altogether.

2304. Quite apart from the question of trouble ?—Quite apart from that.

2305. (Mr. Simpson.) Would not that very much increase the expense; is it not the case now that the officials of the workhouse can also look after the casual ward, whereas if the casual ward is a separate institution altogether, you would require a separate staff ?—That might be, sir; but I do not consider it is a question of expense at all; it is a question of how to treat them; it should not go into the question of expense.

2306. (Mr. Davy.) I suppose you would advocate that this expense should fall not on the rates, but on the taxes; and there should be a central administration ?—Yes.

2307. (Sir William Chance.) I thought you had a higher motive than that ?—Yes, I have.

2308. I want to get that out ?—Perhaps I might state briefly, that the general idea of our association and of workhouse masters is that there should be with regard to tramps—if they are to remain under the jurisdiction of the workhouse—uniformity of diet and uniformity in task of work. It is no use giving stone breaking and stone pounding in one county, and something of a more easy task in another county. Tramps naturally seek the places where they are treated best. Then the police should be requested in every county to co-operate with the officials with respect to the treatment of casuals, and also to help the officers in keeping order. If they co-operate with the workhouse officials, in our opinion it is a great preventive of so many coming, because naturally the man will keep on tramping about the country; but if he knows he is to be seen by the police at pretty well every workhouse that he goes to, it will have a tendency to keep him away. Then as far as possible we should like to see uniformity of sentences by the magistrates; because it is not only unfair, but it is not conducive to the prevention of casuals if a man knows he is going to get twenty-eight days in one district; in another three; in another five; and in another seven; or perhaps get dismissed. And we also suggest, as I have previously said, that it might go as a suggestion to the Local Government Board that they should issue an order that casuals should be inspected periodically by the medical officer of the workhouse, because that would naturally be a preventive of disease. For instance, I can only quote two cases where we have had small pox in our workhouse which was not introduced by casuals through the casual ward. Although a labour master may be very cute, and to the best of his ability examines every vagrant, it does not follow that he can spot everything the same as a medical man would. Perhaps it might be said, medical men would have to be paid for that, and they would not care about the work being imposed upon them at certain times. At the same time bear this in mind, that the tramp would be got ready for the medical officer coming up at 8 o'clock at night, and we could then even say, "In my opinion, doctor, these five or six are all right, but just see this one or that one," and so forth. I mean, it is a suggestion thrown out by the Workhouse Masters' Association, that we want you to entertain if you will.

2309. (Dr. Downes.) You are aware that the Local Government Board have recommended medical examinations of casuals in times of prevalence of small pox?—Yes; we have it done at our place.

2310. It is done at some places?—Yes, but we say, "Go further than that: have it done periodically and on a certain night; have all casuals in casual wards inspected on a certain night."

2311. Have it simultaneously at all wards on a particular date?—Yes, that is what we suggest.

2312. Do you suggest it weekly or fortnightly?—If you did it fortnightly—that would be during the time of infection in most diseases—you would catch them.

2313. Now, with regard to your introduction of stone pounding, did you make any alteration of diet at that time?—No.

2314. The same diet continued that you had before?—Yes.

2315. So that would not account for the decrease of vagrants; it has not been due to an alteration of diet?—No.

2316. Have you at any time altered the diet of the children in consequence of the regulations of the Local Government Board?—We give them milk.

2317. That is new?—Yes; we keep strictly to the diet.

2318. And I understand that has not increased the numbers of children?—No, sir.

2319. You have told us that the numbers of women and children have in fact decreased?—Yes.

2320. What task of work do you give to the women?—Well, they mostly do cleaning, and, when we have been shorthanded, they have gone down to the laundry and done washing.

2321. There has been no change in the character of work given to women in your place?—No, sir.

2322. So the decrease is rather due to other causes than the actual task of work?—There has been no alteration in the task of work for women.

2323. Do you not think that the decrease is partly due to the fact that these women are more associated with the class of men that you have deterred from coming to you?—To a certain extent.

2324. And you think it is also due to your system of communication with the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children?—Yes, sir.

2325. With regard to the stone pounding, do you help the men to empty the mortar as they go on?—No, they empty it themselves. They have to sift it; they are Mr. J. Howe. provided with a sieve.

2326. And how much stone does a man take at a time to break?—As a rule only about one or two flints. 17 Jan. 1905.

2327. He breaks them, and then gets rid of the stuff?—Yes.

2328. So he does not go on filling up his mortar?—No; he could not break the stone if he did that.

2329. It would be too dead?—Yes. In course of time the rammer wears a hole through the bottom of the mortar, which is solid iron, and this has to be renewed.

2330. Have you had any difficulty with the men putting the stuff through the mesh; do they refuse to do that?—No, sir.

2331. Have you had men refuse to put the stuff through the mesh on the ground that it is not part of the prescribed task?—I have heard of such cases, but not with us. One thing that they will try to do is to get the wires further apart so that a larger stone will go through. We have to guard against that as best we can.

2332. I think you told us you prosecuted twenty-two men in a given time for refusing to do their work?—During last year.

2333. What do you do with a man who does not complete his task of work?—Well, if I consider that he is unfit to do his task, and has only done a half, a third, or even a quarter, but has tried to do the task and found it impossible, I should not prosecute him. If I found that he had been trying to do the task, I should not prosecute him.

2334. You use a liberal discretion in the case of a man trying to do his work?—Yes.

2335. When you speak of stone pounding being a greater deterrent than stone breaking, I take it that you mean to the expert; one man may be able to break stone very easily, and he would rather break stone than pound stone?—Yes, sir.

2336. But take the case of the novice who cannot break stone, which would he choose now; stone breaking or stone pounding?—That I cannot say.

2337. Which would be the easiest?—I should say stone pounding. We do not give them the alternative to pound stone or break stone; stone pounding is our task.

2338. You have had experience of stone breaking and stone pounding?—Yes.

2339. Your association is representative of the whole country, is it not?—Yes.

2340. You have said that they considered uniformity of task an important point?—We would like to see everywhere uniformity.

2341. When they say uniformity of task, I take it we must provide for the feeble as well as for the muscular?—Yes, the same as we do. We do not put them all to stone pounding.

2342. Therefore, you contemplate such uniformity of work as would provide for all classes; you do not mean that they should all be put to stone pounding?—Oh, no. I had a man in my labour yard last Saturday and Sunday; a very respectable man. He had worn his shoes clean through; he had no shirt and no waistcoat. He said he had been in the Boer war, and had a wound in his groin. The poor fellow had had nothing to eat for the last few days, and he had come into the casual ward as he was incapable of getting any work. I gave him an old pair of boots, a waistcoat and a shirt, and let him go without doing any work.

2343. I think you have told us that if a man refuses to do his work on the ground that he is unable to do it, you always send for the doctor?—Never miss, sir.

2344. Supposing he refuses to do his work and says nothing about inability, in that case I understood you to say you do not send for the doctor?—No.

2345. Have you had a man raise that defence when he has appeared before the magistrate?—I always ask a man before I prosecute him: "Why do you refuse to work?" If he says he is incapable of doing it, I ask him in what way. He may reply that he is physically incapable, or that he has heart disease, or that he has a bad arm, or that he has one eye out, or something of that

Mr. J. Howe. kind. If I consider he ought to do it, I send for the medical officer, and I always ask every man before I prosecute him, if he does not work: "Now do you plead that you are physically unable to do it, or not? If you say you are unable to do it, I will send for the doctor. But it is no use your saying that when you get down before the magistrates."

17 Jan. 1905.

2346. You recognise the importance of having inspection by the medical officer when a man says he is incapable?—Oh, yes; that is one reason why we get a conviction, because the magistrates know full well the man might have seen the doctor, if he had pleaded he was physically unable to do the task.

2347. Do you find that the beggars that come to your casual ward are to a large extent the same people year after year?—Very often, sir.

2348. Do they come on a definite circuit, or do they go aimlessly?—Well, there are some of them that take circuits.

2349. Your association suggests that it is a point to consider that an Act should be passed to take away the children from the habitual tramps?—Yes.

2350. What would you do with the parents or the persons with whom the children were travelling?—Well, if they were capable of working and would not work, it is a question whether, if a labour colony is inaugurated, they should not be sent there.

2351. Otherwise, they might return to you with fresh children?—Yes.

2352. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Have you ever had a case of a man refusing to be examined by the doctor, and then, when the case comes before the magistrates, saying his refusal to work was due to his health?—I have had several cases.

2353. Did the magistrates send to see the doctor?—No, I told the magistrates that the man did not want to see our medical officer.

2354. Of those twenty-two men who were prosecuted in that year you were speaking of, did any of them come back to your workhouse afterwards?—Some of them, but we do not often get them a second time—not after they get twenty-eight days. I had one a fortnight ago.

2355. You told us at the beginning that was very exceptional?—Yes. A fortnight ago I had a man who would not do the work, and said he did not intend to do it. He said if he were sent to prison, he would have so many ounces of bread, so many ounces of suet-pudding, and so much gruel. He could enumerate the whole of the articles, in fact, he would have for three weeks. We know they get better diet in the prison than in the casual ward.

2356. Of course, because they are there longer. With regard to uniformity of work, is there any other stone besides flints, which can be put to remunerative use when it is pounded?—I do not see why granite should not. Of course, flints are preferable, but there are places where you could not get flints.

2357. Is it not a difficulty in securing uniformity of work, that in certain neighbourhoods you cannot get the same raw material as in others?—It might be.

2358. You get stones on the shore at Shoreham, but they would not be available for a workhouse in the Midlands?—No, I know that. For one workhouse in Sussex they do not get the stone from Shoreham; they take flints off the land.

2359. Flint is the best stone?—Yes.

2360. Flint is valuable in most places is it not?—In most places, I should think. If you had granite you could not sell it for chicken feeding or stone cutting; they want flint.

2361. (Captain Showers.) You say that the police visiting the workhouse when the men are going out has a good effect?—Quite so; it is natural; it clears them away from the neighbourhood.

2362. Do you allow the police to go into the casual wards in the evening to see the men?—They ask permission of the labour master.

2363. You think their going in has a good effect?—Undoubtedly.

2364. I think you told us that you have a woman for the reception of females?—Yes, sir.

2366. Do you not think that a man after tramping, say four weeks without being able to get work becomes so impoverished in his body and strength from the casual ward diet, that he is liable on that account to fall into the position of a professional tramp?—Yes, sir, but I do not think in my own mind that casuals go without a mid-day meal—at least, very few of them; it is a very rare case.

2367. They get it by begging, you mean?—Yes; they get it by some means or other.

2368. (Chairman.) Generally from the poor?—It is the poor that help the poor.

2369. (Mr. Davy.) What do you do with a man who is slightly ruptured?—Not put him to stone pounding.

2370. Do you put him to anything else?—If he is able to do it.

2371. Do you think a man who is slightly ruptured would be able to weed a garden path?—Yes.

2372. You would let him do what he could?—I would tell my labour master to put him to a certain kind of work.

2373. You would not let him off?—If he is capable of doing a little work, he ought to do it.

2374. If he is capable of walking fourteen miles, he is surely capable of doing a little work?—I always tell my labour master to use his absolute discretion as to giving them stone pounding. There is one thing, gentlemen, I should like to make a remark about, and that is, if it is agreed that we are to retain casuals in workhouses, I must say that I believe that my brother workhouse masters and all officials connected with casual wards do to their utmost carry out their duties in looking after the casuals; and we would impress upon this Committee the advisability of specially mentioning in their Report that for the future absolute authority should be given to the workhouse master to use his discretion in every single individual case. We have acted on this line in the past though we have not had the authority of the Local Government Board.

2375. (Chairman.) With reference to the condition of the man and so forth?—Yes, sir, and as to what he should be set to do.

Mr. E. BURGESS, called; and Examined.

Mr. E. Burgess. 2376. (Chairman.) Mr. Burgess, you are the master of the Sheffield union workhouse?—Yes, sir.

17 Jan. 1905. 2377. How long have you been in office?—At Sheffield four years next April.

2378. And before that?—Six years at Fulham; two years at Leeds previous to that; and two years at Skipton previous to that.

2379. Then the main part of your service has been in Yorkshire?—Yes, sir.

2380. What is the accommodation for the casuals at Sheffield?—Sixty men and twenty women.

2381. Is that the average number?—Our average now is 210 per week, sir.

2382. Have you found during the last year or two a considerable increase?—Between 1895 and 1903 we were about 100 lower. In 1904 we jumped up 2,000.

2383. Have you heard from the men themselves any reason for that?—Well, I think from conversation with the men that there are a good deal more men out on tramp on account of the want of employment; from questions I have put to them, I think there are more bona fide working men now than there were the previous years.

Mr. E.
Burgess.
17 Jan. 1905.

2384. What was the former employment of the men who were out of work?—They are very much assorted. I have taken some lists: grooms, labourers, fitters, blacksmiths, metal polishers, moulders, painters, wire drawers. That seemed to be practically covering all trades, but mostly of the labouring trade.

2385. Not one particular class?—Oh, no, sir.

2386. Then you attribute this larger number to general depression of trade?—Yes; on account of the numbers jumping up this year, and so many strangers passing through our wards, who had not been previously in casual wards.

2387. At the present time is there any improvement in that?—No, sir; our vagrancy is increasing.

2388. What is your opinion as to the percentage of men who come in to you as casuals who are men honestly in search of work?—Well, this year I think there might be 20 per cent; other years I do not think more than 10.

2389. And the others are regular habitual tramps?—Habitual tramps, particularly so in the summer. They go into the workhouse during the winter in different parts: we find they mostly start out again in the finer weather on the road.

2390. I suppose in your house you have no power of making any distinction between the honest tramp and the loafer?—No, sir; it is all on the cellular system, and as far as we can we relieve the man, who we think is not used to tramp wards, of any work and allow him to go first thing after he has had his breakfast. Beyond that we can make no distinction.

2391. You let him go earlier?—If a man will give us some idea that he is looking for work and will tell us of some work in the district that he has come for, and we think he is not a regular hand, then he is allowed to go without doing a task; but if he comes back again we do not take that same course with him; we treat him strictly as a casual.

2392. How do you distinguish the habitual tramp from the others?—Well, generally the habitual knows his way to go through to the bath when the water is ready. The old hand is pretty keen at that. The new hand seems to be lost in the place. The first time he comes to the place he does not know the rules and regulations; and his clothing is often a very good test.

2393. Are not the men's hands very often a good test?—Not often, because a labourer might have a very hard hand and stone breaking would not affect it. The man who is a mechanic might also suffer from the same disability; he might have a very hard hand, which would be no detriment to him as a tramp.

2394. But the man who is doing no work at all?—He generally has a soft hand, unless he is continually getting it cut up with fresh stone breaking. In several casual wards there is oakum picking and wood sawing. Then there are one or two wards where they give them stone breaking, and his hand would break up again.

2395. What is your idea as to the treatment of the habitual tramp; would you keep him in the casual ward?—No, sir. I think the habitual tramp wants taking off the road to get rid of him; he should be compelled to enter a colony or do something so that he would have to provide for his living.

2396. Possibly you are in favour of the experiment of a labour colony?—I think so, sir. I think it is the only remedy. They will not stay in the workhouse because you have no detention for them.

2397. If you have the men in a colony how would you make them work?—The same as we do with the lazy inmate; he must be made to do a certain kind of work, or otherwise he is punished.

2398. What form would that punishment take; how would you compel him to work?—We generally punish the men ourselves if they will not stick to the work, and then they are taken before the magistrate on the second or third occasion.

2399. What is your workhouse punishment?—If a man is able-bodied we at once certify him for our stone-yard, which has no connection with the workhouse; we really have no bona fide able-bodied men in the workhouse. But if he should be in any way damaged and still be able-bodied so far as work is concerned, we put him on corn grinding or stone breaking or wood task. If he is not able to do that, then we put him in what we call our "barrow gang," or "digging gang": digging in different parts of the land, and barrowing, with labour masters in charge, from one part of the estate to the other.

2400. What amount of ground have you?—We stand on 70 acres altogether.

2401. I do not think I have got what the number of your inmates is?—Our inmates average 1,800.

2402. And is your amount of land sufficient for what you want?—No, not altogether; but we are using our land a good deal as tips. We are able to excavate a good deal and bury our ashes and rubbish, and that entails a great deal of wheeling. We also have a farm, which is about two miles away, where eight of the men, in charge of a labour master, go to do farm work.

2403. You have a farm as well?—Yes, a farm, but no one lives there except the farm bailiff. Our men are taken up each morning and they come back at night.

2404. Now, do they do their work fairly well?—No, sir. We find the farm work more as a test for them. They object to being paraded through the streets to go to this farm day by day. Very often when they are sent to the farm they take their discharge. If they come back we may put them on the test work in the house for three or four days, but when we send them to the farm they take their discharge.

2405. Do you think their being sent to the farm has had a deterrent effect?—Oh, it has; they abscond with their clothing rather than have people watching them go backwards and forwards, and jeering at them, saying that they ought to be getting their own living; they will not face the navvies particularly.

2406. (Sir William Chance.) How far is the farm from the workhouse?—Two miles, sir. Of course, we dress them in the strict workhouse clothing.

2407. (Chairman.) Have you any views about admitting the habitual tramp into the workhouse itself?—We admit in sickness only, or in case of any suspected infectious disease.

2408. Now, with regard to infectious diseases, have you found a great number of tramps with infectious diseases at Sheffield?—No, not beyond eczema; that seems most prevalent.

2409. You have never had a smallpox case?—Five in fourteen years. One at Skipton; one at Fulham; and about three at Sheffield.

2410. Did you take the cases in good time?—Well, the tramps are examined nightly by a medical officer, immediately there is any sign of smallpox about in Yorkshire.

2411. Are you strict with regard to the bathing at Sheffield?—Yes, sir; no man goes into the ward without his bath, and we provide him with a clean night-shirt, separate towel, and fresh water.

2412. I take it that the bath is a very good means of detecting disease?—Yes. The attendant who is responsible for the bathing is warned very carefully if he observes the slightest rash not to let the man go forward, but to put him back to the ward room for the medical officer to see him, and his clothes with him.

2413. In that case the bath is a considerable help to detection?—Yes, it is a considerable help.

2414. You also enforce search?—A man is searched in the admittance office and taken forward to the bath-room, his clothes being put outside the bath-room; he is bathed, given a clean shirt and pair of slippers to walk on the flagged floor, and taken to the cells at the far end. If there is any sign of the clothes being wet through the man's tramping about, they are taken to the basement to be aired and dried for him for the morning; and if there is any sign of vermin, they are disinfected.

2415. A man has to strip, and give up his clothes, which is practically equivalent to a search?—Only that many of them stitch up in their clothing anything they wish to keep, so that it is necessary to search. I have found a 5s. piece in the crown of a man's cap, and although we prosecuted him for claiming relief under false pretences, the magistrate discharged him. He had purposely put his 5s. in the top of his cap.

Mr. E.
Burgess.
17 Jan. 1905.

2416. I think you have already said that if you get a man who you believe is bona fide in search of work, you discharge him?—Yes, we are very careful about that. We do not allow too many to get off. We may sometimes stop a bona fide working man because he is off-hand, and we very probably think he is just trying to get the privilege of getting away without doing his work.

2417. Have you considered the way-ticket system at all?—I have no experience whatever of the way-ticket. I have heard of it and read about it—I think in Wiltshire; I have no experience whatever of it.

2418. May I shortly put it to you; a man when he leaves the workhouse in the morning has a ticket handed to him, giving his name and his description, and that ticket entitles him to a meal of bread in the middle of the day, which he obtains by application to the police office, where he is passed on to the nearest baker or grocer. He gets his meal in the middle of the day. That, of course, is to obviate any idea of begging. On that ticket is endorsed his destination. Well, I think you will see that that provides for the honest man who is on his way, and that it is a means of detection for the dishonest man, because, if he does not go on his way, that ticket shows that he is not keeping to his engagement that he entered into when he took the ticket?—It does not allow him to depart from his route. He must go forward.

2419. He must go forward?—Very often they would say they had heard of some work off the road and had gone that way for it.

2420. If the way-ticket is to be of use to him he must stick to his route; on the other hand, it rather exposes his fraud if he obtains the ticket without meaning to go that route. Now, would you be of opinion that some system of that sort would be useful?—I think so. I think it is altogether irregular that a man should be able to take himself to any part of England he likes, without any restriction whatever. There is no check whatever upon where he has slept. We get the truth out of about 20 per cent of the men; they say they have slept at certain places, but that is not true. We have seen them in Sheffield ourselves; in going through the town I have seen the very men standing about the town. At nine o'clock they would come to the workhouse saying they were weary and tired travelling from Barnsley, quite in the opposite direction.

2421. The way-ticket for a man like that would be of importance if he were brought before the magistrates, as showing that his account was a false account?—Yes, the way-ticket is decidedly a check upon them.

2422. To make that efficient it should be universal?—I think so.

2423. You have already said you are in favour of the experiment of a labour colony?—Yes.

2424. You think it would be worth trying?—Yes.

2425. Having had experience of your farm, how would you suggest the farm colony should be conducted?—Well, there would have to be a lot of land more for tilling than we use. We use the plough a good deal on the farm. It was hoped when the farm was first taken that it would be possible to work it by spade labour from the workhouse, but that has not been carried out: it is more a milk farm: the farm colony would be for vegetables.

2426. More spade work?—A lot more spade work. And the necessary planting and gathering of crops, so that each man, whether able-bodied or nearly infirm, but still a tramp, would be able to take some part in it.

2427. How would you deal with a man on a labour colony, who refused to work or was idle?—He would be dealt with the same as an ordinary inmate of a workhouse—sent before the magistrates—and the magistrates, seeing that everything was being done for the man, would be more severe in their punishment.

2428. Quite so. Then the remedy would be that he would be taken before the magistrates and dealt with by them?—Yes, unless you have a penal colony in your own hands; then they could be sent from one part of the colony to another, where they would be under stricter regulations altogether.

2429. You have not yourself seen any of these colonies, have you?—No, sir. I sent some men from Fulham to a colony about eight years ago; six of them, and only one stayed there; the other five came back again at very short periods.

2430. (Mr. Simpson.) Which colony was that?—The Lingfield colony. Mr. Brooks came to see me when he was starting that colony, and these men were picked out by me to go before the guardians to be sent there, to be reported on at three months, but at the end of three months there was only one man; the others had shifted.

2431. (Chairman.) You have had very considerable experience, I believe, of the class of man whom you describe as the "loafer"; now, will you tell us in what way you deal with that man?—Well, we watch him very carefully, sir, from the commencement of his applying for relief. We cannot get very much information, and then only from the relieving officers. They generally go into his antecedents and say he has been living in certain streets, and not able to get any regular employment; or, if he did, for not more than a month. We have generally got to check that to see if he had been working there, and what his wages were, and cross question him as to what had become of the wages. Then we start with a certificate; if he is able-bodied, we make it as hard for him as we can. He is put on corn grinding for a time; if we find he is settling down to that we take him off and set him to stone breaking; then when he is getting on at stone breaking we bring him back again to the corn grinding; keep at him until he begins to think he would be very much better out of the workhouse. Then if he comes back again to see if there is any more consideration to be shown to his laziness, we treat him the same way again; and very many of them, we find, go away.

2432. What is the proportion amongst the men you admit of those who are really willing to work?—Men who would do a day's work without being strictly kept to it?

2433. Yes?—Well, I should not like to say more than two out of a dozen.

2434. You would say as much as that?—I do not think I would be able to take out of a hundred I have seen two in twelve who, if put to a day's work, would keep at it.

2435. (Dr. Downes.) Are you speaking of the casuals or of the able-bodied inmates?—Of the able-bodied workhouse inmates.

2436. (Chairman.) I was speaking of the casuals?—I thought you were speaking of the loafer.

2437. No, a man who is admitted as a casual; what number of those men do you think are men who would be willing to undertake work?—Well, I do not think myself, sir, I could take more than one in twenty that would willingly take work and keep to it. If there was any little upset at all, he would be out of it.

2438. I think that is about the proportion that others have given. Now in regard to tasks, you have spoken of the outdoor work, the spade work, and so on, and also of the stone breaking, and I think you said corn grinding and wood sawing?—Yes.

2439. Have you had any experience of stone pounding?—Well, I had a short experience at Leeds, but we had no outlet for the stuff, and we stopped the work, and went on to the ordinary stone breaking.

2440. You had no sale for your crushed stone?—No, sir. We have a difficulty now even in getting rid of the broken stone—the granite, on account of so many pitchings being put down in Sheffield; they are not using so many macadam roads in the streets. It is much better in the small country unions where they are able to use it on the roads.

2441. We have heard this morning that at Cuckfield they pound stone and sell the crushed stuff for making concrete and the like?—We have not done that at Sheffield, but when I went to Leeds such an amount of it had accumulated that we dropped the work and went to ordinary stone breaking.

*Mr. E.
Burgess.*

17 Jan. 1905.

2442. One virtue of stone pounding is that the non-expert man is as good at it as the expert; whereas in stone breaking, as you know, the expert has a great advantage over the raw hand?—The same effect in the wheel of a corn mill; any man can turn the wheel of a corn mill, whether an expert or not.

2443. Quite so?—And nearly any man can cross-cut with the saw. It is all marked out for them, and they learn to keep to the cut of the saw in a few minutes.

2444. You keep men sawing?—Two men have to cut up ten sleepers into six-inch lengths; that is a good average day's work.

2445. What is that used for?—We send it up to the workhouse to be chopped up by the older men, and others bundle it, and it is used as firewood; but we put the casuals on to sawing wood only.

2446. What does a casual earn for you in the course of three hours' work a day?—He does not earn anything, sir, because we should get that work done with other men, and the firewood is sold practically at the same price as we gave for it.

2447. That you gave for the sleepers?—On account of many of these small firewood men, we cannot put up our price of firewood to make any profit whatever on it; in fact it is rather a loss.

2448. No doubt, you agree with others in saying that large works are very often the occasion of an influx of tramps?—That is so. At Skipton there were some reservoirs being built for the different villages. That was used regularly as an excuse for them coming to Skipton. The tramps used the tunnel that the different railways were making, as an excuse for coming to Leeds. That brought thousands passing through the tramp wards. Whether they had been there for such work or not I could not say; but they had heard of the work. And the laying of the trams was another reason; they said they heard that they were laying tramways in the district.

2449. Is your experience the same as that of others, that the navvies are generally accompanied by tramps, who live upon the navvies when they are at work?—That is so. You get perhaps about one genuine working man with a dozen others following him, who would not be able to do the work if it was given to them.

2450. Have you anything to say about the dietary in casual wards?—We give what we call the ordinary house dietary. We give them rice milk in the morning for their breakfast, and gruel at night for their supper, and bread and cheese for dinner; but we have not adopted the two-night system so much lately as the one-night system. We find that is more objectionable to the tramp.

2451. (Mr. Davy.) Do you get many men refusing to do work?—No, sir; we had thirty-two prosecutions last year.

2452. Out of how many tramps?—Out of 6,000.

2453. You mean 6,000 men, not nights' lodgings?—6,000 men.

2454. How many convictions did you get?—They were all convicted but one, who was discharged.

2455. And what were the sentences?—For refusing to pick oakum, there was a sentence of 14 days; for refusing to break stones, sentences were given as follows:—7 days, 16 days, 16 days, a month, 14 days, 11 days, and 7 days. Many of those sentences, of course, depend on the magistrates that may be sitting. With the local magistrates it would be a month; with the stipendiary it would be 7 days.

2456. That is interesting?—If we find the man is an absolute tramp and a scamp, if we can possibly keep him over Friday we do so, because we know on Saturday morning we shall have the local magistrates.

2457. Those are the borough justices?—Yes, sir; they are men who are large employers of labour of all sorts, and have very little sympathy with the tramp when they get hold of him.

2458. Do you prosecute in each case of refusal to work?—Not in every one. We may perhaps put a man to stone breaking, and he says he is not able to do it; his physical condition is such that he would be unable to get through the work. We send for the doctor to see this man to know if he would be able to do this task, if he were to put his mind to it. Perhaps the doctor says he is not very strong; he is a little bit defective; and we drop that and keep the man for the day, and discharge him the next morning, warning him he will get the stone breaking if he returns.

2459. What sort of examination does the doctor put the man through; is it a careful examination?—Not always. Just asking him if he has any cough, or something of that kind.

2460. Does he strip him?—Not always.

2461. Does he ever strip him?—Yes, sometimes.

2462. You have a resident medical officer?—We have two resident medical officers.

2463. Have you ever had tramps who say they want to go to prison?—Yes, sir; latterly, during these last three years, there has been more disregard of the threat of prosecution on the part of some of them. Especially at the beginning of the winter, they seem as if they would rather like you to prosecute them. But if we can deal with them ourselves, we do so. If we can evade a prosecution by making him do his task, we do not push it too far, as some of our guardians are sympathetic and do not like too many prosecutions.

2464. You do not prosecute, because the tramps like to be prosecuted?—In some cases a man is kept to his task; we make him keep to it all day, but we do not prosecute him if we think he is working. They sometimes bring the prosecutions about themselves, seeing that we are not inclined to prosecute, by smashing the window or the doors.

2465. Then you do prosecute?—If they do some damage to the workhouse, we are bound to.

2466. You do not want to prosecute him; you try not to prosecute him, and then he breaks the window?—Yes.

2467. Then he gets seven days if he comes before the stipendiary?—Yes; if he tells the magistrate a particularly nice tale he may get four days.

2468. Have you ever had a case where a man has been discharged and given a shilling?—I have never heard of one. A man whom we prosecuted for refusing to do stone breaking asked the magistrate to look at his arm, and he showed his arm, which was somewhat wasted. He did not complain of anything before the doctor; he rather courted going before the magistrate. His one arm was somewhat wasted from the wrist. If we had known that, of course, we should not have put him to the stone breaking and insisted upon it.

2469. You do not detain two nights?—Yes, sir; we practically break it up in the year; we have been keeping them two nights for six months; then perhaps we are cleaning the wards, or on account of the smallpox being about, we have discharged them after the one night. But we always exact a task; even if they are only detained one night they are doing the 4 cwt. of stone or 1½ pounds of oakum, or a morning's work at wood sawing, and then they are discharged about 11 o'clock. Well, many of them reason in this way; they say, having worked up to nearly dinner time they ought to be allowed to remain and get their dinner. They know that their ordinary task would be finished about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and they might lounge and laze about until the following morning, and in the meantime they would receive five meals instead of two.

2470. Is not discharging them before they have been kept two nights a violation of the regulations of the Local Government Board?—It is.

2471. You give them the ordinary house diet?—No, sir; we give them what we give for the house; rice milk in the morning, and gruel at night.

2472. And the mid-day meal?—And the mid-day meal is bread and cheese.

2473. Always?—After the second day, soup.

2474. Is that in accordance with the Board's regulations?—Yes, sir, I think so.

2475. What is the size of your farm?—Well, I believe altogether it is 150 acres, sir.

2476. So you have 70 acres of your own and 150 acres of the farm?—We stand on 70 acres; it is not all land to cultivate.

2477. You have a site of, say, 40 acres?—Land under cultivation 32 acres.

- Mr. E. Burgess.*
17 Jan. 1905.
2478. Then you have a farm of 150 acres : that makes 182 acres ?—Yes.
2479. Of your 1,800 inmates, how many are sick ?—We have 400 in hospital; 300 in the infirm wards, and 200 in the asylums; we have a large number of imbeciles there.
2480. That would be 900 ?—Then there would be 700 men and women; women under sixty and over sixty; women with children; men under sixty and over sixty; according to their classifications. The rest—200—would be able-bodied and partly able-bodied. They do not live in the workhouse proper; we have a test house in our own grounds for the able-bodied.
2481. Are they included in the 1,800 ?—Yes.
2482. Do they work on the farm ?—Well, six or eight of the men from the test house are taken to the farm.
2483. Not out of the workhouse proper ?—Yes, six or eight of these men go out of the workhouse together, in charge of a labour master, to the farm two miles away.
2484. Yes; but I think you said they went from the test house ?—The test house is the able-bodied house.
2485. Are the inhabitants of the test house included in the 1,800 ?—Yes.
2486. You have about 200 people in the workhouse and test house who would be suitable for outdoor labour ?—The test house is a misnomer. It is called the test house for 200 men, but out of that there are only 30 who can be put to test; it is a separate building.
2487. What I want to get at is, how many men have you who would be suitable for ordinary outdoor labour ?—There would be about 60 out of the 200.
2488. You say out of 200: I say out of the 1,800 ?—If you take men who are not able to do a hard day's work, but are able to do a small day's work, you might possibly get 100.
2489. About 100 chargeable to the Sheffield union ?—Yes.
2490. There are 150 acres on the farm ?—Yes, sir.
2491. Does not that constitute a farm colony ?—It is not regarded as a farm colony, and it would not unless they were able to have a lot more spade labour for the farm. They use a lot of paid labour and ploughs, while a farm colony would do the work by spade.
2492. Would it not be quite open to work it now by the spade ?—Oh, yes, if the guardians thought fit to do so.
2493. What is the objection to working it by the spade; is it that you lose money by it ?—We lose money now.
2494. If you make it a farm colony, you would lose more ?—Yes, I think so.
2495. When you say you would like a farm colony, do you mean you would like compulsory powers of detention ?—Yes, I would not send a man to a farm colony unless he were detained for a certain period.
2496. Would not one of the differences, between your workhouse and a farm colony, be the power of detention ?—Yes, I am looking to this Committee to recommend that there should be that power.
2497. At such a workhouse as yours with the 180 acres of land to work upon ?—We should have to accommodate them at the workhouse and send them to the farm, because there are certain restrictions on the farm. We could not put up any buildings there to accommodate the men.
2498. What is the difference between the farm colony and a rural workhouse ?—Well, I do not know that I can describe the difference. I have not seen a farm colony, only I take it we do not grow anything like the quantity of vegetables we should do, if we had average land at the farm colony to work. We send out the men as far as we can on tasks; they do not take the land over from us.
2499. Are you suggesting that vegetables would grow better on a farm colony than on a workhouse farm ?—They would grow better on our workhouse farm because we are so near the town. We work our land at the workhouse by the labour we have got. In the summer we have forty of these men; we put down a certain part in wheat, which does not entail labour after the sowing until the reaping of it. A certain amount goes down in turnips and cabbage and other vegetables for the house, but there is only about twelve acres under spade culture. We have a certain number of old men belonging to the house that are on the workhouse land daily.

2500. Would it not be the case that, just at that time when you want most labour on the farm, you would have least labour in the workhouse to give ?—If you were sure that men would be sent there for twelve months there would not be that difficulty.

2501. That is one of the reasons for compulsory detention ?—I think so; besides that being irksome to the tramp himself, on the farm colony he would be kept during the best part of the year. Although a man in the winter likes to be sure of his bed and food, he rather resents being kept there in the summer when the weather is fine and he thinks he ought to be on the road a free and easy man.

2502. You have told us only about 5 per cent. of the tramps would be willing to take work ?—I think so, sir.

2503. Have you formed any judgment as to what percentage of tramps would be fit subjects for a farm colony ?—Well, if they could be made to work, I should think you would get a good 20 per cent. of them that would work seeing that it was unavoidable; they must work or be punished for not working.

2504. (Mr. Simpson.) You quite contemplate in the case of a labour colony the cost, or at all events a considerable part of the cost, being borne by the union ?—Well, I could not say anything on that; I do not know who would have the farm colony under their control, or what rate it should come out of; whether it would be out of the county or out of the union.

2505. Suppose now there was power to pay a certain amount, do you think that, seeing some of your paupers would be sent to another part of the country for the year, the union would be ready to pay ?—I could not answer for what the guardians would do, only I know that some time ago they were willing to send some men to Lingfield or Starnthwaite in Cumberland, but we found very few would go there unless compelled. They do not care to go to work for nothing; they would rather take their discharge and come back when this is over.

2506. Do you know how much they would have to pay for them to go to Lingfield ?—On a scale of 8s. the first month; 6s. the second; and 4s. for the third month. I am only going by memory; I do not exactly know the terms.

2507. What do you suppose is the average age of the people received in the casual ward; are there many over sixty ?—Well, some of the old hands are over sixty. I do not suppose there is more than ten per cent. over sixty. Of course, they look older than they are. A man of fifty would look sixty.

2508. And have you noticed of late years a decrease in the number of women and children received into the casual ward ?—There has been a slight decrease of the women. As compared with 1895, our women are 187 against 225; but there is more a decrease amongst the children.

2510. When the Society prosecutes in the case of people in the tramp wards, what happens to the children; have you heard of them being sent to an industrial school, for instance ?—Well, we have none of our own; we generally advise them, if they do not go to the workhouse, that we will send them to prison the next time; they get an order to go to our workhouse, and their settlements having been ascertained, they are afterwards sent to their own parish. What has become of them after that I cannot say.

2511. That is to say, the action of the Society results in their becoming settled paupers rather than going on the road and trusting to the casual wards ?—That is so.

2512. (Sir William Chance.) Has pauperism generally increased or decreased in Sheffield of late years ?—There has been a decided increase the last two years.

Mr. E.
Burgess.
17 Jan. 1905.

2513. The Sheffield guardians are pretty strict I think with their able-bodied paupers; do they set them to work?—They have very strict rules for able-bodied; an able-bodied man is not allowed to remain in the workhouse. If he is certified for task he is sent to a stone yard. The stone breaking is done for the corporation.

2514. Your vagrancy has increased?—This last year; it went down two years ago and it has gradually risen this last year, and it has gone up to 2,100 this last six months, that is beyond what it was before.

2515. Has there been a falling off in the number of children?—They have gone up again. They were 187 at Michaelmas 1904, and they have increased to 251.

2516. Are there many soldiers, do you think, amongst these vagrants?—In 1902 we took a list of men who had been in the army showing how many years they had been there. I then told the tramp master to ask each man if he had ever been in the army, and how long, and when he had been discharged, and if he had been in receipt of any pension. I have not gone through the numbers, but these sheets I have here take a number of men who said they had been in the army, and in nine cases only we got from them that they had a pension. One who had been in 7 years got 8d. a day; one 9 years 9d.; one 12 years 1s. 3d.; one 3 years 1s.; one 2 years 1s. per day for one year; one 21 years 1s. 1d.; and one who had been in 22 years 9d.; one 10 years 1s. a day for a year; one 8 years 6d. per day. There would be about 200 men altogether.

2517. What period would that return cover?—12 months; from January 1st to 31st December, 1902.

2518. There were 200 you say; how would that compare with the total number of vagrants passing through during the year?—The total number was 6,111 that year.

2519. You have only taken the return for that one year?—Yes. I just took it then because I had a suspicion that there were many men on the road who were reservists or had been in the Militia. I wanted to get some idea how many there would be.

2520. Still it was not a very large proportion, 200 out of 6,000?—No, sir, it was not. I do not know whether it would be of benefit to the Committee if I gave the information I obtained from the tramps themselves as to how long they had been tramping and what had started them on the road.

2521. (Chairman.) If you please. You gathered this from the men themselves?—Yes, sir. First of all, I would see these men, and pick out one here and there. One young fellow, 18 years of age, said he had been a gardener and he had never been in a tramp ward until one week previously when he was at Worksop, our neighbouring union. He left his own district of Wisbeach a few days previously, and he had been getting 18s. a week. He seemed in doubt what to do. He said his father was only getting 12s. a week. We put him on stone breaking that morning and tried to frighten him out of the tramp ward. He seemed to break down a good deal under that, and he went down to Sheffield and enlisted. His brother was in one of the regiments in Sheffield at the time and I rather thought he had attracted him to Sheffield. Another one had been out of work three weeks; he had been twice through our casual ward, and he had been earning from 25s. to 27s. a week. He acknowledged he had been working at Leeds for three months and he had only been out of work for three weeks. He had paid 12s. for his board, and the rest had gone in drink. He had made no provision for the future; he thought that as he was able to earn more, he did not see why he should not spend it. That occurred in several of these cases. The men thought they had got their work easily and could get work on other big jobs and they got dissatisfied. They earned 28s. to 30s. a week for a few weeks and then shifted off again.

2522. Did you gather they did not mean to work again if they could help it?—Well, one man who had worked on the Blackwall tunnel said he had earned as much as 16s. or 17s. a shift; he had been out of work a fortnight; he had been up to Newcastle tramping about, and he said if he had any money he would spend it freely; he tramped about the country free and got work when he wanted to. There are all sorts of particulars given. Some of them had been on the road for twenty-five years. They have probably worked a little every now and again at different villages, but they have never stopped. There was another man who belonged to London; he had been in Yorkshire for years as a labourer, and it was the first time he had ever entered a tramp ward, and so far as he thought it would be his last. He did not like it. Another one who had been on the road twenty-five years rather liked it. In the winter when it was cold he went into the casual wards, and in the summer months he was on the road.

2523. (Sir William Chance.) You said, just now, it would be better to compel tramps to enter the workhouse; what do you mean by that—to separate them from those bona fide in search of work?—I have no sympathy with the old tramps; I think they ought to be kept out of the ward, because they have seasoned themselves to it; there is scarcely anything to prevent them going, and they must live on other means besides the tramp wards, because no tramp could live on the tramp diet alone.

2524. What would you do with them if they entered a workhouse?—Well, we should expect if a man came into Sheffield to send him back to where he came from; other unions would send our cases back. We should then get them settled down; not roaming about the country with no knowledge where they come from.

2525. You would allow these professional vagrants to enter the workhouse?—We get them now. The man gets into a certain town, goes to the relieving officer and says he is destitute; he is bound to deal with that; we get a good many of such cases.

2526. (Chairman.) Then you shift them back and settle them if you can?—If we get hold of their settlement we send them back. In some cases if the weather breaks up in two or three weeks they go out.

2527. (Sir William Chance.) Do you have any co-operation with the police in any kind of way; do the police visit the casual wards?—Some time ago we had a sergeant of police in charge of our casual wards from the city police force. He was responsible for the admittance of the tramps, the bathing and the carrying out of the rules; but for some reason our tramps rather went up instead of down.

2528. We had evidence this morning that there is a tendency for the number of vagrants to decrease, if the police every now and then visit the casual wards. When the vagrants get to hear of it they do not care to go to those casual wards?—The police of the district do come to the casual wards very frequently to see if there is anybody there they are looking for.

2529. Then they do visit?—Not as a set rule, but they come in occasionally on their beat. We ask them to walk through the casual wards in case there is anybody there that they are looking for from Barnsley and other places, but we did not find that a police sergeant himself was very much of a deterrent to our tramps when he was in charge of the ward.

2530. He was actually in the police force at the time?—He was paid by the police force and his salary was refunded by the guardians to the city police. We also had a police constable then on night duty walking the grounds, and another police constable just previously to my going to Sheffield was in charge of the test house; but the numbers did not go down.

2531. The police had no terror for the vagrants?—A constable or a poor law official cannot touch them unless they break some regulation of the workhouse, and the constable is thus no terror to them.

2532. There would be a certain terror in the police paying visits to casual wards; if a vagrant there had done anything his conscience would betray him?—With fear that he had done something which they knew of.

2533. The number of children in casual wards has decreased?—It has decreased and increased again. It has increased this year; it decreased last year, and it decreased the year before, but we never yet had any year when we have been below 200.

2534. Have you considered the question of taking away the children from the tramps?—I should not like to advocate our guardians doing it. They take enough as it is from their parishioners; they adopt so many, from the undesirable parents among their own parishioners.

2535. You do not agree with the system of adoption, then?—I do not think so, because with the scattered homes at Sheffield there would be many children who do not belong to Sheffield to be educated and brought up at the expense of the Sheffield ratepayers.

2536. (Dr. Downes.) I understand the dietary at your casual wards is bread, rice milk and porridge. Does that mean porridge in addition to rice milk?—No, sir; that means porridge is given at night with bread; it is really more porridge than gruel; the same as we make for the house; and the rice milk is given in the morning with bread; that is the able-bodied diet of the house.

2537. The rice milk being the same as described in the workhouse dietary Order?—Yes.

2538. The mid-day meal is bread and cheese. If you detain them, do I understand they have bread and soup?—If we detain a man for four days, we generally give him soup on the second day.

2539. That would be the house soup?—Yes.

2540. (Sir William Chance.) Do you think that the decrease in the number of women and children in the casual wards arises at all from the fact that the tramp may send his wife and children into the common lodging-house while he goes into the casual ward?—I do not know, sir; I rather think the old tramp would bring his wife and children to the wards knowing he would get out earlier the next morning; it is not usual to keep the families in many casual wards. In very few tramp wards do they keep the father, mother and the children; so if he took his family in with him he would be more likely to get out first thing in the morning.

2541. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you often keep the tramps for the four nights?—Yes, sir; if we get a man back again in the month we never allow him to go under the full time.

2542. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) I see from a return that you have only detained one for four nights; is that in the year?—Yes, sir; that would be in one year.

2543. Then have you only had one man come back again in the same month?—Only one man in the same month during that year.

2544. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you ever keep them three nights?—No. We adopt the two-night principle mostly.

2545. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) You say you had thirty-two prosecutions last year, and only one case—a man with a withered arm—got off?—Yes.

2546. I take it the medical examination is rather superficial?—I think it is more a verbal examination than a physical examination. The doctors seem to desire to err on the side of sympathy; they do not want to go to the court.

2547. And those thirty-two—were many of them stripped, do you think?—Oh, yes.

2548. How many, could you say?—I know of two from personal knowledge; I happened to be in the tramp ward at the time.

2549. You know of two from personal knowledge; there may have been more?—There may have been more.

2550. Probably in the one case, if the man had not brought it to the knowledge of the magistrate that he had a withered arm, it would not have been known?—The examination is not strict enough.

2551. Presumably, he was not one of those who were stripped?—No, he was not. There happened to be a case when Mr. Bagenal, the Inspector, came to our workhouse. A man had been put to stone breaking and complained of physical disability; when he started with the stone breaking he kicked against it and said he would not do any more, that he was not able to do anything. I sent for the doctor to look at him; he seemed quite strong enough to do the stones, but I had him stripped for Mr. Bagenal: his body was very much wasted. I had him examined by the doctor, and he thought he was scarcely a case which could be put to a hard task, and he was allowed to go the following morning.

2552. (Captain Showers.) Do you not think that if the police met the vagrants coming out in the morning or going in in the evening, it would be a deterrent?—I think so. I myself think that many of the casuals who are going out of the tramp ward do not like to be under any observation whatever, and I think the police observation would certainly restrict them somewhat; they would want to know what the policeman was looking at them for.

2553. Would you object to the policeman walking through the casual ward now and again just to see who was there?—I should not object at all. I would rather encourage it; if the police would do it, I would put every opportunity in the way of their doing so.

2554. It would naturally impress upon the minds of the tramps who were there that somebody was being looked for?—Yes, that is so. But we keep that more for the able-bodied and for the new admissions. If there is any burglary, or any difficulty in Sheffield in finding a man, the police often turn up and find him at our place; we have many of them come into the workhouse regularly.

2555. Therefore, it would be a sort of deterrent for the tramps?—That is so; the habitual tramp does not like the police, but the working man tramp does not mind.

2556. (Sir William Chance.) Do you retain your casuals over Sunday?—No, we nearly always turn them out on Sunday morning and fumigate the wards; nearly all our casual wards are under sulphur the whole of Sunday.

2557. If the tramp comes in on Saturday night?—We turn him out on Sunday morning. If we were to keep them over Sunday it would mean our refusing many tramps on Sunday night.

2558. (Chairman.) What time does the man leave the house in the morning, ordinarily speaking?—It depends on when he has done his task. First of all, the superintendent goes through the men to see if they are able to do any work. If a man is really unable to do anything he is discharged at eight o'clock in the morning.

2559. After breakfast?—Yes; the superintendent reports that he has had last night, say, thirty-nine casuals and he has discharged two; one on account of having a very bad arm; another being physically unfit for task; the rest had been put to work at stone breaking, wood sawing, oakum picking. We do very little oakum picking and wood sawing. If they get a task of stone breaking, one who is used to it would probably finish it by half-past nine to ten o'clock; another man might not finish his till half-past eleven; but he would be discharged by himself on the completion of that task. Immediately he had completed what was put there for him, the attendant would allow him to wash his hands and face, and discharge him.

2560. He would be discharged at half-past eleven?—Yes.

2561. He goes out without any food?—That is so.

2562. There is no arrangement by which he can get any meal?—No.

2563. Unless he steals or begs?—That is one of the hardships of the tramp. They must live on something else; they could not live on bread and gruel and bread and water. It is on what they beg that they live.

2564. What is your suggestion to overcome that?—My suggestion is that the tramp should have a certain meal given to him to take with him, so that it would be known that he was not turned out without food.

2565. Or that he should have a way-ticket to pass him on his way, stating his destination and giving him a mid-day meal. Do you think that would do?—That would meet the case. And the workhouse could provide that meal cheaper, because it comes out of contract price. The workhouse could provide a meal of bread, meat, and cheese cheaper than any baker or district shop.

2566. (Mr. Simpson.) Would there not be the fear that, if he took the food with him, he would throw it away if he could get something better?—I have no doubt that he would be so if he could get something better.

2567. On the other hand, if it were known that he had food supplied to him when he left, people would not be so likely to give him food?—The great thing is to educate the people up to the idea that a man has no right to beg; the law provides him with his food. It is the public that do the mischief.

2568. (Mr. Davy.) Do you think that the tramps work out any regular route, or do they go all over the country?—I cannot say.

2569. Do you see the same men again and again?—No, we do not. We do not see many of our men again.

They probably start in [the season at Scarborough, picking up coppers; then they come down through Leeds, Wakefield, Bradford, Barnsley, Buxton, Wharfedale, Sheffield. Then from Sheffield they can work three or four ways—Lincolnshire, Nottingham or Lancashire. They start from perhaps Lincoln and cross over to Worksop, from Worksop to Doncaster, and touch all the fringe of the counties. They go in zig-zags.

2570. Do you think a North-country tramp usually keeps to the north?—I do not think so. A man came to me at Skipton fourteen years ago as a tramp. I gave him work in the garden and he was very thankful. I got some people to take him as a garden hand; he stayed a month and then the spirit came upon him that he must tramp. He left the work that had been found for him, and after he had been away four months he returned again. He had been potato picking and so on; he had another turn of work at Skipton. Three years afterwards I saw him at Leeds, practically in the same district, but within four years after that he was in London. He was in the Fulham tramp ward. I did not know him personally, but as I was passing through he spoke to me by name.

2571. You are one of those who think tramps go all over the country?—Yes.

2572. Do you know the opinion of workhouse masters on that point?—They think the tramps go about all over England.

2573. Why do you not carry out the regulations of the Local Government Board at Sheffield as to two nights' detention?—Well, we have broken through the rule on account of the smallpox. I do not care to keep them mixing through the day; there is also the cleaning of our wards. When the numbers have gone up, our cells would have to be increased considerably. If the guardians would be prepared to double the cells, we could keep them two nights.

2574. Keeping two nights is a great nuisance to the officers, is it not?—I do not allow them to think so; in fact, we keep them now two nights.

2575. But as a matter of fact it is?—I know the officer in charge of the tramp ward would prefer the one night system, but he has no choice in the matter; he receives instructions from myself, from which he does not depart.

2576. It is always easier to let a man go than force him to work?—Well, we have an exceptionally good man for that; I do not think he lets anyone slide, but I think he is anxious not to get his ward into a rough condition for want of cleaning. Why I was speaking of the difficulty of the two nights' system is this: our average is thirty-six per night; well, it would mean that if we keep them two nights, when it came to Saturday we should have ninety men for sixty cells at the very least. When they were detained for the two nights our tramps were higher than they were for the one-night detention. I am speaking now of 1895, 1898, and 1899, when the tramps were higher than they were in 1902 and 1903; for part of those two years the one-night detention was in force.

2577. (Sir William Chance.) You would not mind detaining for two nights if every union did the same?—Well, we do not pay much regard to other unions; there are so many loopholes for the superintendents of the casual wards to allow a man to go without work, and also allow him to go on the first day of his detention. If a superintendent likes to be somewhat slack in the management of his wards, he could find many bona fide working men that he would let go because they were seeking work; he would not need to detain them even up to dinner-time.

2578. (Captain Showers.) Do you have a female to receive the women tramps?—Yes, the wife of the male tramp-master.

2579. Is it a man who meets them at the gate and takes all the different particulars about them?—No, sir. The husband of the tramp-mistress admits them and hands them over to his wife. If they come at 9 o'clock at night, the paid night porter would admit them, and immediately call the tramp-mistress to the women and children and leave them with her to attend to.

2580. Can the task-master go into the female wards at any time?—No, sir, his key is entirely separate; he has no key that will admit him through to the female tramp ward. There are two yards between the male and the female tramp wards, and the female tramp ward is behind the female receiving ward, and an inmate of the workhouse sleeps in a little room attached to that, in case the bell is rung in the ward.

EIGHTH DAY.

Wednesday, 18th January, 1905.

PRESENT:

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair.)

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.
Captain SHOWERS.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary.)

Mr. RICHARD JAMES CURTIS, called; and Examined.

2581. (Chairman.) You are, I believe, clerk to the guardians of the King's Norton union?—Yes.

2582. And previously were you not clerk to the Norwich guardians?—Yes.

2583. How long have you been at King's Norton?—Well, with the exception of one year at Norwich, all my official life.

2584. You were only one year at Norwich?—Yes.

2585. The King's Norton union comprises about one-sixth of the city of Birmingham, does it not?—Yes.

2586. And the borough of Smethwick and the King's Norton urban district?—Yes, Smethwick has a population of about 60,000 and King's Norton urban district of about 70,000. Then there is one-sixth of the city of Birmingham, making up about 200,000.

2587. What is the rateable value?—About £1,030,000 Mr. Richard J. Curtis.

2588. In 1878, I believe, the King's Norton guardians erected new casual wards?—Yes. 18 Jan. 1905.

2589. At their workhouse at Selly Oak?—Yes, within the workhouse precincts. They were on the separate cell system for men; for women, just an association ward.

2590. For how many of each sex did they provide?—Twenty-four men, and I should think about half-a-dozen women.

2591. I see it stated that you have accommodation for three women with children, and for seven women without children?—Those are the new wards erected in 1899: those erected in 1878 provided for twenty-four men and an association ward for probably half-a-dozen women.

Mr. Richard J. Curtis. 2592. Those erected in 1899 were in addition to the others?—The old wards were found to be totally insufficient, so some new wards were erected outside the workhouse precincts, but within 300 yards of the workhouse gate, providing for twenty-four men, all on the separate cell system, for three women with children, and for seven women without children.

18 Jan. 1905.

2593. Are those sufficient now for you?—No, sir; for the past eighteen months we have had to use the old ones in addition to the new ones so far as the accommodation for men is concerned.

2594. Has there been any considerable increase in the numbers of men in the last eighteen months?—Yes. During the year 1902 there were 6,284 men. Last year, from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, the number was 11,751.

2595. What was the average per night?—I have not taken that out; but the average per night since the 1st of January this year has been 70; indeed, we have had to refuse admissions.

2596. What accommodation have you altogether, for men?—Well, we have twenty-four separate cells at the old wards, twenty-four separate cells at the new wards, and we have room for eight in the association wards at the new casual wards.

2597. Then did you have enough room when you utilised the old wards?—No, sir. For instance, on the 10th of this month we refused twelve.

2598. Perhaps you can give figures for the neighbouring unions in connection with the question of the increase of casuals?—So far as the three unions within the city are concerned?

2599. Yes?—For the parish of Birmingham, the number of men admitted during 1903 was 15,538; in 1904, 16,437. The parish of Birmingham has a population of 230,000 out of the half million in the city of Birmingham, and we have something like 80,000 and Aston union has the remainder of the city. Aston had 12,597 men in 1903, and 15,715 in 1904. The King's Norton figures, which I have already given, are 6,284 in 1903, and 11,751 in 1904. The total for 1903 was 34,419 and for 1904, 43,903, representing the city of Birmingham and the immediate surroundings.

2600. Is that a considerable increase over previous years?—The total number for the three unions in 1900 was only 28,692.

2601. Were there any special circumstances to which you can attribute that increase?—Well, with regard to my own union we endeavoured to ascertain the cause of the large increase. There was a small special committee appointed, and we visited the casual wards three or four nights a week and questioned these men. So far as our union was concerned we attributed the increase to three reasons; first of all the situation and the surroundings of the King's Norton wards. By situation, I mean we are either on or near what we might term tramp tracks. Secondly, to a slightly improved dietary which had recently been brought into use, that is to say the guardians substituted gruel for water; and thirdly, to some local causes, one of which brought us a large influx on Sundays. It was a free tea given by the Kilburn Sisterhood. That is to say they hired a public school in Birmingham, and admitted all who cared to go; and we found from questioning the tramps that this fact was known throughout the Midlands, and on Sundays they made their way to Birmingham where they were sure of a nice warm place to sit in and a very good tea. Ours was the nearest casual ward to this particular school, with the result that we on Sundays were invariably quite overcrowded.

2602. You found the lodging?—Yes. I may say in passing that after I discovered this fact I communicated with the education committee, and they at once saw the undesirability of having tramps in a public school on Sunday where the children had to come on Monday, and immediately discontinued the tenancy of the premises, much to the annoyance of the sisterhood, who promptly informed me that they should arrange for some other building.

2603. Did they do so?—I believe they have, but not on our side of the city. So for the moment that cause has passed away.

2604. Has that led to a decrease for the moment?—Well, things have gone back to their normal state I should say for the last two years on Sundays. This applies to Sundays only. Then we found during that investigation in 1904 that about 40 per cent. of the men said that they were visitors for the first time. We endeavoured to ascertain the character of these people, or the trades which they pursued, and the replies, generally speaking, showed about 50 per cent. who described themselves as labourers, that is to say they had no trade; 25 per cent. as artisans and mechanics, but they had had no connection with any trade society or union; and the remainder were of various classes. Then, with regard to army men, we went into that question last year and again this year. I may say that last year I addressed a communication, for the information of our small committee, to all the unions, not only the two that were immediately adjoining us, but all the unions in the immediate vicinity of Birmingham, representing probably a dozen. And one of the questions I asked was in connection with army men. Aston union reported that no such men had passed through their wards. In the case of our own union 13 per cent. claimed to have been either in the army, or in the militia, or probably were in the militia then, but not up for training. I recently got the superintendent of our casual wards to submit questions to all the men coming there with a view to endeavouring to get at a classification of them. Shall I give you those figures now, sir?

2605. If you please?—The investigation ran over three weeks ending the 6th January last. This, of course, refers only to the King's Norton wards. There were 774 men, 46 women, and 12 children, making a total of 832. Their ages were as follows: there were 25 under twenty years, and of these 12 were under sixteen; 317 were more than twenty years of age, but under forty; 363 were more than forty, but under sixty, and 127 more than sixty years of age; 46 of these men claimed to have been members of friendly societies, but all of them were out of benefit.

2606. Did they say why?—Oh, various causes; they could not keep up the payments owing to loss of work, etc.

2607. From the failure of the society?—No, I am speaking now of friendly societies proper.

2608. I mean it was not owing to the friendly society breaking down, but to their own failure to pay?—Yes. I have the list; the Oddfellows, the Druids and the recognised friendly societies. 71 of them stated that they had been members of some trade union. I found that 141 of the men stated that they had properly learned a trade. They represented forty-seven different trades. It is a curious fact in passing that of the 141 men only 71 had ever been in a trade union. Thus, of those who had learned a trade, one half had joined a trade union, and one third had joined a friendly society. Then, pursuing the investigation as to army men, 142 men stated they had been in the army, and of this number 17 had served less than five years, 33 five years or more, but less than eight, 63 eight years or more, but less than twelve, and 29 had served for twelve years or more. In nearly every case they had enlisted under the age of twenty and had not learned a trade. I do not think a single one of the army men answered that they had learned a trade. One man whom I happened to see myself was thirty-six years of age. He enlisted when he was seventeen he said, he had been in the army for seventeen years, and he went straight on the road when he left the army.

2609. Were they physically good men?—This man was quite physically capable.

2610. But taking the men who said they had left the army?—No, I should say the average were not; at all events, those that I saw myself. Well then, we put a further question to them, how long they had been on the road, or leading the life of a vagrant. 15 of them acknowledged to five years or more, 34 to more than a year, but under five years, and all the rest said less than a year. In fact, half of the total number said they had been on the road less than three months. I found it very difficult to believe that myself.

2611. Did any of them profess to have been attempting to get work?—Oh, yes, they were all looking for work.

2612. They were?—Invariably they were looking for it. Still, if only half the number spoke the truth, it shows a very alarming state of affairs as regards looking for work. I interviewed one man who said he was a brickmaker. He had walked from Worcester and he was going to Coventry. If you know the direction it is almost due north and south. Instead of going to Stourbridge where there are plenty of brickworks, he chose to come through to King's Norton. On his way he must have passed four small brickworks within a mile of the main road that he had traversed. He had not made an inquiry at a single one of them, so that it was the old story as regards that man looking for work.

2613. Well then, as far as you could judge, looking for work was more of a pretence than an actual fact?—In the majority of cases, yes.

2614. Of course, you did not go accurately into the history of all of them, but that was the opinion you formed?—I did not go into the history of all of them. I would express my opinion in this way; if work offered itself—without much trouble in finding—the job would be taken, and the man might be saved. My view is that after they have had a slight association with the habitual tramp they seem to like the life.

2615. (Sir William Chance.) Work might be taken, but would it be kept?—It would be taken for a time, but then they would resume their old life.

2616. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you ever tell these vagrants where they can find work, or where they may look for it?—We have not been able to do so during the last year. Within a year or two ago at the time of the Welsh water supply scheme for Birmingham there was a great deal of casual labour knocking about, and our master obtained employment for a number of men; in fact, a good many of the men who visited us were on their way to something of the kind.

2617. (Chairman.) But have you any regular system of information as to work, or is it only from time to time that you receive information?—Our workhouse master keeps in touch with the employers of labour, not in particular to obtain employment for the casuals, but rather for able-bodied men who may apply for relief to the relief committees. And we have instances, but they are not very many, where work has been obtained for these men casually.

2618. Yes, but, I mean, does a man know if he goes to your workhouse that he can inquire of an official and probably obtain information?—No, sir.

2619. There is no regular system of that sort?—There is no regular system. I will put it this way: if the man satisfies the vagrant superintendent that he is a genuine man in search of work, he would at once tell the workhouse master that he has got a genuine case, and he would do his best to get him employment.

2620. I think you have something to say as to the introduction of smallpox by tramps?—Yes. I have ascertained this information from our medical officers of health. In the first place with regard to the city itself, smallpox was introduced during 1903 into the workhouse on six occasions, in each instance amongst vagrants. Except on the first occasion, no secondary cases occurred. This was in great part due to the strict medical supervision carried out by the authorities.

2621. Was the smallpox detected at the time of the bath or before; I suppose smallpox ought always to be detected if the man has his bath?—Oh, yes. In one instance, I remember, the moment the man walked into the entrance hall the superintendent himself spotted it. Our superintendent is a man who has been fifteen years at this work.

2622. I mean it is hardly possible for a man to have his bath without it being detected?—Quite so. In the first case it was a tramp who had been traced from North-allerton three weeks previously through fifteen different workhouses and half-a-dozen lodging-houses. The city medical officer tells me that he was in an acutely infectious condition for at least four days before reaching Birmingham.

2623. Did any other cases result?—That was the one case where some secondary cases occurred. Well, then, in addition to smallpox from casuals admitted to casual wards other cases occurred among casuals in the common lodging-houses. In all, three cases occurred in the common lodging-houses, though not all were vagrants. The total number of habitual vagrants who had smallpox was 13 in the casual wards and in the common lodging-houses out of 251 for the city. Mr. Richard J. Curtis. 18 Jan. 1905.

2624. The common lodging-house cases, I take it, would be far more dangerous, because there is not the same provision for the cleansing of the sleeping place and so on that you have in the casual wards?—Quite so. Then, in King's Norton urban district once in 1902 and once last year smallpox was introduced by tramps who entered the casual wards and were immediately discovered.

2625. And it went no further?—There were no further results. We had a case of itch a few months ago, discovered at once, that had walked from tramp wards fourteen miles away and had been discharged that morning. The medical officer told us the man had been suffering for at least a week. We communicated with the other board of guardians and had some correspondence with no very satisfactory result. They stated that they had warned their officer, but it was quite obvious that the man could not have been bathed and examined.

2626. The bath is, I suppose, an absolute preventive to such cases going on?—I should say so.

2627. The man must be discovered if he goes through the proper course?—I should say so. I think in many instances the bathing is left to a pauper. The vagrant is told to go and have a bath, and it is simply left to a pauper to see that he gets into the water. I am glad to say that it is not so in our case.

2628. As a rule, I suppose, the ordinary casual will shirk his bath if he can?—Yes. Our city medical officer of health expresses his opinion in this way, that vagrants are the most fruitful source of spreading smallpox and other infectious diseases, including verminous and skin diseases.

2629. Upon that it is obvious that the bath is a necessity, if you are to stop the spread of disease?—Yes.

2630. Have you anything to say with regard to the treatment in casual wards as compared with that in prisons?—Well, we do not hear much of this in the Birmingham district; of course one hears it occasionally. I have not had an opportunity of examining the cells at Birmingham prison, but I rather think as regards the size of cell we are much upon the same lines, and our diet at the King's Norton casual wards is pretty much the same as the diet of a short sentence prisoner. The task at the parish of Birmingham is, generally speaking, unloading coal, and that, I believe, the vagrants prefer to the task which they get at the prison, though the Birmingham diet is bread and water; still the man would rather have the bread and water and unload coal than go into prison and perform the task there. In the case of each of the three Birmingham unions, the cells afford good accommodation for the men; and they are well lighted, well heated, and so forth.

2631. As I understand you, a man would prefer to spend four days in one of your vagrant cells than go to prison for four days?—I think so.

2632. That is your opinion?—In our King's Norton wards I have never heard a man say, "I would rather go to prison than be here," but one has occasionally heard it at the parish of Birmingham cells.

2633. That you think is owing to the condition of the cells?—I think so. The cells are well lighted, they are warm, and, generally speaking, I think that where the accommodation provided is in most respects the same as prison you do not hear of this complaint. When I was at Norwich one frequently heard it; in fact, prosecutions were constantly taking place of these men for refusing to perform their task, and I went into the matter. The Norwich cells were dark, with very little light, and very narrow; a man had scarcely room to turn round in them.

2634. You are now speaking of the workhouse cells?—Yes.

2635. (Sir William Chance.) How long ago was that?—I went there in the middle of 1902 and left in the middle of 1903. There the diet was bread and water. Well, the first thing the guardians did was to substitute gruel. We visited the prison cells by permission, of course, of the Commissioners, and we found that they were much larger; I think the cubic air space was about double;

Mr. Richard J. Curtis. they were better lighted in every way and of course they were nice and warm. The task was also lighter, 8 cwt., I think, if my memory serves me correctly, as against 12 cwt. of stone.

18 Jan. 1905.

2636. What about the sleeping accommodation in the two?—In a few of the workhouse cells at Norwich they had hammocks, in others it was a plank bed with very little covering. There again the bed covering was better in prison than in the vagrant cells.

2637. I suppose that becomes quickly known among the vagrant class?—Yes.

2638. Have you anything more to say on that point?—The prison cells in Norwich for short time prisoners were, length 13 feet, width 7 feet, and height 9 feet. The casual wards were, length 9 feet—a difference of 4 feet, width 4 feet 7 inches, height 10 feet. The prison cells I found were lighted by a window 3 feet 6 inches in length and 2 feet high; the vagrants' cells had very little light.

2639. And the food, you say, very much the same?—By the substitution of gruel the food became much the same.

2640. (Chairman.) Now you have something to say, I believe, about the lack of uniformity in casual wards?—Yes, sir. I may put it in this way. In my judgment the present measures have totally failed to achieve their object. The reasons for such failure are numerous, but probably the chief are, first, the absence of uniform practice throughout the country, and my experience leads me to the conclusion that in a number of unions the administration of the Casual Poor Acts and regulations is practically a dead letter. That is to say, men are admitted at night and are given a night's lodging, the bath is not insisted upon, and they are allowed to go the next morning.

2641. Search?—That I should say in many instances is omitted. We have a man in our workhouse who goes away for the summer. He has been removed to us from eighteen different unions within my knowledge, and I am only a young man, and occasionally he takes it into his head to walk back to us. He has been removed from all parts of England at different times; it is a common thing for him to say when he comes before the revision committee, "I have passed through ten workhouses and never had a bath." The man knows the regulations quite well.

2642. (Sir William Chance.) Do you get the information as to what they do in other workhouses from the vagrants themselves or from conversation with officials in other unions?—From both. Besides conversations I have had with vagrants in cases where we have had skin diseases introduced, we have pursued it through the officials of the unions through which they have passed, and information has been gathered by our medical officer of health in investigating smallpox cases.

2643. (Chairman.) Do you think that search is omitted in a great number of cases?—Well, I cannot speak definitely as to that.

2644. You would only hear from accounts that were given you?—I only hear. I conclude from what one gathers from these men, that they are simply given a night's lodging and allowed to go the next morning.

2645. And what about the task?—Without task in many instances.

2646. Task not imposed?—I should say not in many cases.

2647. Bath and search both omitted?—Yes, sir.

2648. You think that is the case in a considerable number of places?—In a number of these small unions. I have also found this, that there is no proper officer allocated to the work. The average workhouse porter in a country union is first of all workhouse porter, then he is labour master, which duty involves him going round the gardens, and so on; it is obviously impossible for the average workhouse porter to attend to the tramps as well, so the duty is delegated to some inmate who does it as he pleases.

2649. I suppose this arises from a natural desire of the guardians to save money in the matter of wages?—Yes, I should think so; although, on the other hand, in the case of my union, we have dealt with the matter in a liberal spirit, we have got an experienced superintendent at the casual wards whom we have had for years, and still we get a great increase. We enforce the task to the full, the vagrants are bathed, are searched, every regulation is carried out in the strictest form, and still we are getting a very large increase.

2650. Is not that owing a good deal to the fact that you are on one of the main routes of tramps; is it not a fact that a tramp naturally makes for a great city like Birmingham?—Yes.

2651. Would not that probably be the cause why you get so many?—It accounts for a good deal of the increase, no doubt, but it rather leads one up to the thought that the cost of this should be distributed over the country. However, we will come to that presently. Well, the second reason I assign is the indiscriminate charity. Beggars with a plausible tale find it easy to live without work, aided as they are by indiscriminate charity in the day, and a night's lodging at the ratepayers' expense.

2652. (Mr. Simpson.) Should you say that most of that charity came from well-to-do people or from the poorer classes?—From the poorer classes, I think, mostly.

2653. Cottagers whom it is very hard to reach?—Yes.

2654. (Chairman.) With a view to preventing begging, would you suggest that the man should have some food with him when he leaves the workhouse in the morning, or that he should be able to obtain it, by means of a ticket, in the middle of the day?—Well, a system of that sort has been in operation in Worcestershire. Part of my union is in Worcestershire, but the workhouse master prior to the present one, who was there for some years, told me that he only had knowledge of one ticket being used in the course of five years.

2655. Would you be in favour of every man who leaves the workhouse on his way to a place, having a ticket given him specifying that he had left A and was going to B?—Yes.

2656. And that as near as possible halfway between A and B he should be empowered to obtain a loaf of bread?—I agree with that proposal.

2657. I suppose if that could be done generally?—Quite so. Oh, yes, I think the man should be provided with some food in the middle of the day in order that he should have no reason for begging.

2659. And they would be protected?—Yes.

2660. Then I may take it from you that, after considerable experience, you are in favour, if it could be worked generally, of having some system of way-ticket of that sort?—Yes.

2661. It is in existence in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire, as you no doubt know?—Yes, I know Colonel Curtis-Hayward's society. And Worcestershire attempted it some years ago.

2662. (Sir William Chance.) Can you say at all what was the reason for their abandoning it in Worcestershire?—Well, I have always understood that they found the men did not use the tickets.

2663. It was not that all the unions did not co-operate?—I have never heard that suggestion.

2664. (Mr. Simpson.) Was it much in the hands of the police, do you know?—Well, I have not very much information about it; I know the calling place near to us was a police station.

2665. (Chairman.) I suppose you would think it well that the police should at any rate co-operate, if they did not work the system?—I think so. I think co-operation on the part of the police is necessary.

2666. (Sir William Chance.) How many years ago did they drop the system in Worcestershire?—I have not heard anything about it for the last five years, I should think.

2667. Probably it was not really tried in the same way as in Gloucestershire?—I do not think it was tried with such vigour as in Gloucestershire.

2663. (Chairman.) Then, have you any further points ?—Yes. The next is that the existing wards are not far enough apart to impose a real day's tramp on the habitual vagrant. Within a radius of eighteen miles from the centre of Birmingham, we have got no less than ten casual wards, and there are very few of them ten miles apart, so that it is quite possible for a man to, I call it, revolve round Birmingham. They may start from Birmingham and come to King's Norton, That is three miles away, they are just over the border in another union. The next place they could call at would be Bromsgrove, nine miles away, and so on.

2669. Now the way-ticket would defeat that ?—Absolutely, sir. With regard to the habitual vagrant, I would fix his next calling place for him.

2670. Yes ?—Another reason, I think, is the mistaken sympathy which is extended by the police and occasionally by magistrates to vagrants found begging. One frequently reads in the newspapers that they are discharged, if they promise to go somewhere else.

2671. There again the way-ticket would be of material assistance to the police, would it not, in detecting the habitual beggar ?—I think it would. I think if the average policeman knew that the man had had a mid-day meal provided for him, he would probably do his duty with greater courage than if he thought the man had had no food and was begging for some.

2672. (Captain Showers.) If he would not use the ticket, he would be in the same position ?—The policeman would have the knowledge that the man had had food, provided for him, that he was begging for the sake of begging, and that he was a real impostor.

2673. Therefore, the magistrate, I take it, would give him a harder sentence, and would not have so much sympathy with him ?—I think so.

2674. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you, as a matter of fact, recognise the same men coming back pretty frequently to your casual wards ?—Well, the tramps themselves state that they go the round, but they take care not to come within the prescribed limit very often.

2675. Because then they would be kept the four nights ?—Yes.

2676. And you do not often have occasion to keep them four nights ?—Not very often ; if we get the opportunity it is done.

2677. (Chairman.) I think you have suggested a classification of vagrants ?—Yes, I have endeavoured to classify them into four main classes. The first is the loafing vagabond, in whom there is no desire to work and no inclination for a change of life and habit. The second, those who have been respectable and hard working, but who (and often through no fault of their own) have, from a variety of causes, taken to the road, and by enforced association with the habitual tramp got to like the life and become work-shy. During my investigations and chats with these men I found a number coming under that class. The third is those who are willing to work, if they could find employment. These are frequently described as the genuine tramp. The fourth, those who, from lack of physical or mental ability, have become incapable of doing work remunerative to an employer. This latter class, I am convinced, forms a much larger percentage of the whole than is generally thought.

2678. What would you say about the percentage ?—I should put it from 20 to 25 per cent.

2679. That is the man who from age or infirmity is incapable of doing work ?—Yes, or mental deficiency.

2680. (Captain Showers.) Would that class be affected by the low feeding of the workhouse ?—Well, that has a tendency that way. Of course, it is difficult to know how far back that would extend, still one has seen a great many of them who are of feeble mind, of very little intellect, and practically of no physical ability.

2681. This low diet would take greater effect upon them, would it not ?—Oh, undoubtedly.

2682. (Dr. Downes.) At what percentage would you estimate the number of those who are willing to work ?—I think I gave you that. That of course would vary greatly with the different periods of trade depression. Just at present there would be a good percentage of the men willing to work, if work could be found them.

2683. (Chairman.) When men are on their way to a new job of work, I suppose you would find more than the usual percentage ?—Yes. I think at those times that class of man should be aided in his effort to get to his objective. We had a great number of men passing to and fro from Wales. But those men are most unthrifty ; they will not save when they are earning, and when they have to move to a new job their only method of locomotion seems to be their legs.

2684. As a matter of fact they never save, do they ?—I do not think they do. I think the vagrancy laws press rather hard upon those men ; they should be assisted to get to their objective as soon as possible.

2685. What is done now to assist them ?—We should let them go the very next morning.

2686. That is all ; there is no question of the provision of a ticket or anything of that sort ?—No, no ticket at all. Possibly at the next ward, the man would be kept for a day and two nights.

2687. You cannot give them anything in the way of food to start them off ?—No.

2688. They have their breakfast with you always ?—Oh, yes, they have their breakfast.

2689. You have now some suggestions, I think, to make ?—I have come to the conclusion, sir, that classification is needed for dealing with these men—that is of the nature that has been found so useful in dealing with the ordinary pauper. First of all, I suggest that we should distinguish between the bona fide man in search of work and the habitual, that a vagrant claiming to be a bona fide working man should be required to obtain and carry a certificate setting forth his description, starting place, destination, and the route he proposes to take, such a certificate to be issued I should say by any recognised trade society, or by the police at the place where the searcher for work resided for a period of, say, six months prior to his setting forth on tramp. The holder of such a certificate would be entitled on applying at any of the existing casual wards to supper, a night's lodging, and breakfast, and be allowed to go early on the morning following admission.

2690. (Captain Showers.) You would still have the bath, I take it ?—Oh, yes.

2691. (Chairman.) Please go on ?—The diet supplied to the holder of the certificate should at least be sufficient to keep up his health and strength in anticipation of his finding work. The certificate should be stamped at each place of call. Of course, regulations would be needed to deal with cases of loss of certificate, departure from route specified, and so on.

2692. Then your certificate would practically be a way-ticket ?—Well, the way-ticket would give him that, but I propose that he should be supplied with sufficient food to keep up his health and strength in anticipation of his getting work.

2693. But you would have no objection to include the mid-day meal ?—None whatever. I think, as I said before, the bona fide working man in search of work should be aided to get work, and, if he has got an objective, he should get there as quickly as possible, and in a good state of health. Then, in order to find out the habituels that we hear so much about, sir, it seems to me that some attempt should be made to mark the man as it were, and my suggestion is that, to start with, all suspected habituels should be placed under licence. These licences should be issued by the guardians and the police in co-operation, and should contain a full description of the habitual with identification marks, etc. Instead of being allowed to call where he likes, a calling place should be allotted to him at a reasonable day's march. He should be required to perform a task and be detained two nights, the licence being endorsed at each stopping place. Loss of the licence, or applying at a ward other than the wards specified, should be an offence punishable at the option of the justices by a short term of imprisonment or a long term of detention in a labour colony. On and after a date to be fixed, say one year from the new law coming into operation, all those tramps not possessing a certificate should be deemed habitual vagrants, and should be liable by decision of justices to detention in a labour colony for at least one year. The punishment of these men should in the first instance be of a reformatory

Mr. Richard J. Curtis. character, that is to say that some attempt should be made to teach them, to encourage them in the habit of work.

18 Jan. 1905.

2694. Yes, or teach them, I suppose, any fairly easy trade?—Yes, teach them some fairly easy trade. Second offenders should be committed either to a long term of imprisonment, or detention in a labour colony with a different form of punishment. The labour colonies should be under Government control, just as prisons are. I think that is necessary, because not a great many labour colonies, I believe, would ultimately be found to be necessary.

2695. Have you yourself had any experience of labour colonies; I mean, have you visited any of them?—No, sir, I have not.

2696. You have not been to Hadleigh?—No, sir.

2697. What have you to suggest as to vagrant children?—I think if the provisions of the Vagrants' Children Protection Bill of last session had passed into law much useful work could be done to serve the children. Even under the present law, if the cost of maintaining the children did not fall upon the local rates, many boards of guardians would readily adopt children under the Act of 1899. I can safely say that my Board would adopt them at once.

2698. (Sir William Chance.) That Bill makes the cost a county charge?—Yes, up to 6s. a week.

2699. (Chairman.) You suggest, I think, that the cost of dealing with habitual vagrants and their children should be wholly borne by the State?—Yes.

2700. In the same way as the cost of prisoners is?—Quite so; and I think the cost of dealing with the genuine working man could be left as a local charge.

2701. Should you treat the habitual vagrant as if he were a criminal?—Yes, having ascertained who the habitual is by this probationary period, I think the cost of dealing with him should be borne by the State.

2702. There is one other matter: what are the tasks at King's Norton?—Well, the one-nighter has to break 4 cwt. of stone; it is not very hard stone, I may say.

2703. How long, as a rule, does that take an average man to break?—Well, speaking of a test-yard which we have opened now for outdoor able-bodied men, we first of all fixed the task at 8 cwt. and the Inspector, Mr. Henry Stevens, and myself paid a surprise visit there one day and we found them all gone at 12 o'clock. They began at 8.30 in the morning. We then increased the task to 12 cwt.; they still got away about 2 o'clock. Yesterday at a committee we were proposing to make it 16 cwt.; but we are speaking of these things without knowing the capacity of the men. At Smethwick they are mostly strikers, I think. One cannot draw a general conclusion. It depends on the strength of the man, and what he has been used to before. The habitual vagrant will break 4 cwt. of stone in an hour or so.

2704. Some men will break double the amount of stone that others can?—Yes.

2705. I mean equally powerful men to look at?—Yes, I do not think you can draw a general line.

2706. Have you had your attention called to the system of crushing stone which they have in the Cuckfield workhouse; instead of breaking stone with the hammer they crush it with a thing like a pestle and mortar?—No, I have not heard of that.

2707. The advantage of that system being that there is no skill required and that every man with an ordinary muscle could break the same amount as another?—Yes.

2708. Do you have wood cutting?—Yes; the men who are not thought to be capable of breaking stone, or whom one wishes to deal a little lightly with are put to wood sawing or picking the ground.

2709. Have you the wood splitting as well?—Yes.

2710. I suppose the splitting is the lightest task?—I think so.

2711. Have you any suggestion to make with regard to alteration of the tasks?—No. I think they are sufficiently wide, sir. I think oakum picking, of course, should be discontinued; in most places it might well be left to an official calendar.

2712. (Mr. Davy.) You have told us that you carry out all the regulations of the Local Government Board; do you detain two nights?—Yes, sir.

2713. Do you detain two nights in every case?—Well, we comply with the rule that, if the man can satisfy the master that he is a genuine working man, he should be allowed to go.

2714. The master has a discretion?—Yes.

2715. Can you tell us in what number of cases he exercises that power?—No, I cannot give you the number.

2716. Is there a considerable number of such cases where he exercises his discretion?—I think not.

2717. Does he detain the women two nights?—Yes; I have not heard of his allowing them to go otherwise.

2718. Do the neighbouring unions carry out the regulations of the Local Government Board as to detention?—Yes, all the three city unions, Aston, Birmingham and King's Norton.

2719. Do you know if the neighbouring country unions do?—They do not, sir.

2720. (Sir William Chance.) Wolverhampton, for instance?—I think Wolverhampton do now; they built new casual wards early last year. I understood Mr. Davy to speak of the neighbouring country unions, such as Droitwich, Kidderminster and those places.

2721. (Mr. Davy.) As I take it all your tasks are skilled labour?—They are stone breaking, land digging, and wood sawing.

2722. Is your wood sawing piecework or time work?—Time work: the men have to work so many hours at land digging.

2723. The only piecework you have is stone breaking?—No. The wood sawing task is two men to saw four railway sleepers if detained one night only, or nine railway sleepers if detained two nights.

2724. The strongest man will do the work easiest, will he not?—Yes.

2725. And the skilled man at stone breaking, would do that task easiest?—Yes, he would.

2726. Do you think that is fair?—Well, it is difficult to suggest anything else in its place.

2727. Have you any corn grinding at Birmingham?—No; I think it would be a good thing for places like Birmingham, assuming the present system has to be kept, if we only had one casual ward there. It would have been practicable supposing the three boards had combined and erected casual wards for the city. It would then have been practicable at no greater outlay to have provided these other tasks.

2728. You were aware that considerations of cost make it difficult for some country unions to carry out the regulations?—Exactly.

2729. Apparently also in your case considerations of cost make it difficult to take the best system possibly?—We think we have gone far enough, sir; we spent £6,000 on the new wards four years ago.

2730. You carry out all the regulations and yet your increase of tramps is very great?—Yes, very great indeed.

2731. Do you think that increase is quite abnormal?—I think it was abnormal last year; at the same time our figures show that there has been a steady and continual rise for the last five years. The figures which I quoted at the opening are undoubtedly abnormal, I think.

2732. Is that the reason that you say that the present system has failed in its object?—I draw my conclusions from the experience of the last five years, not from the present and last year.

2733. What would you say was the object of the present system?—To repress vagrancy; keep the men off the road.

2734. Might it also be to relieve the vagrant?—Oh, I think to a certain extent, but not to encourage him in habits of idleness or loafing.

2735. Would you rather put it in this way; that the present system has failed to repress vagrancy?—Yes, that is what I mean.

2736. As regards the occupations of these men, most of your information is derived from the tramps themselves.

"I think?—I have had a number of interviews with these men.

2737. When a man tells you that he has been at this or that trade, or that he has been in the army, you have to depend on what he says?—After questioning the man.

2738. Have any of these men got discharge papers?—No, sir; I asked them that question. Of course, a great deal of their answers must be taken with a grain of salt.

2739. You would not say that a tramp was exactly prima facie a trustworthy witness?—No, I do not think so.

2740. To go to another point, can you tell us what the average sentence at Norwich was for refusing to work in the vagrant ward?—Seven days.

2741. Any more?—I do not think there was one more than seven days whilst I was there.

2742. What is it at Birmingham?—It is about seven days, I think, now. Take my own cases, there were four seven days and the rest were fourteen days. The prosecutions I had last year were ten altogether.

2743. Is there any marked difference in the sentence given by the stipendiary and the sentence given by the other magistrates?—Yes, the stipendiary is very much firmer with them. One can put it in this way, a conviction is practically assured if the stipendiary takes the case. With all due respect to any justices of the peace who are here, he does not allow these men to plead their usual tale. The question with him is, have they performed their task or not.

2744. But when it comes to sentencing, the sentences are pretty equal?—I think so.

2745. (Chairman.) What is the proportion of seven and fourteen days' sentences?—Well, I had 10 cases and 4 of them were seven days.

2746. Only 10 in the year?—In my union. The Birmingham parish had 84 during the year.

2747. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you hear of sentences of less than seven days?—Yes, five days one has heard of.

2748. Not very often?—Not very often; seven days, I think, is the average.

2749. (Mr. Davy.) You said you had 11,000 men pass through your wards during 1904?—Yes.

2750. That is not nights' lodgings?—No; individual men.

2751. Making, if the regulations were carried out in each case, 22,000 nights' lodgings?—Yes.

2752. Out of this 11,000 you only had ten prosecutions for refusing to work?—That is all.

2753. That is extraordinarily low, is it not?—I think it frequently depends on the way the men are handled by the officials. At Birmingham, they have the task of unloading coal and stone breaking; the officials there have told me that the majority of men prefer to unload the coal. If a man has been once at unloading coal, the next time he is ordered to break stone he frequently refuses.

2754. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) You cannot set a definite task of unloading coal, can you?—So many hours.

2755. (Mr. Davy.) And that he looks upon as his right?—The next time that he comes he wants to unload coal, and that is the way they account for the difference between their prosecutions and ours. It does not account for the principle, but we never take a case unless the medical officer certifies that the man is capable of performing the task. At all events that accounts for why we do not lose any of our prosecutions. One takes the medical certificate or the medical officer himself to the court.

2756. Is it your opinion that the tramps are an underfed class?—Yes, I think they are.

2757. Do they look underfed?—The habitual vagrant looks underfed. I have seen during these last three weeks a number of men in the wards, who by no means look underfed.

2758. Does the habitual vagrant live upon what he gets at the workhouse?—Oh, no.

2759. Is it not within your knowledge that he brings broken food into the workhouse?—Yes.

2760. Which has to be taken away from him?—He does not live upon what he gets from the workhouse by any means; at the same time, he does not get sufficient sustaining food, I think. Mr. Richard J. Curtis.
18 Jan. 1905.

2761. (Mr. Simpson.) I suppose you do not know how many of the men who come to the casual ward have been in gaol?—No.

2762. Do you hear of many complaints in the country round of the nuisance the tramps are from the criminal point of view?—We have frequent complaints of the nuisance they are by begging, hanging about, sitting on the seats and so forth. The model village at Bournville on the Cadbury Estate adjoins the casual ward. It is quite a common thing to see these men occupying the seats placed in the highway, with the result that we get complaints.

2763. Do the police visit the casual wards?—Not regularly.

2764. Would they do so in order to pick up some one they wanted?—Oh, yes.

2765. Do you happen to have heard that they have picked up some one they wanted in the casual ward?—No, I do not remember a case. Our casual wards are a few doors away from the police station. We did endeavour three years ago to get the consent of the chief constable of the county for the police to be appointed assistant relieving officers so that all men would apply to the police for admission. The chief constable of Worcestershire refused permission.

2766. Is that the present chief constable?—No, his predecessor.

2767. You have not tried the present chief constable?—No. They have had that method at Birmingham parish for two years.

2768. The city police are assistant relieving officers there?—I believe that was discontinued two months ago.

2769. Do you know why?—Well; it was not found to offer any advantage; I think that was the reason.

2770. The case of a city would be quite different from the case of country districts from that point of view, would it not?—Oh, yes.

2771. Do you not think there would be more likely to be advantage in the system in the country than in the town?—There would be more advantage, but still it would be an advantage I think in the town if admission to the casual ward were obtained through the police.

2772. You think the present system does a great deal of harm in encouraging vagrancy?—I do, in this way: a man goes on the road without any idea of staying, but he finds it so easy to live by begging, that he stops there.

2773. Suppose there was a way-ticket or certificate system such as you have described, which would provide that every bona fide working man could get a mid-day meal, would you make the indiscriminate giving of alms an offence. Apparently it was a criminal offence in the reign of Richard II., but do you think it would be justifiable to make it a criminal offence now?—I would not like to give my assent to that proposition.

2774. (Mr. Davy.) You said the giving of the mid-day meal would take away from the tramp the excuse for begging?—Yes.

2775. Is that quite the object; is it not rather that it would take away from the indiscriminate almsgiver the excuse for giving?—It would do both. First of all, the man could not assign the reason that he had had no food since his breakfast, and secondly no person could plead, "Well, I gave the man twopence because he had not had any food." It would be known then to everyone.

2776. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) That starts on the assumption that every man who begs has been in the workhouse the previous night?—Oh, yes, we are speaking of the casuals, of course.

2777. (Mr. Davy.) As regards the number of vagrants, is it not clear that they do not all resort to the casual wards?—I think they mostly do at some time or other during their career. When they get away from the large towns it is difficult for them to go elsewhere I should say.

2778. There is no common lodging-house?—No.

2779. Have you many common lodging-houses in your union?—In my own union only one, but in the parish

Mr. Richard J. Curtis. of Birmingham there is a large number; within the city there is a large number.

18 Jan. 1905. 2780. To which I suppose much the same class resort as come to your casual wards?—Yes, undoubtedly in Birmingham.

2781. Do you know how much they pay?—They can get accommodation at as low as twopence a night. There is a Rowton House about to be opened there. There was a company formed two years ago and they will be accommodated there at 4d. per night, but I do not think that will be for the habitual vagrant class; they will not resort there.

2782. Why not?—I think the accommodation will be taken up by men who spend most of the year in Birmingham itself.

2783. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you think the opening of a new common lodging-house does anything to increase the number of vagrants resorting to the locality?—I do not see why it should do.

2784. (Sir William Chance.) Has there been any increase in general pauperism in your union in the last year corresponding with the increase of vagrancy?—No, our rate of general pauperism has decreased.

2785. Would you tell me what the rate of your pauperism is to your population at the present moment, or take the 1st of January last?—I do not carry the figures in my mind, except to be able to say that the last returns showed a slight decrease.

2786. It is considerably lower than the ratio of pauperism in the whole of the country; it is under 26 to the 1,000?—Oh, yes, very much lower.

2787. How has it been in Birmingham?—Birmingham remains much about the same as it has done for the last four or five years.

2788. And Aston?—Aston shows a slight decrease like ourselves.

2789. All those three unions are considered and may properly be described as well-administered unions?—Yes.

2790. That is to say, that they carry out the wishes of the Central Authority at Whitehall?—Yes.

2791. And they are what may be called progressive boards?—Progressive boards, yes; we all three claim to be quite progressive.

2792. In the sense that you carry out the regulations of the Local Government Board?—Yes, certainly.

2793. These figures are very curious; you have a great increase in King's Norton between 1903 and 1904, and a very small increase in the parish of Birmingham; and in Aston nothing like so large as your increase?—Yes.

2794. No doubt you put that increase down to the giving of extra gruel in the morning?—Well, we say partly to that.

2795. Is there any other cause that you can think of which invites vagrants to King's Norton?—No, we have practically failed to find any other reason.

2796. You do not know any other reason at all why they should come to you?—No, our hours of admission are the same, the tasks are practically the same, with the exception of this coal business at Birmingham. We have failed to find any real reason for it.

2797. You have no increase among the women and children anything like corresponding to the increase in the number of men?—No, we have not; that is a curious feature.

2798. Does that show that a considerable number of unmarried men without families have been thrown on the road recently?—That is one of the conclusions which I draw.

2799. Do you think that a man, travelling with his wife and children on the road, might sometimes go into the casual ward and let his wife and children go to the common lodging-house for the night?—I have not heard of that being done.

2800. Has the dietary of the women been altered at all?—No. They had gruel before.

2801. So that there is nothing extra in the diet to invite women to the casual ward?—No, nothing extra, 2802. Nor for the children?—No.

2803. Now as to bathing, do you give each of the vagrants fresh water and bathe them separately?—Yes.

2804. You comply with the regulations in that way?—Yes, in every respect.

2805. As to the certificate, you suggested that it might be obtained from the men's trade society as well as from the police?—Yes.

2806. Do you think that is necessary?—Well, my reason for it is this, that some of the trade societies provide the men themselves with means of getting about. Unless it should be said that the distinction is unnecessarily made, I think I would give a recognised trade society, such as the Boiler Makers' Society, permission to issue this certificate. You may have it, if you like, countersigned by the police, but I think on the whole it would be advisable to give, what I term a recognised trade society permission to issue such a certificate.

2807. You are talking of a man who belongs to a particular society?—Yes.

2808. But, surely, it is not their practice to send a man on the road; would they not send him by rail?—I think in general that is so, but it seems to me there may be instances where the trade society does not do so.

2809. Do you not think it would be rather a dangerous thing?—Members of some of the trade societies walk undoubtedly, and what they have to do if they are walking from Stafford to Birmingham is to call at a particular place in Birmingham and get their card marked.

2810. Do you think the trade society would object to their man going to the police to get his certificate when starting on his journey?—Some of them would undoubtedly object.

2811. But do you see any reason why you should make a distinction between a man belonging to a trade society, and any other man. Do you not think they should all come to the police and get their certificate?—I do not see any harm in a trade society being allowed to give this man a certificate.

2812. You see no harm?—At the same time I do not think that much use would be made of it. I think the trade societies would follow their present practice and enable the man to get to his objective without recourse to the casual wards.

2813. Do the police visit the casual wards at all at King's Norton?—Yes, they go through every now and again.

2814. How often would they do that?—The inspector would call about once a week.

2815. Would he go all through the casual wards?—He would call at the time of admission and see the men who were congregated there in the waiting hall.

2816. He would only see those who were admitted at the particular time at which he called?—I think so.

2817. Do you make any use of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children with regard to the children of tramps; that is to say, when families are leaving, do you notify to the Society to look out for them?—We have done so, but the instances have not been numerous.

2818. You have made use of the Society?—We have made use of this Society in that way.

2819. Have you ever made use of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, for dealing with these children?—No, we have not.

2820. Have you heard of it being used for these children?—No, I have never heard of any such use being made of it.

2821. You are, I believe, in favour of the Bill introduced last year for dealing with these children?—I think that some useful work could be done if the Bill became law.

2822. (Dr. Downes.) I believe the improvement in your dietary rather followed than preceded the increase in the number of your casuals?—Yes, we found that.

2823. So that you do not attribute any very great importance to that improvement?—In face of the increase the board continued the diet as altered.

2824. With regard to your stone breaking, what kind of stone is it that you use?—It is called Rowley Rag.

2825. It is a rag stone ?—Yes.

2826. Are the men regularly examined by the doctor for labour, or only in the case of prosecutions ?—Well, I do not call his walking into the wards an examination. We have a resident doctor who goes into the casual ward most days, and he is connected by telephone with the superintendent, but he does not make an examination of each vagrant; but he does in all cases where they refuse to perform their task.

2827. And is that examination a complete one ?—Yes.

2828. And I think I understood in those cases you had always been successful in your prosecutions ?—Yes.

2829. Now is there any systematic inspection by your medical officer with regard to smallpox in times of prevalence of that disease ?—Yes. I think the fact that we have had no secondary cases except in one case in either of the three wards, shows that our method is effective.

2830. What steps do you take when smallpox occurs in your casual wards ?—The man would be immediately isolated and got away to the smallpox hospital as quickly as possible. Then all the usual steps for disinfection would be taken.

2831. Have you ever closed the wards ?—In our own particular interest, we have a double set; we did on the occasion of the outbreak last year.

2832. You closed your wards to disinfect them ?—Yes.

2833. That, of course, is a dislocation of the tramp relief system ?—As a matter of fact we closed up for a couple of days, I think, and used the old wards.

2834. Do you communicate with the places from which the tramp has come ?—Well, during the last eighteen months that has been done by the medical officers of health, and they trace the cases. In that case of itch which I spoke of, I communicated myself with the clerk of the other board.

2835. Do you get many sick tramps ?—I should think the average admission to the infirmary from the tramp wards would run to about one a week. Some weeks we get two. At yesterday's meeting we had two admissions to the infirmary reported.

2836. You have a separate infirmary, I think ?—Yes.

2837. And there they would be treated as ordinary inmates ?—Oh, quite.

2838. With regard to your Norwich experience, could you give me the date of your visit to Norwich prison ?—The 16th April, 1903.

2839. And I think you said the bedding in the Norwich prison was superior to the bedding in the Norwich casual ward ?—Yes.

2840. Could you give us the details of what the bedding was in the casual ward ?—I can give it you for the prison. I have not a note as to what it was in the casual ward, but my recollection is that it was better in the prison. In the prison it was a fibre bed, two blankets, a pillow, two sheets, and a rug.

2841. And what was your bedding at King's Norton in your casual wards ?—I am afraid I have not the details.

2842. (Sir William Chance.) Is it as good as at Norwich prison ?—I should say so, yes; most of ours are hammocks.

2843. (Dr. Downes.) Have you any free shelters in your neighbourhood that might account for the increase of casuals ?—There are two, I think, in the centre of the city of Birmingham, but I do not think that they would account for the increase of casuals; they are very small.

2844. You said that a certificate might be given by a recognised trade society; I did not quite know what you implied by "recognised" ?—There is a number of trade societies which are recognised; they are registered as trade societies.

2845. (Sir William Chance.) Trade unions ?—They might be registered under the Friendly Societies Act.

2846. (Dr. Downes.) Yes; I only wanted to know what the definition is ?—I think I would limit it to registered trade society.

2847. Now there are some men who do not want to belong to trade unions, and yet who might object to go to the police for a certificate ?—This need not be a trade union; a trade society could be different to a trade union, I think.

2848. Would a free labour association be a trade society if registered ?—Yes.

2849. And that would come within your definition ?—Yes.

2850. Can you give a suggestion as to how a greater uniformity in the management of the casual wards might be obtained ?—I think the first step would be to remove the charge from being a local one, to have a great deal more inspection of the work of the guardians in this matter. I think if the State paid the cost, they would see that the work was done properly in all unions, as it undoubtedly is in a great many now, but there is a large number of unions where it is not; that, I think, most people will admit.

2851. And you think it is the incidence of the local charge which prevents a good many of the boards complying with the regulations ?—I think so.

2852. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) You said you had ten prosecutions only ?—In that year.

2853. And you attributed getting convictions to the careful examination by the doctor ?—Yes, I think so.

2854. Are there many men you would charge with refusing to work examined by the doctor and found unfit ?—Yes, we have some.

2855. The doctor examines them ?—The doctor examines them, and if he exempts them we give them something else to do.

2856. How many of those cases would you have ?—I should think quite as many as we prosecuted, another ten, quite.

2857. (Captain Showers.) I think you considered the co-operation of the police at the workhouse was a good thing as regards the tramps ?—Yes.

2858. You also approve of the police acting as relieving officers ?—Yes, I think that would be found advantageous, if they were assistant relieving officers for the purpose of giving orders of admission.

2859. Do you think it desirable to have notices put up by the police on the route where tramps are usually found to warn them that they will be prosecuted for begging ?—Yes, it might have some good effect, but I do not think the average tramp cares much for any printed notice. He goes on his way regardless of printed notices and regulations.

2860. As regards the gruel, do you make the gruel overnight for the next day, or do you make it fresh in the morning ?—I am afraid I cannot answer that.

2861. We have had it stated that it is made overnight and is sour in the morning, and that the tramps throw it away ?—There has been no complaint from our casuals as to this.

2862. Do you have a female officer to receive females as they come in ?—Yes; she is the wife of the superintendent.

2863. Is there a woman in the porter's lodge to take all the particulars from the females before they go into the casual wards ?—There are two entrance halls with an office in the centre and a window open on either side. The women are admitted on the one side and the men are admitted on the other. The women are kept in separate waiting halls.

2864. (Mr. Davy.) You say the guardians would be willing to adopt the children if the cost of maintenance fell on the county ?—If it did not fall on the union.

2865. What would you do with the parents of those children ?—Well, under the present law we could do something for the children if the cost was removed from the union.

2866. Is that not a suggestion that the cost should be removed from the union ?—Oh, exactly.

2867. That would entail fresh legislation, would it not ?—Yes, I recognise that.

2868. Would you have any special legislation for dealing with the parents of those children, or would you simply relieve them of their children ?—If the law is to be altered

Mr. Richard J. Curtis. in that respect for the benefit of the child, I should adopt the child and let the parent go.

18 Jan. 1905. 2869. Let the parent go?—Just as in many instances where the children are adopted under the Act of 1899; the parent gets scot free, I should say, in the majority of cases.

2870. Although the law gives a claim against them?—It gives a claim; we have obtained numerous orders against the father, but it is most difficult to get any money under the order.

2871. An order against the habitual tramp would not be of much use?—I do not think it would be of any use at all.

2872. The certificates you suggest should be given by trade societies would entitle a man to a night's lodging and food the next day on discharge?—Yes.

2873. Do you think it expedient to bring the members of trade unions into direct contact with poor law relief in that way?—The object of including them is rather this, to avoid the complaint on the part of men who were members of trade societies that they should have to go to the police if they wished to resort to a casual ward, or there was need for them to do so, having once become a member of a trade society. I do not think myself there would be very much use made of such a certificate.

2874. Do you think it expedient even to propose such a thing by a legal enactment?—I do not see any grave objection to it. You see, they would come of their own free will.

2875. It would be poor law relief, would it not?—I put it in this way, it is a certificate for the man to be on the road; if he wished to obtain a night's lodging at the rate-payers' expense he must comply with the conditions which are imposed; if not, he has the certificate to pass him along the road.

2876. But it is poor law relief?—Oh, yes, it is poor law relief, undoubtedly.

2877. And is not the object of trade societies and benefit societies to keep a man off the poor law?—Certainly.

2878. Does this not give him facilities for coming under the poor law and becoming a pauper?—Not greater than he at present possesses.

2879. It gives him special facilities?—With or without facilities he does come under the poor law.

2880. He becomes a pauper with special privileges, such as early discharge, does he not?—Yes.

2881. Supposing a man is going to work at some water works, does he go there for our benefit, or for his own, or for the benefit of the employer; does not the employer want labour?—Yes.

2882. Why should you subsidise the employer at the ratepayers' expense?—Well, it is rather a question of dealing with the case. We find that these men do use the road to get to these large works; the employers somehow seem to get along without them, at the same time when men hear of works they go there. In actual experience men who came to the reservoir, tramps from some other water works or some other big construction job, came in the hope of getting work, and many of them found work and most of them used the casual wards.

2883. Is it not a well known fact that tramps who go to those large public works do so not to find work but to prey upon the navvies?—Well, of course, one hears of that, but at the same time many of them do work; they are workmen and they use the road in order to get there. They do not save sufficient money to pay their railway fare, and they have no other way of getting to the new work.

2884. You appreciate the point of principle which I raise?—Absolutely; I quite agree with you. I see some difficulty in a trade society giving this certificate, but it is rather for the purpose of avoiding any complaint from them "What about our people? Why should you make them go to the police, if they wish to get from Birmingham to Liverpool?"

2885. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you not think you can put it in another way: the law requires the man who obtains relief at a casual ward to do a certain task; but it is also recognised that if he can show that he is a genuine working man really in search of work he may be exempted from that task?—Yes.

2887. (Chairman.) Do you not think that from time to time the man would need to have his ticket viséd?—Yes.

2888. It must be marked by the police; he cannot go to an official of his union?—No, it is only for the issuing of his certificate.

2889. So that he has to go to the police in the end. To sum up in a very few words the suggestions you have been putting forward to us in your excellent evidence: in the first place, I think you want more uniformity in the treatment of the vagrants with regard to baths, search, and task?—Yes.

2890. And then you want a classification of casuals?—Yes.

2891. Then you are strongly in favour of having a system of way-ticket or certificate general all over England, and you would like to see greater uniformity of punishment, where punishment is awarded?—Yes; and I think an attempt should be made to ascertain those men who are termed habituals by placing the suspects under a license. We have heard of them ever since I have been an official; I would like to find out who they are, and mark them.

2892. In fact, it would be a sort of ticket-of-leave?—Yes.

The Rev. ARTHUR S. THOMPSON, B.D., called; and Examined.

The Rev. Arthur S. Thompson, B.D. 2893. (Chairman.) You are, I believe, the vice-chairman of the Wycombe board of guardians?—Yes.

2894. And you have been a guardian for some time?—Twelve years.

18 Jan. 1905. 2895. In your union is there a large number of vagrants?—Not a very large number. Since we appointed a labour master about ten months ago that has tended to reduce them—the extra accuracy and strictness in requiring the work to be done; it acts as a discouragement.

2896. In other words, he enforces the task, I suppose?—Yes, that is so. Before that, we had a master and porter and no functionary whose special charge it was to watch the vagrants at their work day by day and hour by hour. The effect of a strict exaction of the task is that they are discouraged from coming, as far as we can make out.

2897. May I ask what your task is?—Nothing but stone breaking.

2898. Stone breaking?—Yes, we did attempt a sort of labour colony in the sense of taking in an area of ground about twelve acres and trying to utilise all those vagrants with agricultural capacities or aptitudes. We did that before we established the labour master, and the experiment broke down from the fact that there was no sufficient supervision, or that there was no machinery by which the work could be carefully carried out. In the judgment of our master, a man of experience who has been with us some twenty-five years, the experiment broke down from the vagrants being free to leave whenever they liked. If we could have bound them to the experiment, say for a fortnight or three weeks, the result would have been very much better. When they got fractious and discontented after a day or two, they wanted to move off and there was no power on our side to prevent them; therefore they went away and the experiment was not a success.

2899. In other words, the casual is not a person to employ upon, say, farm labour?—No, not without more supervision and more discipline than we have got at present at our service.

2900. If you are only going to keep him there for the two nights, we will say, and you put a spade into his hand to work one day?—Yes, it does not answer.

2901. The first thing he alleges is that he is not used to spade labour?—Yes.

2902. He has got to learn, and the result is you get little or nothing out of him?—Yes, there is a percentage of men who have been used to agricultural labour, but who have drifted up to town, and from taking labour in town have become disqualified; the muscles of their backs are relaxed and in various ways they are disqualified.

2903. Are there other tasks?—There is practically no other task but stone breaking; there is a little oakum picking, but it is very slightly carried on.

2904. Do you have any wood sawing?—No.

2905. I daresay you know that is one of the tasks?—We burn very little wood in our establishment, and have no way of using it up. That is a point to which I have given a good deal of attention with a view of trying to get extra work put on.

2906. Wood sawing has been suggested to us as a task in which there is no skill required. You put two men on at the ends of a cross-cut saw?—I think it would be very desirable labour, but you see you must have a market for wood.

2907. We have been told that old sleepers have been sawn and afterwards made into excellent firewood?—Yes.

2908. That is one of the tasks. You have never tried that?—No, I have talked about it, but I have never got it. The view is there is no market for it. May I say a word or two as to what is the basis of the problem?

2909. Certainly?—I think the basis of the problem is a defective classification of the tramps. I think as a rule the common differentiation of the tramp is not that which is found through the whole class. I should say that the class of tramps submitted to us, dealt with by the Poor Law as tramps, cover three distinct sets of people. One, I should put down as the hereditary or professional tramp, towards whom a severe régime is desirable, and even a more severe régime than is exercised at present. And then besides that, I think there is a large class of itinerant unemployed, who can be rescued, who might be rescued under more methodical treatment, to whom the method of discipline ought to be relaxed up to a certain point, only relaxed in a sort of provisional and temporary way until an opportunity has been found for testing them at work that they could do. Then I think the third class is the social derelict, the feeble imbecile incapable person who will be on our hands whatever we do. But I think if we could so reorganise our method of treatment as to eliminate from it this middle class—the itinerant unemployed—we should do two good things. We should remove the peril of uneducated sympathy which at present promotes and extends and perpetuates the tramp class, and in the other case, we could justify ourselves before public opinion for severer measures than have been hitherto found necessary to be taken towards the professional tramp.

2910. That is class one?—Yes. That there is a class of remedial poverty and remedial unemployment that comes upon us in the tramp wards, I have not any doubt at all; I have watched it for some years now. At present we have no machinery to help them by, and if, as very often happens, their very independence makes them ruder and rougher to the master over them than the habitual tramp, they are the people who get into trouble and are drafted off into gaol. A man who has been in the workhouse a good deal said to me when I asked him how he was getting on, "Oh, you are all right, sir, as long as you let the governor know he is boss." That, broadly speaking, is the principle which prevails amongst these tramps. If they are elastic enough only to let the governor know he is the boss and not to come into conflict with the authorities, they get on all right. If a man shows any independence or is rude and says he is not going to do that filthy work, and so on, he gets into trouble and drifts into the criminal class, though representing, morally and personally, a higher class than the other.

2911. That is the man who would work, if work were obtainable and offered to him?—Yes.

2912. As to a man in the second class, your object would be that there should be work obtained for him wherever possible; that there should be information about work?—Yes. Now may I go on to one other point?

2913. Yes?—In order that this may be done, I should think that some new administrative action was wanted. I do not think there is any existing system, as far as I know, under our Poor Law administration, which allows of those two excellent things, the keeping of a personal register of the men which you would do by "way-ticket" or passport—something of that sort—and also for giving him the opportunity of learning where labour is going on. I have no doubt you have had your attention as a Committee called to the valuable Report by the Board of Trade on "Agencies and Methods for Dealing with the Unemployed in certain Foreign Countries." It seems to me, if we had patience and courage enough to follow out some of those indications, we should have a very fair chance of good results: first by the registration of labour and by the circulation of information of that sort to labour bureaux, as they are called here: then by keeping a more personal hold on the more promising individuals, and getting co-ordination among the different unions, so that the record of a man could stand him in good stead, not only in the union where he stopped for one night, but in the one to which he went afterwards.

2914. Or in bad stead?—Yes, if it is bad stead. He very often benefits; the ticket would represent the privilege, and he would very soon forfeit that and be brought down to a lower class.

2915. I think you mentioned a way-ticket. We have had evidence both from Gloucestershire and Wiltshire on this subject. Those are the two counties where the way-ticket system is now in existence. I think you would probably agree that to make the way-ticket effective, it must be general?—General all over the country; there is no object in one or two or three single unions trying it.

2916. But I understand you to say that if the system were made general, it would be effective?—I do. I have lived in Russia, and have been brought up to a large extent on the passport system. There may be much to be said against it, but it has much to do with keeping up the personal respect of the individual to have some record kept of his history.

2917. Can you at all suggest to the Committee the form the way-ticket should take?—I think there is a very good form suggested in this Report of the Board of Trade.

2918. What should be the office of origin; should it be the workhouse or the police station?—I should say of the two it had better be the police station.

2919. Why?—Because the communication between police stations is more complete, more under control than it is between workhouses.

2920. Where circumstances permit of it you would have a police station rather than a workhouse?—I think so.

2921. The geographical conditions might point to the workhouse?—They might, if the police station was not near the workhouse. In regard to the form of ticket, I think the particulars which we have laid before us about Wilhelmsdorf on page 30 of the Report give a most admirable scheme.

2922. Have you anything more to say on the way-ticket?—No I do not think I have. I know that a great many individual guardians doubt its value, and I think a good many masters of workhouses doubt its value, because they have never been brought into any system of co-ordination with their neighbouring unions, and they pride themselves on being superior. They decline being put into communication with unions which they think administer on a lower method than they do. Then if they are possessed, as some unions are, with an idea that there are all sorts of fads going about and they understand everything that is really wanted, and they have got nothing to learn, they resist it on the ground that

The
Rev. Arthur
S. Thompson,
B.D.

18 Jan. 1905.

The Rev. Arthur S. Thompson, B.D.
18 Jan. 1905. they do not want to be raised to an impracticable and theoretical level. I fancy that is the feeling. I have had communications from three or four of the neighbouring unions, and I should say (perhaps it is a mere piece of self-assertion, but I should say) the Wycombe union has gone more fully and more comprehensively into this question than any one of the other unions.

2923. Have you had an increase of casuals during the last year or so?—No, just the opposite; we are fewer now, but the general testimony is that it is due to the exercise of a severe régime in supervising the task of work.

2924. You know of course that generally throughout England there has been an increase during the last year and a half?—Yes, there has been an increase.

2925. But that has not been the case with your union?—No.

2926. And you attribute that to more regularity with regard to treatment and punishment?—Yes, I think that is largely the explanation. I do not think it is a very satisfactory explanation, but I think it is the chief explanation.

2927. How many men in the course of the year have you prosecuted?—I have not got the exact statistics, but I should say we have prosecuted none except for refusing work and tearing up their clothes, and for that there is about one a quarter, say four a year.

2928. And what sentence is given, as a rule?—Fifteen days.

2929. Fifteen days?—They go to Reading, and on the moment of their going there there is a vast improvement in their diet. If you look at the comparative dietary, you will see how much better they are fed as soon as they get into prison, than they are as tramps. That is the Reading scale of feeding (exhibiting document).

2930. Of course, the diet is the same all over the country for the prison?—That is the comparison of the two, and it shows that if a man is merely engaged looking after his stomach he would wish to be condemned to a short imprisonment as soon as he can. He probably has not any moral sensitiveness which makes it a great shock to him.

2931. The improvement in the prison diet was the addition of the porridge?—That is very proper.

2932. Otherwise there would not have been any material difference?—No.

2933. And you think that the improvement in the dietary in the matter of the porridge is what has made the prison more popular?—Where there is good behaviour my view is in favour of giving an improved diet. There is one other point upon which I should like to speak, if I might be allowed; that is in regard to the children.

2934. Yes, if you please?—I think that without materially breaking down parental responsibility, or making our action or administration stimulate the tramp habit, we might take charge of the children more than we do. We have got in our union a most admirable poor law school, in a most healthy place, with possibilities of extension, and much more room than we are occupying, and very often when we send away these poor little wretched children, who we know are under no system of education—no system of proper feeding—upon the tramp, one's heart goes down to one's boots over it. It seems so melancholy, in all human probability to be training them up not only to vice, but to the habit of the tramp, and such as it is, to the ease belonging to the tramp life; and if we could cut off that supply I think the peril of breaking the parental responsibility, or making tramping easier, would be a far less anxious question of social economy than it is under present circumstances.

2935. Do you send many of those children to the industrial schools?—No, we cannot.

2936. It depends upon whether they come within the conditions of the Industrial Schools Act?—I am afraid they would not, as merely belonging to the tramps and spending a night or two with us.

2937. Not where the parents are not criminals?—If there was any case of that sort injurious to life or health in their actual treatment, I suppose we might take action then, but not otherwise.

2938. The Industrial Schools Act is very clear in its language?—I think I know its provisions, but you must have some evidence of mismanagement by the parents of the children; otherwise you cannot get at them.

2939. You mean they are children of persons who are not criminals, but whose manner of life is such that the child is not likely to turn out otherwise than badly?—Yes. If we had anything like the passport or the way-ticket system, so as to be able to register a tramp, and "habit" is established for a certain period, I think the law might make that adequate for the removal of the children from the custody of their parents.

2940. Yes, it might. But I am afraid in the House of Commons there would be a good deal said about the liberty of the subject?—Yes, that is our central difficulty; until we can break down that "liberty of the subject," we can do no good at all.

2941. (Mr. Davy.) You think then the very fact that a child is on the road is sufficient reason for taking that child away from its parents?—Yes, if its being on the road is not merely a temporary action, but represents a habit.

2942. Though the child may be perfectly healthy, well fed, and well clad?—Yes.

2944. Let me give a concrete case; a woman I know very well passes the winter in the workhouse. In the spring she cannot endure to be shut up any more, and she goes out to work in the fields taking her five children with her; she works for the same employers year after year, during the whole of the summer. The children go round with her; they play about in the fields while she is working; some of them do hop-picking. When the autumn comes on and work in the fields is slack, she goes back to the workhouse, and her children go back with her. Would you in that case take the children away from her, although, so far as we know at present, they are well fed, well clad, and well cared for?—I should take her into the workhouse, and teach them in the winter when the mother is there, and I would keep them there when the mother goes out, or, where possible, send them to a school.

2945. You realise there may be a difference of opinion about it?—Perfectly. I have taken a great deal of interest in our poor law school, and though it is just altering its position—all these schools are passed over to the supervision of the Board of Education—there is strong pressure being put upon us, which I hope will be successful, for the children to be sent to the national schools.

2946. (Chairman.) The school you are mentioning to us is a poor law school?—Yes, it is.

2947. It is not a national school in the ordinary sense of the word?—No, the children live there altogether.

2948. You wish that the child should be detained there?—Yes, that we should be able to move over a larger area to supply these excellent schools, and that those children who become the mere breeding ground of tramps should be cut off.

2949. (Mr. Davy.) Would you prefer that they should go into the ordinary poor law schools, or be sent to the industrial schools under the Industrial Schools Act?—I think that it is better on the whole that they should go to the ordinary poor law school; they are not so large.

2950. Could not your whole object be attained if the guardians were to adopt those children under the Poor Law Act, 1899?—Yes, I cannot get the clerk of my board to interpret that Act as giving us permission; I have tried it two or three times.

2951. Has the fact that the cost of the support of the children of vagrants who have no settlement would fall on your union, had something to do with his view?—Of course it has.

2952. If the cost of those children were made a county charge, possibly the point of view might change?—Yes, that is very likely.

2953. Under the Industrial Schools Act any child that is "found wandering and not having any home or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence" may be sent to an industrial school. Well, now, some magistrates have held that that applies to all tramp children. They have no home, or settled place of abode, or visible means of subsistence?—Yes.

2954. Do you think that is so when they are with their parents or nominal parents?—No, I think our clerk would argue that the position of the children was covered by the recognition of the parents.

2955. (Sir William Chance.) Do you think that the parent ought to be punished if he habitually tramps about with the children on the road; of course under this Act you can take away the children undoubtedly?—Yes.

2956. But the parent, the responsible person, goes scot free?—Yes; well, I do not see a way to punish the parent, unless there has been some wrong action towards the children, other than their wandering about.

2957. (Chairman.) You wish to say something as to the effect of the prison labour tests and the tasks given to vagrants?—Well, I touched on that just now in saying the difficulty lies in this, that it is not the worst set of vagrants that we have to deal with, or the most hopeless who resist the kind of labour that is put upon them. Therefore, if we could once believe that this pressure was undue in their case, and find another avenue of activity for them, we should do two good things. We should improve them instead of deteriorating them, and we should remove from ourselves the necessity of so many prosecutions and so much legal action as we have now. I think your idea of wood sawing that you put just now is a very practical one.

2958. We had brought before us yesterday a system which is in force at the Cuckfield casual wards, of pounding stones in a mortar, and in that way getting very fine stuff. The result was that from stone which cost them 9s. a ton they could sell the result at 15s. a ton. Have you heard of that task?—When I was acting as chaplain to the East Preston union, when vicar of Arundel in Sussex, they did that there; they crushed the stone.

2959. It depends a good deal on the stone; it is water-worn boulders that they crush at Cuckfield, and it makes a very good concrete, and it may be used for other things; but you do not use that as a labour test?—No.

2960. Have you any other point?—The only other point is in regard to the dissemination of disease. My master whom I consulted about this, and the medical officer, both say that the peril of communication of disease through the tramp ward is far less than it is in the common lodging-house. In the case of the tramp to whom smallpox or anything of that sort has been communicated, in their experience it has always been through those living in common lodging-houses. They are turned out of the common lodging-houses when the disease has declared itself, and they sometimes try to get admission to the workhouse, but the mischief is occasioned in the common lodging-house.

2961. Do you invariably subject the vagrants to a bath?—Yes, invariably.

2962. And a search?—Yes, but invariably to a bath. Lately we have rigged up some very comfortable baths. We do not give them cold baths, we give them tepid baths.

2963. And you recognise that it is a good preventive to any chance of communication of disease, because by the man having his bath you ascertain whether he is suffering from any contagious disease?—Yes.

2964. Because I am afraid some workhouses do not?—Our master says that he thinks it extremely desirable that the attention of the medical officers of the house should be called more definitely to the tramps, and they should have more frequent opportunities of examining them than they have at present. Very often he detains a man; I should think 10 per cent. of our tramps are detained for medical care, because they come in in such a disordered state of health.

2965. Have you some officer in the workhouse who sees the man when he either goes in or comes out of his bath?—Yes.

2966. So as to be able to detect any signs of disease?—Yes, our labour master is in and out, and the man who acts as a bath attendant, but is really an inmate, is a trustworthy and reliable man.

2967. And he does habitually observe the man so as to detect if there is anything wrong with him?—Yes, he has instructions to do so.

2968. What is your view with regard to any provision of a mid-day meal; the absence of a mid-day meal makes it almost compulsory on a man to beg?—Yes, it does.

2969. Very good; if you could provide a mid-day meal for a man, then it does away with the necessity?—You see if they are going out, they go out directly after breakfast.

2970. Well, they can hardly walk fifteen miles without getting something to stay their hunger with in the meantime?—No.

2971. Have you considered any plan of providing for that?—I have not. Our master is extremely considerate, and when there is a case of fairly decent people, and there is a wife and some little children, he always sends them away with some food in their pockets.

2972. Do you know the Gloucestershire system; the way-ticket there involves a provision of eight ounces of bread in the middle of the day?—I know that; it is very desirable, indeed.

2973. Would you favour that idea?—I favour it distinctly. It is very much better than that the invitation should be given to those tramps to cadge about the back doors of peoples' houses.

2974. It seems rather hard that you should convict a man of begging when you send him out in the morning early, and do not give him any provision till night?—Yes.

2975. Consequently, if you could have some means of providing a mid-day meal, you feel it would be a right thing to do?—Yes, I should feel it would be a right thing.

2976. You mentioned labour colonies; have you had any experience of them?—I have been to see Tannenlof, in Switzerland. I have never been to Merxplas; I have read very carefully the report about Merxplas, but I have not been there.

2977. What is the length of detention in the Swiss colony?—I do not think there is a fixed period.

2978. (Mr. Davy.) That is a voluntary colony, is it not?—Yes.

2979. (Chairman.) You have no doubt formed an opinion as to whether on the whole it appeared satisfactory or otherwise?—It looked very wholesome.

2980. Did the inmates seem to be contented?—Yes, quite cheerful and quite communicative.

2981. Did you see what the meals were?—Yes, I was there during dinner.

2982. Did the meals seem adequate?—Yes, I think so. They have a lot of tins; everything in the way of soup; they have no solid meat, or knives and forks that I saw.

2983. But did the inhabitants look fairly well nourished?—Perfectly well. These people are so very much more tractable, and so very much more easy to deal with than our people.

2984. In Switzerland the vagrant, as we look upon him, is hardly known?—That is so.

2985. (Mr. Davy.) I gather from your evidence that you think that the condition precedent to all reform is some sort of co-ordination between the local authorities?—Yes, I do; I speak very strongly about that.

2986. Would you not say there should be some sort of co-ordination between the guardians and the police and the magistrates?—Yes; much more than there is now; there is a sort of antagonistic feeling now.

2987. And that antagonistic feeling, you think, is mischievous?—I think it is mischievous. The police authorities and magistrates rather like to find fault with anything that they think is a severe point of administration in the workhouse. They like rather to play to the gallery, if I may say so without offence, in not taking the stern view which has been correctly taken from full experience of the mass of the individuals in the workhouse; therefore, the effective or restrictive action which poor law officers take is so far checked that it becomes discouraged.

2988. Could you tell me what in your opinion is the difference between a voluntary colony such as you have

*The
Rev. Arthur
S. Thompson,
B.D.*

18 Jan. 1905.

The Rev. Arthur S. Thompson, B.D. in Germany, such as there is at Wilhelmsdorf for instance, and an ordinary English country workhouse? —A voluntary colony; do you mean where they are not assigned for a limited time?

18 Jan. 1905. 2989. The Arbeiter Kolonien, in Germany, are purely voluntary; a man may leave when he likes, at one day's notice?—I should say the organization of labour. The rural workhouse has no organisation of labour at all. The task there is a sort of penalty, not much more productive than the treadmill, and having to do it presents no interest for a man in his work whatever. Unless you can supply some sort of interest or some sort of ambition in regard to the work done, I think the task is a demoralising thing.

2990. You would say the main difference between a German labour colony and an English country workhouse is that in the former case the labour is much more organised?—Yes, I should say so.

2991. Apparently there is no other difference?—There are great varieties; in most of the colonies there is some little industry.

2992. There is the great difference that those in the German colony and in the Swiss colony get a small payment per day?—Yes, and there are a few more varieties of work.

2993. Now, will you tell me what in your judgment is the difference between a penal colony such as Merxplas and a prison?—It is an outdoor prison.

2994. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) A convict prison, not a local prison?—Yes. The conditions of work are the same at a lunatic asylum. I am on the visiting committee of the Stone county lunatic asylum. The condition as to liberty in work is almost exactly the same.

2995. (Mr. Davy.) There is voluntary admission?—Yes, and they have their rewards.

2996. (Sir William Chance.) There has been no increase of vagrancy in your union recently?—No, not in our union.

2997. Do you carry out the regulations of the Local Government Board?—Yes, I think we do.

2998. You detain two nights as far as you can?—Yes, I think we do.

2999. Do you bathe each vagrant separately when they come in?—Yes, that is our rule.

3000. Have there been any complaints against your union in regard to the reduction of the number of your tramps, which I understand is due to your appointing a labour master?—A more rigorous labour test has been imposed.

3001. Has there been any complaint that you have turned vagrants on to other unions?—Nothing of that sort has occurred at all. I have the statement of the master of our workhouse that no hardship has been found and the result is that they go to places less vigilant.

3002. Exactly; you have had no complaints from those places?—No complaint has reached us from those places.

3003. How far do you employ the police in the matter of looking after vagrants?—Very valuable assistance is given by the police, and I believe an understanding is come to that the police are to visit the workhouse daily, if possible.

3004. And is that done?—That is the order given. I should not say it was done quite literally.

3005. What do you think would be the effect of that?—The country constable is a very sociable person.

3006. Would it tend to reduce the number of vagrants visiting the casual wards?—No.

3007. You do not attribute your decrease to that?—No, not at all; there is no great terror in it.

3008. Have you a branch of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children near you?—Yes, we have got an extremely good and active agent at Slough.

3009. Do you give any notice to the Society when a family leaves the workhouse?—Our clerk has in two instances within the last six months.

3010. And do you know what the result has been?—No, I know nothing about the result.

3011. Do you not think you might utilise the society in regard to these children?—I think we might very well; at the same time I think they should bring some supervision to bear. But I do not think they possess any plan by which the children are to be watched or dealt with. They should look out and ask whether they could be sent to school or what was to be done with them, I think.

3012. (Dr. Downes.) How long is it since you appointed a labour master?—My impression is that he has been appointed about ten months now.

3013. Has there been any reduction in the number of women and children who come to your casual wards?—That I cannot tell you; I have not analysed the returns.

3014. Who receives the women at your casual wards?—The porter receives both men and women.

3015. Have you any female officer?—No; no female superintendent of the tramp wards, but the master delegates a suitable woman to attend to the women and children on arrival.

3016. (Mr. Davy.) How many inmates have you?—We have got now about 260. The workhouse is fuller than it has been since it was first built.

3017. (Dr. Downes.) Does your medical officer reside near the workhouse?—He resides at Wycombe which is five miles from it. His rule is to pay a visit three days a week.

3018. And in the case of a prosecution of a man for refusing to work is there an examination of the man by the medical officer?—There would be if he claimed it: if he described himself as incapable.

3019. Only if he claimed it?—I do not suppose there would be otherwise. If they said their shoulders were bad, or they were ruptured or something, they would be examined the moment the medical officer came.

3020. Have you been able to arrange for any systematic examination by the medical officer as against smallpox?—No, I do not think I can say we have; but, as I said just now, we have not had a single case of smallpox arising out of our tramp ward, though we have had three or four from lodging-houses within the district of Wycombe and Marlow.

3021. Do you happen to know how many lodging-houses there are within your district?—It is very difficult to say. The probability is that there are four or five in Wycombe and about three in Marlow. Marlow is a town of 6,000 or 7,000 inhabitants: Wycombe a town of 17,000. They are the two largest towns within our area.

3022. With regard to your recommendation of personal registration, would you expect that to help the bona fide wayfarer?—I should think it would do so if it were connected with a system of labour registration, and there was some system of a clearing house to communicate about work and applications for work from one place to another.

3023. If a man had a good character, the record of it ought to be of assistance to him?—Yes. That ought to enlist the better class of these people to a favourable view of the system if it were carried out.

3024. Do you anticipate any objection being raised to a system of personal inspection, such as its being an infringement of the liberty of the subject?—I should expect that rather to come out after it had been tried for a certain time, but I do not think it would meet us at the beginning. I should say that because it is the sort of criticism which was levelled against the Charity Organization Society, that it was an inquisitorial affair.

3025. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) You say there is a medical examination, if the man claims it?—Yes.

3026. If he does not claim it he would not be examined; he would come before the magistrates without being examined?—Yes.

3027. You have only had four prosecutions in the year?—That is about the number.

3028. Have you formed any idea as to what are the proportions of the three classes of vagrants you have suggested?—My idea is that there would be from 20 to 25 per cent.—not quite a quarter of them—who might be put down in that second class.

3029. The real working men ?—The actual unemployed.

3030. And then the other two divisions, how would you divide them ?—Oh, I think we may have 50 per cent. of those called derelicts.

3031. Then you put 25 per cent. for the habitual tramp ?—Something of that kind, broadly speaking.

3032. 25 per cent. of the honest, and 50 per cent. of the cripples ?—Yes, but I should like to take the record for some years before answering confidently.

3033. Oh, yes, it is only an idea ?—I think something of that sort. Of course, there are the fairly respectable tramps who find their way to a conversation with somebody at the manor house, or with the butler at the back door, and who wake up that kind of sympathy with a class that makes it difficult for us to deal with.

3034. (Chairman.) And probably the fact of their not being provided with food in the middle of the day under the present arrangement is no small argument in their favour for begging during the day ?—Undoubtedly, but I might say it does not bear exactly upon the question of classification.

3035. (Captain Showers.) Do you find it is a good thing for the police to visit the workhouse ?—I have never heard the slightest difficulty in regard to it. Our labour master was in the police force himself.

The Rev. Arthur S. Thompson, B.D.

3036. Are your police assistant relieving officers as they are in some counties ?—No. The tramp ward is just beyond the borough, so it is only the county police who have to do with us.

3037. You find it a very good thing, I take it ?—Yes, we have no difficulty with them at all. What my master says is that the relations are very good indeed.

3038. You prosecute tramps for certain offences ?—Yes, tearing up their clothes and refusing to do their tasks.

3039. What sentences do the magistrates give ?—Short sentences ; fifteen days is a very common sentence.

3040. Is that the highest ?—I should think it is.

3041. (Sir William Chance.) Is your workhouse on a main road ?—That is a very important question in regard to the use made of it by tramps. It is on the road between Wycombe and Aylesbury.

3042. Is it a road much frequented by vagrants ?—Yes, fairly so, I should say ; it goes to Aylesbury, and Oxford lies in that direction.

NINTH DAY.

Thursday, 23rd February, 1905.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair).

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.
Captain SHOWERS.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary).

Dr. HENRY E. ARMSTRONG, called ; and Examined.

3043. (Chairman.) You are the medical officer of health of Newcastle-on-Tyne ?—I am, sir.

3044. I believe you have held that office some long time ?—Thirty-two years.

3045. You have made a study of the question of infectious diseases, particularly of smallpox, in relation to vagrancy ?—Yes, rather a close study.

3046. And you have kindly come to us to-day to give us the benefit of your experience and opinion on that subject ?—Yes.

3047. Would you like to deal with infectious diseases generally, or confine yourself at first to smallpox ?—I am quite at your disposal, sir. My report of last year, of which you have had copies, is confined to smallpox. It is the second one I have made on that disease in relation to vagrancy. I made one in 1893. As medical officer of health of Newcastle, I have had the opportunity of observing the effects of vagrancy on the spread of other diseases in a variety of ways. I had, thirty-five or forty years ago, considerable experience of typhus, but I was not medical officer of health at that time.

3048. But you were practising ?—I was in public practice at the dispensary in Newcastle, where I had a good opportunity of judging, and I was also medical officer to the fever hospital where the typhus cases came. Happily we have got clear of typhus now, and the occasion for the study of it with regard to tramps does not exist.

3049. Have you anything to say as to the cause of our getting rid of typhus ?—The measures taken by sanitary authorities throughout the Kingdom have helped very largely. It used to be extremely prevalent, going back as far as 1866. It was one of the most serious diseases we had. I think the action of sanitary authorities in isolating cases and providing hospital accommodation has, in fact, abolished it.

Dr. Henry E. Armstrong.
23 Feb. 1905.

3050. And as regards casual wards, has there been special attention paid to it ?—Yes, there has been, sir.

3051. In improved sanitary arrangements ?—Yes.

3052. Now perhaps you will deal with the special subject of smallpox ?—I have had abundant opportunity in preparing the material for my report of ascertaining what effect the vagrant has had upon the spread of disease. The effect of the tramps in spreading disease throughout the land has been, I may almost say, astounding.

3053. What was your own experience at Newcastle-on-Tyne, for instance ?—The first experience I had in this matter was about ten to twelve years ago, in the large epidemic that we had then, and the first case that brought my attention to the matter was a couple of tramps coming into the workhouse from Liverpool. They had tramped all the way, and they had smallpox on them. They had stopped at various casual wards, and at one casual ward, they told me, where they stopped, twelve men had had a bath in the same water.

3054. They being part of the twelve ?—Yes ; but though they had got the disease on them it had not developed at the time ; a few days would have made all the difference in the spread of the disease. They all used the same water, and it happily did not have any ill effect ; but that set me on to the subject of the effect of tramps.

3055. Then were you able to isolate them before they became infectious ?—They were discovered in the casual ward, as having smallpox, and I removed them.

Dr. Henry E. Armstrong. They did not do any actual damage in the workhouse, but they might have easily come to the workhouse with smallpox upon them.

23 Feb. 1905.

3056. I suppose they were removed to an isolation hospital and treated there?—Yes. That was the first case I had. My attention was directed to the matter then. Afterwards I sent out to my fellow medical officers of health of the large towns a set of queries for information; and I then gathered material, which formed the report which I published in 1893 on the epidemic at that time. That led to the London county council calling a meeting of the urban sanitary authorities of England and Wales, and they issued a report on the subject in 1894.

3057. Ten years ago?—Yes. A series of resolutions was passed by that conference and sent to the Local Government Board; those resolutions bore on the subject of vagrancy, but so far as I know, in the country, no result followed.

3058. Did that conference consider the question of treating smallpox cases at the various casual wards throughout England?—Yes, that was one of the points that were discussed.

3059. With the result of finding that there was a deficiency in the matter of isolation?—Yes, that was so.

3060. Was that so in the majority of cases?—I should say in the very great majority of cases; it was a well-known fact that there was no proper means of isolating diseases of that sort.

3061. That was ten years ago, you say?—Yes.

3062. Now since that time has action been taken to provide better means for isolation at vagrant wards?—I am not aware that much has been done. I think in some vagrant wards a temporary isolation room has been provided. That is so at Newcastle, for instance, but I do not know anything with regard to the extent of that provision in other places. Every attempt is always made to get the cases off the workhouse premises altogether—into the hospitals of the sanitary authorities—in all the towns that I know of.

3063. Last year, you say, there was a conference of sanitary authorities?—Yes.

3064. And this subject was specially mentioned then?—The conference was specially called to consider the subject of vagrancy in relation to disease, and some of the speakers were poor law guardians and officers.

3065. What was the outcome of that conference?—The outcome is not yet known. The President of the Local Government Board has been asked to receive a deputation from the committee of the conference.

3066. Now what suggestions have you yourself to make with a view to the prevention of the spread of smallpox by vagrants?—My idea is entirely in favour of "labour colonies," to which to remove the vagrants. That is the great desideratum. So long as the vagrants are allowed to go rambling about the country as they do, they will always be doing mischief. In the present epidemic there have been something like 31,000 cases of smallpox in the large towns of England and Wales, and a very large amount of that smallpox has been spread by vagrants. It is a terrible state of things.

3067. Do you know yourself of cases where men in an infectious condition of smallpox have gone from place to place?—Oh, yes; I can give you numerous instances. May I give you first of all the summary of the information I got from other towns?

3068. Certainly, if you please?—My report deals with smallpox up to the end of the year 1903. To get information I sent out queries to 205 provincial cities boroughs and urban districts in England and Wales having populations of 20,000 and over.

3069. To whom did you address the queries?—To the medical officer of health in each case. The first query was: "In the present outbreak of smallpox, was infection first brought into your district by vagrants; if so, with what result as to the spread of infection?" Replies came in time from 126 of the districts to which I applied. The answers show that of these 126 districts, 111 had been invaded by smallpox in the present epidemic, and in 57, or 51 per cent. of these, the disease was first introduced by vagrants. In 25 of the latter the spread of infection from vagrants occurred with varying results. I have the names of the towns. The second query was:—"Was infection introduced secondarily, i.e., subsequently to the first appearance of the disease by vagrants; if so, how many times, and with what result as to spread?" The replies show that smallpox was introduced secondarily by vagrants into 58 districts, and perhaps two others, at least 305 times. Such secondary introductions of infection took place once in 11 or 12 districts; twice in 11 districts; three times in 5 others; four times in 5; five times in 3; six times in 3; seven times in 2; and eight, nine, nine or ten, ten, eleven, twelve and thirteen times respectively in 7 districts; and no less than twenty-three, twenty-four, thirty-one and thirty-four times respectively in the towns of Sheffield, Manchester, Wakefield and Liverpool. I have the details given as to each place.

3070. Then in any of those was the disease first introduced by vagrants?—Yes; these are cases in which after the disease had been in the first instance introduced by vagrants it was subsequently introduced by them all those numbers of times.

3071. In any of those did you ascertain whether the men had been passed on from other workhouses after they were in an infectious state?—Yes, I have some information as to that. Query no. 6 was:—"Have you reason to believe or suspect that infection of smallpox has been carried elsewhere by vagrants leaving your district, and if so, how often?" My summary of the replies is:—two districts say "yes": ten districts say "on one occasion"; four districts say "twice"; one district "once or twice"; two districts "two or three times"; three districts "three or four times"; three districts "several times"; six districts reply, "probably"; three reply, "perhaps." One stated, "tramps passing through the district have developed disease later." That makes a total of 35 districts. You will, understand, sir, that after a tramp has left a district there is not much means of hunting him up, so that this table is necessarily a very imperfect one. Those are the only cases reported which have come to the knowledge of the districts from which the tramps have gone.

3072. Then do you think there was an insufficient examination of the vagrant when he arrived at the casual ward?—There was a general feeling expressed by the medical officers of health at the conference at Spring Gardens that that was so.

3073. Whose duty do you take it to be to examine a man when he comes into the casual ward?—So far as I know, it is not made the duty of anyone at present. It is not made the business of the medical officer of the workhouse, I believe.

3074. No?—I believe I am right in saying that a vagrant can refuse to be examined if he chooses.

3075. I think there is one method of finding out cases of disease, and that is the bath?—Yes, and vagrants do not like it.

3076. A bath is compulsory in each case?—Yes.

3077. If a man is compelled to strip for a bath, and he has smallpox on him?—It will probably be found out by the attendant; but it may not be recognised; it may be so slight. The man may be dangerously infective, with only a few spots upon him which may be overlooked.

3078. And dangerously infectious, I suppose?—Infectious, yes. What I was referring to, sir, when I spoke about the dislike for the bath, was the effect that it produces. I have many times heard it said that tramps rather than have a bath at the casual ward would go to a common lodging-house. Common lodging-houses have not baths, though they should have.

3079. In common lodging-houses one knows also that the bed is not looked after with the care that it is in the casual ward?—That is so.

3080. (Mr. Simpson.) Are the signs of smallpox sufficiently clear for an uninstructed attendant to notice?—No, sir; in some cases they are not. The signs of smallpox in the mild cases are in fact bamboozling, I may say, to the greatest expert. Sometimes it is impossible to say whether the eruption is really that of smallpox or some other ailment;

3081. If the attendant saw a vagrant in the bath with an eruption on him, he could call the medical officer?—Of course. In advanced stages of the disease the eruption is not so distinct. It may only appear in little crusts which may hardly attract the attention, and the patient still be highly infectious.

3082. That adds greatly to the danger of smallpox?—Very much indeed.

3083. Is it not a kind of disease that is a great deal due to dirt, or at least is spread by dirt?—Yes, it is spread by dirty people.

3084. (Chairman.) If there was any chance of smallpox or any other contagious disease, I presume the same water in a bath ought never to be used more than once?—Certainly not.

3085. Have you made any inquiry as to whether the practice of using the same water for more than one tramp is common?—No, sir, I have not the means of getting to know, and I do not think any workhouse attendant who was guilty of such a thing—because it is a kind of guilt—would be likely to confess it. In the case I mentioned, I got the information from the tramps themselves.

3086. You have mentioned common lodging-houses and the obvious danger of infection which arises from them. Have you any suggestions to make with regard to their better sanitation?—For one thing, sir, I think common lodging-houses, if it were possible, should be divided into two classes; but that is always secondary to the question of the vagrants being taken off the road, which is the great thing; they should be taken off the road. If vagrants are not taken off the road, they should not use common lodging-houses that other people go to; and how that is to be worked, I am not very sure, but I believe it may be worked. In Newcastle there are many common lodging-houses, and the bulk of the occupants are people who do not pay by the night but by the week, and remain a long time—working men and so on. They go to the common lodging-house to be near their work, and they get their lodging cheaper. Common lodging-houses are in a way very popular, both with tramps and others who interchange news; it is a sort of club. The tramps enjoy the chat round the fire at night.

3087. Have you heard of the way-ticket system which they have in Gloucestershire?—I have heard of it. I was always in favour of some system like that; it is to some extent akin to the Swiss system of passing men on by ticket.

3088. We have had evidence here with regard to it. A man on leaving the workhouse in the morning has a way-ticket given to him stating his name, his appearance and his route. It enables him to get a meal of bread in the middle of the day, and so takes away from him the excuse for begging. It also affords an identification of the honest wayfarer by showing that he is keeping to the route that is specified?—It seems a proper system, but all these matters to my mind are secondary to the more important desideratum of preventing the regular vagrant from being on the road at all; he should be taken off the road if he could not show that he was a resident in a place, or that he had come from a place where he had worked satisfactorily, or if he could not give a good account of himself. Vagrants do not care to speak the truth always; they will sometimes wilfully mislead you as to where they are going.

3089. Well, do you not think that the way-ticket would afford a means of identifying the man who was travelling away from the specified route?—I do not know sufficient about the means of identification. I have doubts.

3090. I understand you are strongly in favour of a labour colony?—Yes. I have thought out the matter very carefully indeed. I have heard from other places what has been done. I have read reports on the subject, including the report of the Lincolnshire committee, with which, no doubt, you are familiar. I have read the German accounts and all the reports that have come to my knowledge, and I am satisfied that a labour colony is the best thing.

3091. Have you any suggestion as to the length of time that a man should be detained in a labour colony?—I find that in these places detention varies according to circumstances; it is sometimes a number of years. Dr. Henry E. Armstrong. Both as a matter of prudence and economy to the community, a tramp would be better in a labour colony; he would be kept more cheaply to the community than going about begging, because he makes a great deal by begging, and that is a tax which would be reduced if the man was put into a labour colony. He could be kept there more cheaply than in gaol or in a workhouse. That has been proved. The Lincolnshire report shows the cost. 23 Feb. 1905.

3092. Have you seen any of the foreign colonies yourself?—No, sir, I have not; I have not had the opportunity of going abroad to see them. I should have done so last year, but I have been kept at home through the smallpox epidemic.

3093. You would contemplate some considerable length of detention in the labour colony?—Yes, sir, I should think from one to two or three years, till a man got into a better state of mind and got to learn some trade. A great many people drift into trampdom. They go to lodging-houses, for instance, as workmen temporarily out of employment, and there they learn that the vagrant has a very much better time than they have had. Speaking generally the vagrants have a very good time; they have a philosophy of their own; they are very clever, observant and far-seeing; and everybody knows that they are workshy. Until that habit is overcome, I think the tramp should be kept in detention.

3094. Then would you look upon the labour colony as something of the sort of an industrial school, we will say, for adults?—Just so, sir.

3095. Putting them under magisterial control?—The poor law authorities and the magistrates ought to have the control.

3096. Would you not think that the supreme control, we will say, should rest in a central department, say the Home Office, as you would have detention against the man's will?—I have discussed the question with magistrates' clerks, and our own magistrates' clerk at Newcastle, and I think the present system of detaining a man for a short period in prison is a thoroughly bad one; it does not do any good. Probably if the matter was less magisterial it might be taken more kindly. We are all aware how well General Booth has brought on his labour colony. If the men can be led to believe that it is done in kindness, rather than as a matter of punishment, it would have more effect.

3097. That would be with the better class of them; but with a man determined to do no work, surely you must have some actual control over him?—Then let the magistrates deal with him.

3098. But would you not put that man into a labour colony too?—I would put him into a labour colony; there should be a place of detention, as at Merxplas in Belgium, in which the bad characters might be segregated. The bad cases certainly should be under magisterial control.

3099. If they are under the magistrates, and there is a considerable period of detention, which really would come to imprisonment, there ought to be inspection by some supreme central authority surely?—Yes, by the Home Office.

3100. You would have inspection and control by the Home Office?—I would assume that from the beginning.

3101. Particularly in cases of men who were under actual detention?—Yes.

3102. A form of imprisonment?—It would be a form of imprisonment for the bad cases.

3103. You say you have talked over the subject of short sentences with magistrates' clerks and others?—Yes.

3104. And you have formed an opinion about it?—Yes.

3105. What is that opinion?—Well, the short sentence of a few days, a fortnight, and so on, does not work any remedy; it simply hardens the criminal, and makes him worse than he was before. He gets fairly well treated whilst he is in, but he learns nothing for his good; he goes out, if anything, worse than he entered.

Dr. Henry E. Armstrong. 3106. He does not mind it ?—He does not care.

3107. He rather prefers it than otherwise ?—He gets fed well, and he is kept, as far as I can gather, at an expense of about one-third more than the colony system would cost.

3108. On the whole, you are strongly opposed to the present system of giving tramps short sentences of two or three days up to a fortnight ?—Yes, sir, I am.

3109. Then I would gather that your view is that if a man is to be put in prison at all, it should be for a fortnight or more ?—I think it should be for more than a fortnight.

3110. For some period above a fortnight ?—Yes, for a long period ; a year or more, I should say.

3111. You would hardly put him in prison for a year unless he had committed some criminal offence ?—If he were a tramp I would send him to the colony, which I think is a form of imprisonment.

3112. In your opinion short sentences are not deterrent, and in fact, do more harm than good ?—Yes.

3113. (Mr. Simpson.) Of those districts, where smallpox was introduced or spread by tramps, have you any figures to show whether the tramps were in the casual ward or in the common lodging-houses ?—Yes, I have some figures about that, relating to towns, such as my own. In certain districts, of course, there is not a common lodging-house for tramps to go to, and they have to go to the vagrant ward.

3114. It would not be so easy to trace the cause of smallpox to a common lodging-house as to a workhouse, would it ; the records are not so well kept, I suppose ?—In Leeds, for instance, the records have been very well kept by the medical officer of health, Dr. Cameron. He carefully traced the journeyings of tramps in his district, and several other medical officers have done the same.

3115. What occurs to me is that in the common lodging-houses there is not the same means of control of the inmates as in the tramp wards, and that as there are more tramps in the common lodging-houses than in casual wards, one would have expected the number of cases of smallpox traced to the former to have exceeded those traced to casual wards, more than is actually the case. I see the number of districts in which smallpox was traced to a workhouse vagrant is forty-one, and the number of districts in which it was traced to a common lodging-house vagrant is fifty-eight ?—Yes.

3116. I should have thought the difference would have been greater than that ?—I should have thought so myself.

3117. I suppose, probably, the conclusions you have arrived at with regard to smallpox would apply to other infectious diseases ?—Yes.

3118. Only you have not got as good figures ?—I have not the means of getting them. For instance, smallpox is a more recognisable disease to an ordinary onlooker than typhus is. Pneumonia might be suspected for typhus, and vice versa. Hence such diseases readily escape recognition.

3119. Take a minor disease, but what is really a very great scourge—influenza ; have you any personal opinion as to whether tramps spread that ?—I have not had anything practically to do with it, but I dare say they may ; it is very likely. Influenza is not notified, and I do not get officially to hear of it.

3120. (Captain Showers.) Itch is a very infectious disease, is it not ?—Oh, yes ; and skin diseases of other kinds.

3121. The infection is spread by baths and the beds, especially ?—Yes.

3122. (Sir William Chance.) Was the question of labour colonies in your mind when you drew up your report in 1893 ?—No, sir. I had not thought of labour colonies at that time, except in a general way ; in fact, I did not know much about them. I have studied the question a good deal since 1893, and my conclusions have been more decided in consequence.

3123. At that time your remedy was by some other system ?—Yes, mostly by action by the sanitary authority, by isolation, and so on. We have not sufficient power over the people to vaccinate them. That is one point on which the majority of medical officers of health spoke very strongly at that time.

3124. One of the resolutions passed by the conference in 1894 referred to the examination and bathing of persons entering casual wards and common lodging-houses ?—Yes.

3125. What examination is that ?—A medical examination.

3126. Do you think if the present system of casual wards goes on, that every tramp entering a casual ward should be subjected to medical examination ?—I think so, sir.

3127. That means that the medical officer of the workhouse would have to be present when the vagrants were admitted ?—Certainly, before they were passed on possibly to infect other people.

3128. Vagrants are admitted all through the night in London, if not in the country ?—That should be provided for ; it is only a matter of night-work.

3129. Therefore the medical officer would have to be in attendance ?—I think when the vagrants come in they should be examined ; except that an individual vagrant, arriving during the night might, under certain circumstances, be put into an isolated place by himself till he was examined next morning ; that might be found satisfactory, but he should be examined before going into a ward among other people whom he might infect.

3130. The bath is not a sufficient protection ?—The bath is not sufficient—it is very proper, but it is not enough.

3131. And in your opinion the adoption of the way-ticket system would not get rid of the danger of smallpox spreading ?—I do not think it would be sufficient. The way-ticket system allows a man to go on to another place, and his disease would go with him.

3132. Your idea is to gather up all these tramps ?—I think they should not be on the road. It is given in evidence that they go up one side of the country and down the other. I have lately come across a tramp who has admitted that he has been in Scotland and he has been in London. That is the way with tramps ; they go round the country.

3133. There is an answer quoted on page 3 of your report referring to the Elizabethan plan as being very effective in stopping the spread of smallpox. What was that plan ?—That was the high-handed plan of dealing with valiant beggars ; they were branded in the first instance.

3134. That would not stop smallpox, would it ?—No, they were branded in the first instance, and I think the punishment in the time of Queen Elizabeth and Henry VIII went to the extent of hanging them. I did not think I was going to be asked on that this morning otherwise I could have brought evidence. Another process suggested for dealing with tramps is the castrating of the males.

3136. Can you say roughly what proportion of the vagrant population in your district use the casual wards ?—My impression is, it is only a small portion.

3138. So that gives a total of 127 in common lodging-houses, as against 41 in workhouses ?—Yes.

3139. We have had some evidence tending to show that some common lodging-houses are in a very unsatisfactory condition. I think you are aware of the model bye-laws of the Local Government Board with respect to common lodging-houses ?—I am.

3140. Are you aware how far those have been adopted by the urban authorities in the country?—I could not speak generally, sir. We have bye-laws in Newcastle, and the common lodging-houses there are in very fair condition. They have very much improved of late years.

3141. If those bye-laws were adopted and were carefully carried out throughout the country, ought they not to effect a very great improvement in the condition of the common lodging-houses?—I am sure they would effect a general improvement; there is no doubt about that.

3142. For example, they provide for the separation of the sexes?—Yes.

3143. There should be no occasion why a decent woman should complain of having to be associated with persons of the opposite sex who are offensive and worse, perhaps?—Yes.

3144. They provide, also, for accommodation for married couples?—They do.

3145. They provide that the premises shall be kept clean and wholesome?—Yes.

3146. That the cubic space shall be sufficient?—Yes.

3147. And the number of lodgers shall be carefully regulated?—Yes.

3148. Also that the bedding shall be thoroughly cleansed?—Yes.

3149. They provide for a certain number of basins and receptacles for water for common lodging-houses?—Yes.

3150. I think I understood you to say you rather regretted that there were no baths in common lodging-houses?—A bath should be provided as a matter of course; that should be one of the regulations.

3151. Is that in your Newcastle regulations?—No, we have not got it.

3152. You desire it?—Yes. Our regulations have been based practically on the regulations you have now indicated. They were made some ten years ago. We had regulations before that, but these are an improvement. The question of the bath was not insisted upon.

3153. Then the model bye-laws go on to provide for the closet arrangements and the drainage?—Yes, they are excellent.

3154. The disposal of refuse, the airing of bedrooms, and the bedding. Then there are some special arrangements in cases of uncleanness or infectious disease, I think?—Yes.

3155. Are you aware of any reason why such bye-laws should not be universally adopted?—I think they ought to be compulsory; in all the large towns I think they are adopted. I have not made an inquiry, but I take it for granted that all the large towns have adopted these bye-laws, with possibly some alteration in certain cases. They ought to be compulsory, I think.

3156. You think that those that have not done so should be brought into line?—Yes, certainly.

3157. And that the bye-laws being adopted, the proper provision for inspection, and the carrying them out, should be provided?—Yes. I would go a step further, but I do not quite know whether it would be practicable. I think the lower class of common lodging-houses, to which I referred a little while ago, those for tramps alone, should be under the sanitary authority. They should either be owned by the sanitary authority, or controlled by them; that is to say, by a resident keeper on the spot to know exactly everything that went on.

3158. Is there any provision for medical inspection of the inmates of the common lodging-houses?—No; the only inspection is by lodging-house inspectors. If there is anything wrong or suspicious the inspector reports to the medical officer of health who inquires into it promptly, especially if there is suspicion of smallpox. Of late, the keepers of the lodging-houses have all been impressed with the importance of letting us know, and they have let us know, of cases of smallpox and suspicious ailments.

3159. Have you any provision for keeping a register of the people who use the common lodging-houses?—No, sir, we have not that power. It is a very desirable thing.

3160. That would be a desirable power?—Yes. I Dr. Henry E. found, in some of the towns where I made inquiry, they Armstrong. did keep a register, but it is doubtful how it was kept. 23 Feb. 1905.

3161. So that you have no arrangement for the systematic examination of the inmates of the common lodging-houses?—No, sir.

3162. There is no arrangement for their bathing, and there is no register of their movements?—No.

3163. Well, now, to take the case of the casual ward. I do not know whether you are acquainted with the regulations of 1882 as to casual paupers?—No, sir; I cannot say I am.

3164. I may perhaps remind you that one provision is that every casual pauper shall immediately on admission be searched. That must be done by and under the inspection of the master, or a male officer, in the case of a male inmate; or by the matron or a female officer in the case of a female inmate. Then, secondly, every casual pauper must, as soon as practicable, after his admission, be cleansed in a bath; and in a good many places I may tell you, that is done under the supervision of an officer. Now, as far as that goes, do you approve of that, as a step in the right direction?—There can be no doubt about it.

3165. Then are you aware that the Circulars of the Local Government Board recommend that in times of epidemic, there should be a systematic inspection by a medical officer of the casuals in casual wards?—Yes, I am aware of that.

3166. Would there be any difficulty in carrying out that systematically at Newcastle?—I do not think so; it would mean expense.

3167. It might mean some more expense?—But it could be done. I may say that the workhouse authorities in Newcastle have always been very willing to notify cases; indeed, they sometimes report cases to me as suspicious, which are not smallpox. Only a week or two ago we got a case of that kind.

3168. That is vigilance on the right side?—Yes.

3169. But how would you deal with such cases in an out-of-the-way country tramp ward?—That is another matter.

3170. Where you have no medical officer near at hand?—That is the difference.

3171. And a poor union, not inclined to spend much on people who do not belong to them?—Well, some of the country places would not be perhaps very well able to afford it without some other arrangement.

3172. These would be rather a difficulty?—It would be rather expensive, but still smallpox is an expense that has to be met.

3175. I take it the statements of where they come from, and where they are going, are often very doubtful, but at any rate you have a register of the number of people who sleep in the wards on a particular night and of their names and the statements they make. You have nothing of the kind in common lodging-houses?—No. I once had an experience in trying to trace two men, one of whom was believed to have smallpox. They came from waterworks and were out of work; they had come to Newcastle and had gone to a lodging-house. I found out the lodging-house they had gone to, but the keeper had not the names of the two men wanted. They had given false names.

Dr. Henry E. 3176. It might be possible to inflict a penalty on persons giving false information, might it not?—Yes, it might be.

23 Feb. 1905. 3177. Especially, if they get anything in return in the shape of maintenance?—Yes.

3178. You suggest the remedy of labour colonies, but how would you deal with what I may call the bona fide wayfarer?—I would deal with him specially, sir; I think he ought to be helped, quite apart from the vagrant who has no work, and does not want it.

3179. And how would you deal with him?—I have had instances showing that, where bona fide wayfarers get into the same groove as the tramps, they may remain there. I know of cases where unemployed workmen in search of work have caught disease by tramping about from place to place, like the ordinary tramp. If such men were got expeditiously from the point where they ceased to have employment to some place where they could get it, it would be a good thing for the country; it would be proper economy on a large scale, it would save their energy, it would be a sanitary precaution, and it would do good in every way.

3180. Had you thought out any means by which that might be done?—I am scarcely justified in expressing my somewhat crude opinions, but it might be done. In times gone by, the vagrants were sent back to their place of birth for economic reasons, and the working men out of work and not in trades unions (navvies, etc.) might be sent to work quickly by special means, in the way that several trades unions do for their members. They draft them from London to Scotland, and so on.

3181. (Chairman.) You mean they pay for their ticket?—I believe so, sir.

3182. (Dr. Downes.) The object is desirable, but the means of carrying it out would have to be considered?—I do not see why it might not be a good thing if it were carried out universally in the case of masons, and navvies and people of that kind. These are the men that come close on the line of the ordinary tramp and they have spread disease several times. Workers in Scotland at waterworks have come on to Durham and Northumberland. I refer to a particular waterworks in Perthshire—the Talla waterworks. The medical officer of health of Perthshire forwarded to me the names of workmen who were supposed to be on their way from there to the works of the Newcastle water company, but instead of that the men went to the works of the North Shields water company, where they presently developed smallpox. One person found his way to Newcastle with smallpox on him, from the North Shields waterworks. They go rambling about. Several of the navvies from the Talla waterworks also went to the waterworks in the county of Durham and developed smallpox there.

3183. So there is a good deal of evidence that the wayfaring working men do spread disease as much as the tramps do?—Undoubtedly.

3184. I think on page 20 of your report, Dr. Cameron, of Leeds, gives some illustrations?—Yes, he gives some very good illustrations.

3185. Of twenty-nine cases mentioned on that page there are two doubtful; that leaves twenty-seven, and of those, eleven, at any rate, are specifically ascribed to navvies and workmen, a travelling hawker, a travelling musician, a tinker, and a piano tuner, who are not regular tramps?—Yes, peripatetic musicians and others of that sort are just as bad as the out-of-work man and the tramp.

3186. So that the problem is not entirely limited to the habitual tramp?—By no means.

3187. You were asked a little while ago what provision was made for isolation of cases of smallpox in vagrant wards?—Yes.

3188. I think you would hardly regard a vagrant ward as the proper place in which to detain a case of smallpox?—No, sir. They have a separation room usually, but it is not intended that they should keep a smallpox patient there.

3189. The great thing is to get the patient away to a proper hospital?—Yes; to a sanitary authority's hospital.

3190. I notice in the list of queries you sent round there is no specific mention of vaccination?—No, sir. My former report dealt with vaccination. My present report was specially intended to point the moral of the labour colony; I wanted to bring that well out. Everybody knows that vaccination is an important thing, and that it has been grossly neglected in the country. I have very strong views on the subject of vaccination, but I did not think it proper to make them prominent in this report. I would go a great deal further in regard to vaccination than we are doing. I would put on the anti-vaccinator and the conscientious objector the expense of all smallpox.

3191. If we were as well vaccinated and re-vaccinated as, say, Germany?—We should have no smallpox.

3192. Do you think you would have to be here to-day to complain of smallpox spread by tramps?—No; and it would be no hardship then on the anti-vaccinator; he would have little or nothing to pay.

3193. And even if we put the tramp away in the labour colony, we should still be confronted with the problem of smallpox as long as we are not vaccinated?—Yes.

3194. Take the case of typhus; years ago, I think, typhus was spread by the nomadic pauper?—Yes.

3195. But typhus is a disease of which we are not so much afraid as we used to be?—I have not seen any cases of typhus myself for many years.

3196. Although the tramp is still with us?—Although the tramp is with us.

3197. What do you consider to be the cause of the diminution of typhus?—Isolation, disinfection, and reduction of overcrowding in towns. We could deal with smallpox by vaccination, if it were properly carried out, but we have to rely entirely on other measures in the case of typhus.

3198. And, of course, sanitation has improved?—Yes, that has limited typhus.

3199. And if vaccination and re-vaccination were systematically carried out, we should not be troubled with the spread of smallpox by tramps, as now?—No.

3200. (Chairman.) Do you consider the casual ward system is of advantage in preventing the spread of disease—we will say, of smallpox?—Well, I cannot say it is of any advantage in limiting it, because it is a means of collecting together the tramps, some of whom are infected. They go to the casual ward; they may have smallpox on them, so that it is not a means of stopping smallpox.

3201. Do you think it is an advantage in preventing the spread of disease?—I can hardly say.

3202. I mean, owing to the better supervision there?—There is better supervision, undoubtedly, in the work-house than there is in the common lodging-house.

3203. Quite so; therefore, it is rather an advantage than otherwise?—In that sense it is an advantage.

3204. Are not the common lodging-houses a fruitful source of infection?—They are, undoubtedly, although I should, from experience of my own town, say that we have had comparatively little disease in common lodging-houses, leaving out smallpox, of which we have had some cases in lodging-houses. We used to have typhus rampant in the common lodging-houses, and we have not now.

3205. As regards the common lodging-houses, what suggestions do you make for rendering them less likely to assist in the spread of disease?—The adoption of the model bye-laws, the constant watching by inspectors; men should watch common lodging-houses and have nothing else to do; that is in towns where there are sufficient common lodging-houses to occupy one or two men. We have a chief common lodging-house inspector in Newcastle, and two assistants. The two assistants do nothing else, but pay night and day visits, and the lodging-houses are visited every day.

3206. And suppose they come across persons whom they think have something the matter with them, a rash or otherwise, would it be their business to bring it to the notice of the medical officer of health at once?—At once.

3207. And the cases would be isolated, I suppose?—That system has been going on every day during the last two years in Newcastle, while the smallpox epidemic has lasted. It goes on constantly in fact, but with special vigilance during times of smallpox.

3208. Would you propose the compulsory vaccination of all tramps in common lodging-houses and workhouses?—I am very strongly in favour of that.

3209. Do you not think that would, in a great measure, stop tramping?—If it would stop tramping, it would be doing good, but I do not think it would. The experience in Glasgow showed a year or two ago that tramps were not only willing to be vaccinated, but that they sometimes went and got vaccinated on the other arm, in order to get another half-a-crown.

3210. It would probably be worth while for the State to pay them half-a-crown to be vaccinated?—I think so, except that there is a temptation to fraud. I have seen a man with recent vaccination marks on each arm.

3211. I am not suggesting it should be done?—No.

3212. (Mr. Simpson.) It is also a very good excuse for not working?—Yes. In Newcastle we compensate a working man; if the vaccination is such as to interfere with his work, we pay him his wages.

3213. (Captain Showers.) By section 83 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the keeper of a common lodging-house, in which vagrants are received to lodge, must from time to time, if so required by the local authority, report every person lodging in the house to them. Is it required by you?—Yes, it is required by us. We get reports of that kind, but we rely more on our own observation. I asked that question in my query no. 7—"Have you put in force the provisions of section 83 of the Public Health Act, 1875?" And the reply in fifty-six of the districts was that systematic inspection was the sole or chief means relied on, and practically that is the case with us.

3214. For what period is the report made?—It would be from day to day. If a lodging-house keeper has once had experience of the bother he is put to with a case of smallpox, he is more on the alert to prevent the trouble again. For instance, in some cases we have had to close a lodging-house, and that in a lodging-house with thirty, forty, or fifty inmates is a serious loss to the lodging-house keeper.

3215. Quite so?—The sanitary authority give compensation sometimes; in one instance they gave a lodging-house keeper £33 in compensation for loss of income.

3216. I see that failure to make a report renders the lodging-house keeper liable?—Yes; and if the lodging-house keeper knows he will be fairly treated by the sanitary authority he is willing to report. I have no fault to find with lodging-house keepers in Newcastle now.

3217. I gather that you consider that the thing for these tramps is a penal labour colony—I mean a place where magistrates could send tramps for one, two, or three years, it may be, till they become decent members of society and have learned some trade?—Yes, but as far as possible I should like to see the penal element kept in the background. Let the men think it is done out of kindness to them, rather than to punish them. The penal element should only apply really to the bad characters. There are many people in lodging-houses who are very decent people indeed, but down in the world, and out of work, and who have got into a bad groove. To punish them for that alone is rather hard.

3219. Then would you divide a labour colony into two divisions—the voluntary and the compulsory?—Yes, I think they might require to be separate colonies. It is rather a complex question.

3220. (Chairman.) Would you have a labour colony for both sexes?—The sexes should be separated in the colonies. In different parts of the Continent different systems are in force. I believe that in some places there are little settlements where a man and his wife can live together, but the colonies that I have had in mind for England are not of that class. I would keep the sexes separate. Dr. Henry E. Armstrong.

3221. What proceedings have you taken against the keepers of common lodging-houses?—In one instance we took proceedings against a keeper for not notifying a case of smallpox. The smallpox patient, a lodger, was a tailor, who went backwards and forwards to Forest Hall, a village near Newcastle, with smallpox on him for three weeks. He was the cause of the death of the man who employed him at Forest Hall, and the cause of two or three other cases of smallpox. He also brought it into the lodging-house. He was known to be sitting at dinner with a party, among whom were the lodging-house keeper and his wife, whilst the eruption was out on his face, and they failed to report it to us.

3222. They failed to report it, and you proceeded against them?—They pleaded ignorance, but we proceeded against them.

3223. Were they convicted?—They were let off with a small penalty.

3224. Have you had any other cases against lodging-house keepers for failure in the sanitary arrangements?—Not many; extending over a number of years we have had a few cases; the Newcastle lodging-houses are really in very fair order.

3225. Yes, so I understand. I did not know whether that was the result at all of proceedings against those who did not keep them in good order?—No, sir. The lodging-houses are largely occupied by decent working-men, and the rooms are fairly kept. In some of the houses are bed-rooms with beds for people who are charged a shilling a night. That, of course, puts a house into a higher position.

3226. In those, of course, there is very little danger of disease from infection?—Sometimes disease does break out amongst the people in them; it may be brought in by the nightly lodgers. Constant lodgers who pay by the week or month should not be placed alongside of tramps who may bring disease in from outside at any time. The nightly lodging-houses should be separated from the others.

3227. I should have thought that there would have been more separation in the case of the shilling-a-night people?—Not always. I know of a case where smallpox was brought by a tramp into a house where there were several of these shilling-a-nighters, quite a respectable place. When the keepers have empty beds they will take anybody in for a night, and they will charge them sixpence if they cannot get a shilling.

3228. (Mr. Simpson.) How many men did you say you employed in Newcastle inspecting common lodging-houses?—We have three lodging-house inspectors, two constantly doing that work and nothing else, and the supervisor. We have not a large number of common lodging-houses.

3229. (Sir William Chance.) How many?—I cannot mention the number at the moment, but we have under 2,000 people living in lodging-houses; it is not very much.

3230. (Mr. Simpson.) The inspectors of common lodging-houses are not police officers?—No, sir. They were at one time, but they are now under the sanitary committee.

3231. Of course, the inspectors have become regular experts in the matter, having acquired a great deal of knowledge?—Yes, they are specialists.

3232. You recognise that it would be quite impossible to inspect common lodging-houses in small towns and in country districts, in anything like such a systematic and thorough way, as you can do it in a big city like Newcastle?—Yes; they would not engage separate men; there would not be enough work to justify the outlay.

3233. (Dr. Downes.) But in small towns they have sanitary inspectors who might discharge the duty where the work is not sufficient for a special man?—Yes, perhaps one inspector in a small town would do all the sanitary work, including the lodging-houses.

3234. Because it is a small town, there is no reason why the lodging-houses should not be inspected?—No, that is no reason why it should not be done.

MR. CHARLES SIMMONS, called; and Examined.

Mr. Charles
Simmons.

23 Feb. 1905.

3235. (Chairman.) You are the superintendent visiting officer of the Metropolitan casual wards?—Yes, sir.

3236. How long have you been in that position?—Twenty-three years.

3237. And what were you before then?—Visiting officer, for seven years.

3238. And what are your present duties?—To inspect the casual wards and see that they are properly carried on, and that the diet is given to the tramps according to the scale laid down by the Local Government Board.

3239. How many casual wards are there in the Metropolitan district?—Twenty-eight, sir.

3240. (Mr. Davy.) By whom were you appointed?—The Local Government Board.

3241. (Chairman.) You have had a pretty good experience of casuals as well as of the wards?—I have, sir.

3242. You only speak with regard to the Metropolitan district?—That is so; I do not know anything about the outside wards.

3243. Are the Local Government Board regulations generally enforced as to bathing, detention, dietary, and tasks?—Yes, sir, they are carried out very well, generally speaking, all over London.

3244. Would you describe to us what is the usual course pursued in the case of a person applying for admission to a casual ward?—Any destitute person applying for admission is admitted and searched, and his belongings are tied up in a parcel and placed in a receptacle for the purpose; admission is from 5 in the evening till 8 in the morning really, but they do not come in as late as that.

3245. Any time during the night?—Any time during the night the casual wards are open. The man gets his supper when he goes in, and when he gets up in the morning he has his breakfast, and then he goes to work. The work depends on what task is in force for the casual ward he is in. In some places they have nothing to do but pick oakum. In some casual wards they have stone breaking as well; some chopping wood.

3246. Is there a task in all the wards?—There is a task laid down by the Local Government Board. It varies in different casual wards, according to what the guardians think most fit for the casuals to do. Stone breaking will vary from 7 cwt. to 10 cwt.

3247. (Mr. Davy.) The same kind of stone?—Yes, very nearly.

3248. (Chairman.) What is the task in the case of a female?—In some of the wards now they do nothing but cleaning, and washing and mending clothes; and in some of them they get 2 lbs. of oakum to pick. They often ask for oakum where it is not given; they do not like to sit without something to do during the day.

3249. What does the dinner for men consist of?—8 ounces of bread and 1½ ounces of cheese.

3250. Any tea or anything of that sort?—No tea, sir.

3251. Porridge at breakfast, I suppose?—Breakfast and supper.

3252. At what time is the supper?—Between 5 and 7, sir—it depends on the time of the year.

3253. I suppose these meals are according to regulation?—Yes, sir.

3254. Are they sufficient?—Oh, yes; the casuals never complain to me that they have not had enough.

3255. (Captain Showers.) What do they get for supper when they first come in?—6 ounces of bread and a pint of porridge.

3256. (Dr. Downes.) Would they get that if they came in late?—Yes, it is always there hot for them when they come in; it is always kept hot.

3257. (Chairman.) What is the difference in the various unions; there is a difference, both as to detention and task, is there not?—Yes, sir. There are twenty-eight casual wards, and there are twenty-eight authorities for working them. Each board of guardians has a different opinion upon some point or another. Some boards of guardians say the casuals are working men honestly looking for work, and there is no doubt they are, but they know where they are going to get it. When they leave they know to what casual ward they are going, and whether they are going to break stones or pick oakum.

3258. Is there a great difference between the tasks?—No, not a great difference, sir. The only thing is whether the task is carried out properly; in some places they are not at all particular whether half of it or a quarter of it is done.

3259. Are those places more popular?—Yes, they are, sir.

3260. The wards where the tasks are not strictly carried out?—Yes.

3261. Now, does each casual have a bath on admission?—In every case; and there is a clean towel for every one.

3262. What about search?—Each man is thoroughly searched.

3263. There is no difference in that?—No difference at all, sir. They are all searched.

3264. Every casual ward the same?—Yes.

3265. Can you tell me of any wards where a task is not enforced?—Yes, at Poplar. The guardians there say they do not think a casual ought to be kept in and set to work; they do not think it is right he should work, and the casuals at these wards do not work. They go in at night, and they are discharged the next morning when they have had their breakfast. A few of them only are kept in for cleaning work.

3266. Is that casual ward more popular than others?—It is very popular, and a great many tramps are refused for want of room; sometimes as many as forty are refused in one night.

3267. Then the lack of work seems attractive?—It is, sir.

3268. What is the total accommodation for vagrants in the various casual wards in the Metropolis?—There are 1,935 beds; 1,248 for males; 449 single beds for females; and 119 double beds—that is for a mother and child or children.

3269. Well, now, is that sufficient?—It is quite sufficient, as far as I can see.

3270. We have been told that during the last twelve months there has been rather exceptional pressure?—Yes, there is, sir, on a few wards, but on some wards there is no pressure at all; in fact, they are never full.

3271. Not even in the last twelve months?—Not even in the last twelve months.

3272. Then if there has been pressure in one ward, there has been possibly room in another one near enough for the casuals to go to?—Yes. I have been in a casual ward at night when a lot of tramps have been waiting to go in. They have watched me in; they all know me pretty well; and they have been there when I have come out again. They said, "Mr. Simmons, are they full?" "Yes, right full up." They said, "We thought they were not full." "If you are after a night's lodging; you know where to get it—a little to the west." "No; d— that place; we're not going there."

3273. What was the place?—In the place they were trying to get into they would have been given oakum to pick; in the place I wanted them to go to they would have had 10 cwt. of stone to break.

3274. Can you tell me what is the largest number of women received in the casual wards in any one night?—No, I could not tell you; the women's places are never full; if one ward should happen to be full, another close to it has got room for them; it is the men chiefly that get refused. You see one man will be refused at three or four wards in one night. Perhaps he will go to the City ward—that is always full; he will then go to Little Gray's Inn Lane (the Holborn wards)—they fill up quickly; then he will have to go somewhere else for a lodging.

3275. As to these wards which you say fill up quickly: what is the reason for that?—A light task; nothing but oakum picking.

3276. Any better food?—No.

3277. (Dr. Downes.) It is the same diet throughout London, is it not?—Well, not quite; there are one or two places where they get broth for supper instead of gruel, and in one ward they get soup for dinner four days in the week instead of bread and cheese.

3278. Which ward is that?—Kensington.

3279. Does that make any difference in the applications?—Not more than that they are always full, sir.

3280. (Mr. Simpson.) You do not notice any difference in the applications on the days when they get soup for dinner and the other days?—No, sir, there is no difference.

3281. (Chairman.) Now, among the casual paupers, according to your experience, what proportion is there of those whom you would call working men—I mean, men who would work if they could get it?—I once said there was 3 per cent., but I stretched my conscience when I said it, because I do not believe there are more than 2 per cent.

3282. You say not more than 3 per cent.?—I do not believe there is more than 2. There may be a time—such as when the large docks were being made in London—when you would have the real genuine working-men, who would come in at the north end of London, and would be seen by the officer on the south side travelling on their way; but unless there is anything of that kind going on they will not go. One of my officers knew where there was plenty of work for five or six men, digging at 4s. a day, and he spoke to three or four able-bodied tramps, and asked them to go there and work. They said, "Where is it?" He said, "It is at Erith." They said, "Oh, that is too far away from London." They could not go so far as that for 4s. a day.

3283. But is there not casual ward accommodation for them near Erith?—I doubt it, sir. If there is, it is not like the accommodation in London. You see the accommodation in London now is very good; casual wards are so nicely fitted up, and everything is so regular and clean for them, that they do not like to go away from London. That is the great evil when anything of the kind comes on, like the Lord Mayor's fund. Anything like that brings a lot of countrymen into London; when they are hard up for a lodging they go to a policeman; he recommends them to the casual ward, and they find the accommodation so good and so nice, that a good many of them forget to go out of London again, and they stay there.

3284. (Sir William Chance.) You have, I suppose, noticed them when they first come in as newcomers, and have seen them afterwards when they have become habitués?—Oh, yes.

3285. (Chairman.) Well, now, what would be your suggestion for making the life in the casual wards less attractive?—There is only one thing I know of. I have spoken of it a good many times. I do not suppose it will ever happen, but I want them all placed under one authority, so that there would be uniformity of discipline. Now there is none. A tramp goes into one ward; the guardians consider he is a working man, and tell you to treat him as well as you can, and do not enforce the task of work sometimes. He will go from them to another casual ward where the guardians say, "Give him the no. 1 diet, and let him do the task laid down by the Local Government Board; he is nothing but a tramp, and he is living in London on the ratepayers." So there he gets the difference.

3286. Does he come back to the latter place much?—Not very often, sir.

3287. Are there many cases of men who are known to go the regular round of the casual wards in London?—Oh, yes, hundreds of them. At some wards they are as regular as the clock on the wall, about one to two days over the month they go regularly.

3288. Can you say what percentage of the actual casual ward men go the round of the casual wards—men whom you may say live in the London casual wards?—I have here a list of habitual tramps numbering about 950, I think, who practically live in the London casual wards.

3289. Do you know what their ages are?—Yes, sir. I can give you an analysis of their ages. There are 767 men on the list, and of them there are 196 between twenty and forty years of age; 201 between forty and fifty; 192 between fifty and sixty; 165 between sixty and seventy; and 13 over seventy. Of 200 women, 15 are between the ages of twenty and forty; 59 between forty and fifty; 63 between fifty and sixty; 51 between sixty and seventy; and 12 over seventy.

3290. And those are men and women who apparently have made up their minds to live in the London casual wards?—Who live in the London casual wards. You would scarcely believe it, but several times just recently I have met with some of the old ones over seventy years of age, and I have strongly advised them to go into the workhouse. The reply to me is, "I cannot get in, Mr. Simmons." I say, "I will tell you how to get in." He will tap me on the shoulder, "Do not trouble; I am not going into a workhouse; I am not going to give up my liberty; the casual ward is my home, and I mean to stop in it." I have tried it with men and women; I have got the same answer from them all. They will not go into the workhouse; they prefer the casual ward. When you come to consider that they get three days' holiday in the casual ward every week, you do not wonder at them not wanting to go into the workhouse.

3291. Besides liberty, they have the chance of picking up a great deal by begging?—I do not know; I have only seen one regular casual begging all the years I have been travelling about London—only once, I saw a man with his wife and two children.

3292. You say you have only seen one case of a man whom you knew to be a casual begging?—Yes.

3293. Was he an old man?—No, a young man; about thirty years of age then.

3294. Did you speak to him?—No, sir, I did not.

3295. Was he begging for food or for money?—He was singing in the street for money.

3296. Singing?—He had a woman and two children with him; the woman was supposed to be his wife, and the children were supposed to be his children, but after he died we ascertained that the woman was only living with him; they were not married. Now, that is the only case that I have seen of a regular casual begging.

3297. Did the woman and children go into the casual ward with him?—Yes.

3298. Then, it is clear from your evidence that the London casual is not a beggar as a rule?—He is not a professional beggar.

3299. Then what do these men do with themselves when they are not in the ward?—You can see them lounging about in the road at different places. If there is anything to be seen, or anything going on unusual, they are there, even if it is the Derby; in the Derby week they are off to Epsom.

3300. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Their idea of pleasure in life is absolutely to do nothing?—That is it, sir.

3301. How do they live if they do not beg or work?—They live in the casual ward.

3302. For three days they are free?—They have their breakfast when they go out and their supper at night.

3303. They live on that?—I would not say that. I have seen as much as half a bushel of bread shot down outside a casual ward gate after they have gone in.

3304. How do they get this food?—They get plenty of charity at the east end of London.

3305. Forced upon them?—Put on them. Walk down the Mile End Road at the time the occupants of the casual wards come out in the morning, and again in the evening, and you will frequently see a working man stop and give a fellow a penny. They do not ask for it. I once went with Mr. Long, the present President of the Local Government Board, when he was Parliamentary Secretary, to some of the wards. We went into three wards in the east end of London, and in each ward we saw the occupant's bread that he had had given to him when he went in at night. "Why, man, you have not eaten your bread," said Mr. Long. "No, sir, not hungry; eat it to-morrow." Mr. Long made some remark to me, and I said to him, "You wait till we go to the west end of London, you will see no bread there." And true enough when we did go round to the west end wards there was not a scrap of bread to be seen. The east end of London is a lot more charitable to the poor than the west end.

3306. (Chairman.) They leave their bread outside?—They had had enough, as much as they could eat. And I have noticed the women too. They have their gruel given them; perhaps they will eat half their piece of bread and put the other half on the pannikin that the gruel is in, and walk off to bed leaving it; they will not touch it; they will not take a spoonful of it.

3307. Where do they get their food then?—It is given them, sir, about the streets.

3308. But does not that constitute begging?—Well, I do not know whether it would, sir.

3309. (Dr. Downes.) Do the casuals look ill-fed?—No, sir; you would be astonished, if you went into the bath-room to-night, to see the habitual tramps with their well nourished bodies and good limbs.

3310. (Chairman.) Able to do quite a good day's work?—I will give you an idea of an old tramp—one I have known for fifteen years; he was in the casual wards, and the guardians' casual ward committee went in just after dinner. When they unlocked the door of his berth and looked in he was sitting there doing nothing. One of the guardians said, "How is it you are not at work, my man?" He said, "I have done my task." "Oh, what task?" "I have broken 10 cwt. of stones," he said. "Have you really broken them?" For answer, he opened the door, and there was the place swept nice and clean and the stones all broken up. "What had you for supper?" "Six ounces of bread and a pint of gruel, and the same for breakfast." "What did you get for dinner?" "Eight ounces of bread and an ounce and a half of cheese." "Could you break stones on that?" "Yes, sir, and he is a lazy devil that cannot do it. That is plenty of food, enough to break stones on. I have done it for years and I have done it to-day, and there it is."

3311. (Mr. Davy.) But he was an expert stone breaker?—I expect he was, sir. But they talk about 10 cwt. being a big task; when you find a man will go into a casual ward and break three 10 cwt. in one day, it is not such a heavy task, you would think.

3312. How do you mean he would break three 10 cwt. in one day?—There was a man went into a casual ward where he had been within the month, and the superintendent said to him, "You will be detained." "I cannot help it; I must come here to-night." And he booked him in. The man stood on one side till the superintendent had done talking to the rest; then he went to the superintendent and said, "I want to ask you a favour; if I break three days' task of stone to-morrow will you let me out in the evening when I am done?" "Well," the superintendent said, "if you can break three tasks I think I should." "Very well." He went to work in the morning; he soon cracked up the first 10 cwt.; he went into the next place, which happened to be an empty berth, and cracked up his second 10 cwt. His third 10 cwt. was in the berth next to him, but he did not like that one, so he actually carried his third 10 cwt. of stone from that one into his own berth and cracked it all up, and went away at five o'clock whistling. That is one man's work, sir. The superintendent asked him what he wanted to go for. He said he had some work to do. He said he was going down on to a farm to pull wurzels, if he could get away that night. The superintendent said, "How about your night's lodging? You can go out in the morning as soon as you like." "I can get a night's lodging down there, where I am going to."

3313. (Chairman.) Do you know whether he went to the wurzels; or was it to the Derby?—No, I do not know; it was somewhere down towards Epsom, somewhere that way.

3314. He will come again, no doubt?—Oh, yes; there are a good many tramps that do not stop in London all the year round. I could hear them talking when I was a visiting officer and amongst them. "Where have you been, Jack?" "Oh, I have been all round." "Oh," he says, "have you?" "Yes." "How did you get on down in the north?" "Oh," he says, "all right."

"What about Carlisle?" "Oh, I did not go there." "You did not go to Carlisle?" "No." "Why?" "Why, there are no tramps go there; it is a hard day's work cleaning, if you go there." Well, that was a singular thing. About a week afterwards, one superintendent had a visit from a brother officer in the workhouse at Carlisle who said, "How do you get on for tramps?" "Oh, there are plenty of tramps in London as usual; how are you off?" "Oh," he says, "we cannot get enough to clean." Now I thought that tramp must have told the truth, you know.

3315. What cleaning would there be for the tramps to do at Carlisle?—The scrubbing and the washing up.

3316. Cleaning the yards, and so on?—Oh, no; cleaning inside the wards. The wards are cleaned every day. You can go into a ward and you might eat your meals off the floor any day, they are kept so clean and nice. There is a certain class of tramp about London that are first-rate cleaners, and where there is cleaning to be done, they get it. If I were a superintendent I should not put a man who did not know anything about cleaning to do the job, because if you did, and you had a nice floor, instead of it being a nice clean one, you would find it a cloudy one in the morning when you went to look; he would have made it worse than it was before. They look out for cleaners.

3317. (Dr. Downes.) Is the cleaning task a time job, as a rule?—No, it is a task; they are generally done about two or three o'clock; they do not trouble themselves about that. It has been made a task in some wards now by the Local Government Board.

3318. (Chairman.) Then what I understand you desire, is to get an absolute uniformity of task and practice in London casual wards?—Yes, sir; I think if that were done you would reduce the London tramps to a minimum number; you would never get rid of them; if you could not get rid of them by hanging them, you will not get rid of them now; they used to hang them at one time.

3319. Do you think the task is a sufficient one?—Yes, I think it is, sir; because if a man has not been into a casual ward more than two or three times, he finds it is rather hard; but for a man that is living in them, it is an easy task.

3320. The weak man, I suppose, has always got the power of reference to the medical officer?—Yes.

3321. I mean if he is really a weak man he can always apply to the medical officer?—He has always got the medical officer; if he cuts his finger there is the medical officer for him.

3322. Have you had experience of hearing men talk about the difference between going to prison and going to the casual ward?—Yes, I have; I have had rather too much of it just lately, sir. "Where have you been to?" "Oh, I have been to prison." "What have you been there for?" "As usual, Mr. Simmons, refusing to work." I have here the particulars of sentences given to certain men. One man here has been to prison eight times for twelve months at a time; he has had eight twelve-months' sentences; and if he does not like prison better than the casual wards, I do not know anything about it.

3323. Would you not say that it is rather exceptional for a man to go back to the casual wards after having twelve months. That would be twelve months hard labour, I suppose?—I am sorry to say the second or third night after he is out of prison he is in a casual ward; and he will tell the superintendent in the morning, "I did not come here to work; I only came here for a night's lodging; I am not going to work; you can send for the constable as soon as you like."

3324. Have you another case?—Yes, here is another man with a lot of short sentences up to six months. Then there is one of twelve months. He was due to come out on the 9th of this month, but he is out and sent into prison again on the 29th December.

3325. Have you had a talk with that man?—Both of them, sir. It is a singular thing; he is a thorough tramp. My four officers go about, and yet not one of them knows that man; he is no sooner out of prison than he is in again.

3326. Did he tell you what made him have this particular affection for prison?—He says it is better than the casual ward.

3327. (Mr. Davy.) As regards the first of these men, it appears from your paper that he was first convicted on the 2nd August, 1894?—Yes.

3328. He got seven days; the last sentence you have here was on the 26th July, 1904?—Yes.

3329. And between these two dates he has been convicted nineteen times?—Yes.

3330. And eight times he had a sentence of a year?—Yes. After the last twelve months he came out and went into a casual ward—St. George's in the East—and he would not do his work; he wanted to be locked up again. The superintendent said, "I am not going to lock you up this time." He kept ringing his bell to know why the policeman did not come, and the superintendent kept putting him off. It is quite true, sir.

3331. (Mr. Simpson.) There is another point. He was apparently twenty-five years of age when he first started; he is still not over middle age?—No, I should not think he is.

3332. (Mr. Davy.) Is he able-bodied?—He is so far able-bodied that the doctors always pass him as fit to do his work. The superintendent will not take him before a magistrate without a doctor's certificate to say he is really fit to do his task.

3333. How do you get these particulars as to sentences?—I inspect every casual ward, and at each one I get the prosecutions from the time I was there before to that time. I keep a book, and I have got about 18,000 prosecutions entered in it.

3334. (Sir William Chance.) You said this man kept ringing his bell for the policeman?—Yes. The last time he rang his bell, when the superintendent went, he tore up all his clothes. He said, "Now, there, you will have to lock me up." He guessed, I suppose, that the superintendent did not intend to lock him up for refusing to do his work that time. I think that was his third prosecution from the same place—St. George's in the East.

3335. (Mr. Davy.) For destroying clothes?—Refusing to work and destroying clothes.

3336. (Mr. Simpson.) After that, he destroyed his clothes on two other occasions apparently?—Yes.

3337. I suppose he found that was the only way of getting into prison?—I expect so, sir; for the superintendent's own safety, if a man tears up his clothes like that, and refuses to work, he is bound to lock him up; because if he did not lock one up to-day, he would have six to-morrow, and the next day twelve, doing the same thing—if they could tear up a suit of clothes, and not go to prison for it.

3338. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Prison is a deterrent?—To some of them.

3339. To eleven out of twelve, I gather?—It is no deterrent to him.

3340. (Chairman.) I think, Mr. Simmons, you would say this man is an exceptional case?—To a certain extent, but I am sorry to say there are several other cases almost as bad.

3341. Of men who have had frequent long periods of imprisonment and still come back to the casual wards?—Yes.

3342. Perhaps you will let us have particulars of a few of those cases?—I will, sir. (See Appendix XI.)

3343. What effect has the three to seven days' imprisonment, do you think?—I do not know; I do not think they like anything under twenty-one days. If you go over twenty-one days it is all right, and they will take every care to do all they can to persuade the magistrate to give them more than twenty-one days.

3344. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Why twenty-one days?—I do not know, sir; I have never been in prison.

3345. I do not know the particular significance in twenty-one days?—There is something in the sentence up to twenty-one days that they do not like.

3346. (Chairman.) Anything in the diet?—There was a tramp brought up for refusing to do his task of work, and he was taken before the magistrate. The magistrate said, "Why did you not do your work?" "What the b——h—— has that to do with you, you old b——?" "Ah, my man, I know what you are aiming at as well as you do," said the magistrate—"twenty-one days." The tramp wanted to get a heavier sentence than twenty-one days; he would have been all right then. Mr. Charles Simmons.

3347. Now, you have had a pretty good experience of this class of men; what would be your remedy?—Well, I will tell you honestly, sir; I do not know what to make of them; after all this experience, I can scarcely tell you anything, that really I could vouchsafe would not occur again with them. They are as variable as a weathercock. You go into a casual ward, and you would expect to find it full; it is naturally about the way they are drifting. You go and you find only half a dozen there. You go to another ward, where you do not expect to find them, as they would naturally be going the other way; it is full. You cannot account for them in any way; they are a singular class, and they are a class that only a very few people who have to deal with them know anything about. Year after year they are there, and there they stick. They are casuals, and casuals they will remain till they go into the infirmary and die.

3348. I suppose there is a great deal of what you call community of information among them?—I will guarantee to say, if you were to post up a notice in any casual ward you like to-day—this is Thursday—that the casual wards would be closed on Saturday, there would not be an applicant for admission on that day; it circulates like electricity almost; you may hardly believe it possible. I have been a little behind the curtain; and I know that a number of them meet at a certain place of a morning from perhaps three or four different parts of London.

3349. If there was any change of diet in one workhouse, would that be passed round directly?—Well, I am very pleased to say there are only two places now where there is any variation from the regular diet. There were a good many at one time, but the guardians have gradually come to see that it was only an inducement to tramps to come into their wards, and they fell back on the ordinary diet.

3350. If the soup were cut off at Kensington, would it be known all round London the next day?—It would, sir; it would not be more than two days before it was known all over London; they would not fill up as they do now.

3351. What percentage of the casuals are there, do you think, who prefer prison life to ordinary casual ward life?—I do not know.

3352. Could you not give any idea?—You see there is such a lot of them convicted in the year.

3353. Well, what is the annual number of those convicted in the Metropolis?—1,187 last year. That is more than there has been before for a long period of years. Here are the particulars for last year. (Return handed in—see Appendix XI.)

3354. I suppose there was a very considerable increase in the total number of vagrants last year?—No, there was not a very great increase in the number of vagrants. The number was 183,354 in 1903; it was 189,003 in 1904. There was an increase of 6,000.

3355. (Dr. Downes.) Could you give us the number of the convictions for previous years?—Yes. In 1903 there were 991; in 1902, 857; 692 in 1901; and 504 in 1900.

3356. (Chairman.) A good many witnesses have been in favour of having some system of labour colonies; have you thought of that at all?—I have thought of it a good deal, sir. I dare say you would succeed in getting a few there, but I do not think you would get the old habitual tramps there. They are not working men. If you give them a job for a day or two days perhaps, they might do that, but you must not expect them to work longer; they do not like working longer than a day or two.

3357. It might not be a case of liking if they were committed to be detained there?—If you could get them there and keep them there, sir.

3358. Yes?—I do not see how you can mend matters with an old tramp; because, if you had an old tramp there, the next morning your labour master would want to put him to work, would give him a shovel and say, "You go and do so-and-so." What would be his answer? I can tell you. He would hand the shovel back to the labour master and say, "You do the work yourself; I did not come here to work." Then you would say, "Lock him up." That is the very thing he would like. In the way prison is conducted now he would like it better than he does the casual ward or anything else. I have been looking at the question in all those sorts of lights, sir.

Mr. Charles
Simmons.

23 Feb. 1905.

3359. You do not see that any compulsion could be exercised to make him work?—I cannot see it, sir. What could you do? Some gentleman has said, "We would feed him on bread and water." If you could get the House of Commons to pass an Act of Parliament to put the tramp on bread and water, you might do it; but I am very doubtful if you will ever get them to consent to such a thing as that. They would say it was worse than penal servitude. In my list there is about 950 habitual tramps. The total number of casuals would average about 1,700 or 1,800. A lot of them are young fellows. If you could get hold of them when they first come into the casual ward and get them away, something might be done. But I must tell you the truth about it; the Salvation Army have tried, and the Church Army have tried, but neither of them can succeed with the tramp; neither of them can keep him out of the casual wards. If he goes to them it is only for a few days, and he is back again into the casual ward; and I say, if those two societies cannot do anything for him, I am afraid there is not any other that can lift him out of the rut he is in.

3360. But in neither of those cases have they any power of compulsion. If you were to add compulsion, and a man was committed to a labour colony, as he would be committed to prison?—He would say, "I have come here, but I have not come here to work."

3361. Now, you have had a pretty good experience of tasks of work; is there any task that you can suggest as a better one in the case of men who are not up to doing stone breaking, we will say?—Well, they can pick oakum, if they like. When a superintendent finds a man is not strong enough to break stones he gives him four pounds of oakum to pick. If a man comes into a casual ward and says, "I cannot break stones, but I will try my best," and fails, the superintendent says, "Here, come out of that and pick some oakum."

3362. As a practical man, have you any suggestion to make with regard to task?—I cannot suggest any other task, sir. The only difficulty is that if you put them to a task, by which you interfere with outside labour, you will not be long before you know of it; you will soon have a procession or something from the trades affected to the House of Commons to know why they are to be cheated out of their living by paupers.

3363. I think you said there is wood chopping in some of the wards?—Yes, in some of them they chop wood; principally for their own consumption.

3364. Do they make anything out of that?—I dare say they do; they tell me they do not make anything out of the oakum now.

3365. I think in some places they do make something out of wood chopping?—I believe they do. In one or two places where they were doing a fair trade they have had to discontinue it.

3366. (Mr. Davy) Why?—It interfered with outside labour; professional wood choppers very soon began to kick up a bother about it.

3367. (Chairman.) You have some good stone breakers in the wards, I suppose?—Yes, there are some very good ones in the casual ward, I can assure you; men who think nothing of knocking off 10 cwt. of stone by ten or eleven o'clock in the morning. Then they have finished, and they have nothing to do but sit down all day.

3368. Have you had experience of the shelters in London—Salvation Army shelters and so on?—No, sir, I have not. I have kept clear of those shelters; and common lodging-houses have not come in my way.

3369. I am not suggesting that they have come within your actual official duty; but I thought you would have had some knowledge of them?—No, I have not. There is only one thing—I have no business to say it, I know—I have seen cases myself of men who have come out of a Salvation Army shelter into a casual ward to be cleaned, because they were actually walking about alive.

3370. Have you any knowledge of what the supervision of those places is?—No, I have not. I have never been in them; I thought I had quite enough to do with the casual wards.

3371. I thought perhaps you might very likely have known from your own clients?—I will not tell you from hearsay; I do not believe in hearsay tales; I like to know from actual facts.

3372. You do not believe everything you hear in the casual wards?—Oh, no, not by a long way.

3373. (Mr. Davy.) What staff have you got?—Four officers, sir.

3374. And what are their actual duties?—To visit the casual wards and point out to the guardians' officers any of the tramps that they have seen once before within a month; point them out as being liable to detention; and they are kept at most places. There are one or two places where they are not kept; Poplar, for instance, and at Whitechapel they do not keep them.

3375. Neither Poplar nor Whitechapel have the four days' detention?—No.

3376. Do you suppose that tramps, as a rule, sleep in the casual wards several times in the same month?—Oh, there are hundreds of them sleep for a month in the casual wards. If I were to start as a tramp to-morrow I could have fifty-six nights' lodging and be a stranger at every place I went into.

3377. For the first time round?—Yes, there are twenty-eight casual wards, and the first round you go you take fifty-six nights doing it, provided you are not pointed out by our officers.

3378. Your officers do not visit each tramp ward every night?—No, they cannot visit all the wards every night. Each ward is usually visited three times a week.

3379. So a man might go a considerable time without being identified?—The probability is he would be caught in the second or third ward. My officers often identify a man whom the superintendent says is a perfect stranger; but they have seen him in other places three or four times within the month.

3380. Do they make any record of where they have seen him before?—Oh, yes, each officer keeps a record of that.

3381. So a man is not detained simply on the statement of your officer; he must say where he has seen him before?—The guardians' officer says, "Where have you seen him?" "At such and such a casual ward on such and such a date." So it can be verified at any time that he was there and was seen there.

3382. You have no authority over the guardians, I suppose?—No, sir.

3383. You cannot enforce the two days' detention, for instance?—No. If I see anything that is not according to the regulations, I generally make it a rule to call the superintendent's attention to it, and ask him to speak to the casual ward committee and get it rectified; and I am pleased to say in 99 times out of 100 I succeed in getting it done without any trouble. It saves making reports and answers, and all that sort of thing; I get it done easily.

3384. Then you know many hundreds of tramps by sight yourself?—I do not now, sir.

3385. You do not do any identifying work now?—No, not now. I have quite enough to do to see that the places are kept clean and tidy, and the casuals get all they ought to have—that their bedding is sufficient and so on. The places are a good deal warmer than I would like, but even then I have had a tramp, with the thermometer on the wall at 70°, complain: "It is cold here, Mr. Simmons; it is very cold."

3386. A tramp is ordinarily detained two nights, and four nights if he has been in a casual ward previously within the month?—Yes.

3387. The theory of the thing is that he should only have two nights' lodging in the month, is it not?—Yes; he goes in on Thursday night say, works Friday, and is out Saturday morning.

3388. Then he is supposed to be out of the tramp ward for a month?—Yes; if he gets in again within a month, he is liable to be identified and detained four nights.

3389. You have told us these people live in tramp wards, but apparently the regulation is that they shall only live in tramp wards two days in a month; where do they live the other days?—They do not mind the regulation; if a tramp likes the ward he is there again within the month, perhaps in a fortnight.

3390. You have four officers?—Yes; that is in addition to the guardians' officer at the ward, who may detect the tramp himself and detain him four days.

3391. Do they mind being detained four days?—Not many of them.

3392. Even if they were detained four days, there must be many nights in which they could not or do not sleep in tramp wards?—I do not know anything about that. I do not think there are many old tramps who do not sleep in a tramp ward.

3393. Every night?—Every night. I saw a man who had been carrying boards on the road come into the ward one evening when I was there. I know him well. I said "Well, Smith, could you not pay for your night's lodging to-night?" "Yes, Mr. Simmons, I could have paid for it; but where could I get a night's lodging like I am going to have here? I have got a nice hot supper, a nice hot bath, a nice clean bunk to sleep in and a clean shirt to put on, and when I come in here I know what I bring in and I know what I am going to take out." "Well" I said, "do you not in a lodging-house?" He said "No, not always." I asked him a natural question. "Oh, no," he said; "it was not that. Me and my mate went into a lodging-house one night; he had got on a new pair of boots; when we got up in the morning he had an old pair; his new boots were gone." I took that story for what it was worth.

3394. What I mean is this; a tramp is not supposed to sleep in a casual ward more than two nights a month?—That is so.

3395. And to ensure that we keep a staff of four officers?—Yes.

3396. Yet you say they do sleep in the tramp ward?—Yes, four officers cannot be at twenty-eight wards in one night; there are practically twenty-four wards clear of the officers.

3397. How many tramps are identified and detained in a year?—In 1904 there were 17,801 identifications of adults.

3398. Were all those persons detained four nights?—Well, perhaps one of them has been detained twenty times in a year.

3399. You mean some tramps do not mind the detention?—I will not say that, but they would rather be detained than they would be out in the street at night.

3400. You have furnished us with a table showing the number of persons refused admission at the various casual wards for want of room (this table is printed in Appendix XI.) I notice that there are 21,367 refusals altogether, and 13,454 of these, or nearly two-thirds, are in five wards, viz.—Hackney, Marylebone, Poplar, Thavies Inn, and Whitechapel. How do you account for that?—Well, Thavies Inn, that is the city place, is an association ward.

3401. Then Hackney?—I do not think this year you will find any refusals at all at Hackney, because they have got into new wards now, very much larger than the old ones.

3402. Marylebone?—Marylebone is a nice easy place, only a little oakum to pick; you pick as much as you like.

3403. Poplar?—No work at all.

3404. Whitechapel?—Only oakum to pick; and it is an association ward.

3405. So that the easiest wards have the greatest number of refusals?—Yes.

3406. Just what you might expect?—Yes.

3407. Now there are some wards with no refusals at all—St. Pancras has none?—No.

3408. Why is that?—Because the casuals have to work there and do the task.

3409. At Guildford Street only nine refusals?—They have to do their task of work there.

3410. Chelsea none?—They have to do their task of work there.

3411. Your figures I suppose are in favour of uniformity of administration?—Not the least doubt about it.

3412. Do you see any chance of getting uniformity of treatment short of having one governing body?—No, you must have one governing body; you must have the whole of London under one authority.

Mr. Charles
Simmons.
23 Feb. 1905.

3413. What do these people do who are refused admission?—Go to another ward.

3414. They might be refused there?—Well, then, they go to another. They are very hard-working people. I can assure you they will walk all the way from Mile End up to Whitechapel. They will do it in a day, and all the way from Whitechapel down to Mile End, the other way.

3415. Do you mean that ultimately all these people are taken into some ward?—Well, no, I will not say that, because I happen to know a good many of them have the means of getting a lodging for themselves. They have what they call a leaving place, where they leave their money before they go to the casual ward. It is a difficult job to spot them. I have only been able to spot one, and that was by accident. I saw a man in the casual ward, and later on I went to a tobacconist's shop myself to get some tobacco, and while there I heard a voice that I recognised, and I saw it was this man asking for what he had left. The tobacconist gave him a shilling, and the tramp gave him a penny, and then he saw me. The tobacconist came to serve me at once, so that he could get rid of me.

3417. Has it ever come to your knowledge that these people who have been refused admission to casual wards, have had to sleep out?—No, never. And there is another thing. I have stood at the top of the street where the casual ward is and watched them come away, forty of them one night, who have been refused; they came laughing and chaffing one another and talking up to the top of the street and then they spread out like a fan and were gone. I asked the policeman after they were all gone and cleared away: "Do you ever have much trouble with the tramps here who are refused for want of room?" "I do not know anything about them," he said, "we never have anything to do with them."

3418. You know a good many people do sleep out in London?—Yes, I have heard so; and I have no doubt this is so sometimes in the year.

3419. Would they be the casual class, do you think?—No, I do not think so, sir. I do not think you would find many casuals sleeping out in the street, because the London casual wards are nearly all full, and if the man has been in half a dozen casual wards, he always knows where there is an empty one, or where there is room for him.

3420. That is rather borne out by the fact that in some casual wards in your return there have not been any refusals?—That is it, sir.

3421. Are you told of every case where a tramp is charged before the magistrates?—Yes.

3422. Have you a return?—Yes.

3423. Do you follow the sentences given by the magistrates?—Yes.

3424. Do they vary very much?—Yes.

3425. Can you give us an illustration?—A man tears up his clothes and he goes before a certain magistrate and he gets three days perhaps; at the most seven. He will go before another magistrate in the Metropolis, and he is bound to get a month; if it is his second time he will get three months.

3426. Now at the police court where he gets three days, I suppose there is a second magistrate; what would he give?—He will give him fourteen days or a month.

3427. So you have two magistrates sitting at the same court, one giving three days, another fourteen days or a month?—Yes.

3428. Is there more than one instance of that in London?—I do not know whether there is another that is so plain to be seen as that one is. It is plain to me, because I know of all these prosecutions and I take down all the sentences.

Mr. Charles Simmons. 3429. Do the officers of the guardians find any difficulty in getting convictions?—No, very seldom. It is very seldom a man is discharged; last year there were only a few discharged.

23 Feb. 1905. 3430. So they are convicted, but given varying sentences?—Yes.

3431. Do you find that any considerable number of men ask to see the medical officer?—No, not a great many.

3432. Is it the practice of London magistrates to ask for a medical certificate in each case?—I do not know whether they ever ask for it; it is always handed up to them.

3433. In every case?—Not in every case. If a man is well and able, the same as you and I might be, we should be packed off to break 10 cwt. of stones, without a certificate. If we did not do it, the magistrates would not require a certificate for us, because we would not be able to say to him that we were not strong enough to do the work.

3434. I gather from what you have told us of your view of labour colonies that you think there is a class who would possibly like them?—As I said before, if you could get hold of youngsters before they get the casual ward taint you might do something with them, but if you once let them get the taint of the casual ward thoroughly into them it never leaves them. As I have told you, a tramp may go for a tour round the country. But, otherwise we know where he is; if he is not in the casual ward, he is in prison.

3435. With regard to that man you told us of, who has had that series of twelve months' sentences, why does he not go into his workhouse?—Do you think a man like that will give his liberty up? If he only got two days' liberty in the year, he would not give it up.

3436. But does he not give his liberty up; he has been convicted nineteen times and has spent eight years in gaol?—Yes.

3437. Why does he prefer gaol; I quite understand his preferring the casual ward to the workhouse, but why does he prefer the gaol to the workhouse?—I do not know. He says he is better treated and has less work to do. If he went into a workhouse he would be classed as an able-bodied man; he would have his work to do, and that would not suit him.

3438. Do you know whether he is classed as an able-bodied man in prison?—I do not know, sir.

3439. Do you know the other man you told us of?—Yes, I have seen him once or twice.

3440. Does he look like an able-bodied man?—He is not a big fellow, he is a little fellow, rather slender, but he is a man who can crack stones as quick as a good many of them, if he likes.

3441. You told us about vagrants preferring a sentence of more than 21 days. Are you referring to recent years or was that some time ago?—Oh, the present time.

3442. You do not know the reason for that idea?—No, sir.

3443. Anyway it is an idea of the tramps?—Yes.

3444. (Sir William Chance.) I understand you to say that vagrants as they are known in the country are not found in London, so far as the casual wards are concerned?—No. We get country casuals sometimes in London. As I said before if there is anything in London going on, then we get an influx of country tramps.

3445. But still the London tramp as a rule is not the tramp that is known to the country?—No.

3446. In London there are associated wards in some unions and cells and associated wards in others?—There are about four associated wards now, sir, and twenty-four wards with separate cells.

3447. Having regard to the class of vagrants who frequent your casual wards, should you consider the system of separate cells has had any effect?—Yes, it has.

3448. In what way?—It reduced the number of tramps a great deal for sometime.

3449. It reduced the number in London?—Yes.

3450. Does it have any effect now?—They have got a different class of tramps now to what there was when I first started. The present tramps do not mind separate cells so much now.

3451. They have got accustomed to it?—Yes.

3452. Do you approve of the separate cells as against associated wards?—I do, because if an honest real working-man wants a night's lodging he can get it there without having to mix up with all the rough tramps that are about; and when you go into an associated ward you meet the rough tramps. The associated wards are in Thavies Inn, Whitechapel, and Poplar; and there is one more—Islington, but they do not go to Islington so much. There are three unions where there are associated wards and one where there is no task of work.

3453. Do they get a rougher class of tramp in those unions than in the others?—Well, not much rougher; but in the associated wards they are all round one room picking their oakum; in separate berths they are parted from one another.

3454. But do you note any difference in the tramps who now go to the casual wards with cells and those who go to the associated wards?—Well, there is not a great deal of difference in them now; there used to be, but there is not now.

3455. If the habitual tramps were taken away from the London casual wards by means of a labour colony, what would happen?—I think if some were taken away their places would be filled by others directly.

3456. Does it not follow from that that the casual wards in London are not ample for the demands made upon them?—No, they are too ample I am sorry to say. When there were twenty-four casual wards there were not nearly so many refused for want of room as now.

3457. (Mr. Davy.) Have you received complaints that the casual wards are filled in consequence of the shelters?—Yes. Several of the superintendents of wards have complained.

3458. (Sir William Chance.) That was a very important piece of evidence you gave about visiting the casual wards with the President of the Local Government Board. I take it the poor give to tramps or those people that you are talking about, more than the rich?—That is so; there is that difference between the East end and the West end of London.

3459. Supposing the casual wards were abolished and it was laid down that casuals should go into the workhouse, do you think that would have any effect in reducing the number?—There would be a good many of them who would get work, I believe.

3460. If you treated the casual as an ordinary applicant for relief and admitted him to the workhouse as an ordinary pauper, do you think that would be a deterrent?—I do not think it would.

3461. You know that has been proposed?—Yes, I heard of it years ago.

3462. But you do not think it would have any effect?—I do not think it would have any effect.

3463. And yet they dislike the workhouse?—They would rather stop out in the street than go into the workhouse, a great number of them.

3464. Then would not that be a deterrent?—I do not know. Well, it would be a deterrent in one sense, no doubt. We all know there are plenty of people who would rather die than go into a workhouse: you will see a case in the newspapers pretty frequently where a person dies from want and would not go into the workhouse.

3465. The casual ward is of some advantage then to people who would be unwilling to go into the workhouse?—They do not mind being in the casual ward, but they do object to the ordinary pauper. Here is an instance: I went into a casual ward one morning; one of the ordinary inmates of the workhouse whose duty it was to see that the hammers and things used for breaking stones were all right, happened to say something to one of the casuals who was breaking stones. The casual laid his hammer down, and looked the inmate up and down two or three times, and then said, "Are you speaking to me, pauper?" "Yes," he said, "I am speaking to you." "Well" said the casual, "all I have got to say is, you ought to be ashamed of yourself. I am here generally three months in the year; the other nine months I work, but no matter when I come you are always here. You are always living on the ratepayers, I am content to live on them for three months in the year, I am not a pauper; I am a casual."

3466. (Mr. Simpson.) Is the London tramp generally a drunkard?—A good many of them are.

3467. Mostly drunkards?—I would not say mostly.

3468. Do you suppose most of them have got to their condition through drink?—Well, I should say about nineteen out of twenty, as far as I have spoken to them about it, and I have spoken to a good many: drink has been the foundation.

3469. Do many of them, do you think, get into prison for stealing and housebreaking, and so on?—Not the tramps. I think I know of only two cases where the tramps have been treated as criminals.

3470. You say that the tramp's aim is to get a sentence of twenty-one days or more?—More than twenty-one days.

3471. If a tramp knocked down a policeman or broke into a shop, he would have a good chance of getting more than twenty-one days. Why does he tear up his clothes instead of picking pockets; is his a higher standard of honesty, do you think?—You are going beyond me now.

3472. He is not a thief, so far as you know?—No.

3473. And he does not get violently drunk: he does not often get run in for assault on the police?—No, I do not think they get drunk enough for that, sir.

3474. Do you find many of them are really Londoners, or do they generally come from the country?—Not one in fifty is a London tramp: they are all country born, or from Ireland, Scotland, or Wales.

3475. And do you suppose they have come up to London to work and then become tramps through taking to drink?—No, sir. From what I have seen of them when they first came in it appeared to me that they had been tramps for sometime in the country places.

3476. You mean to say they had been tramping about the country, and they found London about as good a place to live in as anywhere else?—There is no other place like it, sir. If you were to go into some of the casual wards you would be surprised to find that they were such nice comfortable places. I have been at my work a good while and I was at it before there were any separate berths at all; they were all association wards and it was very different then to what it is now. When I first went to the wards the casuals lived in the attic; now they live in the dining room: that is the difference, sir.

3477. (Dr. Downes.) You say that you get a different class of tramp now to what you got formerly?—Yes.

3478. Is it not so rough a class?—Nothing like it, sir: they are a more civilised lot.

3479. Less criminal than they were?—I never knew them to be criminal, scarcely any of them.

3480. Drunken vagrants are referred to the police, are they not?—Yes, they are handed over to the police.

3481. Were you connected with the police before you were appointed to your present office?—I was, sir.

3482. And were your assistants connected with the police?—Yes, sir.

3483. Do you think there is an advantage in police experience in dealing with this class?—Well, the Local Government Board think so.

3484. You find it an advantage in your work?—I found it a great advantage when I was a visiting officer.

3485. If you were appointing a visiting officer would you choose a policeman?—I should.

3486. Have you noticed any change of late years in the character of the London tramps?—Yes. I tell you they are lambs now. When I first went to work, they were tigers in comparison.

3487. Do you find the old soldier amongst them now?—Well, not so much, I think. I can hardly tell you because I have very little to do with them now. My work is to inspect the wards and see that everything is carried on all right there. My visiting officers come more in contact with the tramps.

3488. So that really your visiting officers would know more of the actual character of the men than you do yourself?—Yes.

3489. I understand you to say that the modern London tramp ward is more attractive than the old form?—I do not know that it is more attractive. Fresh comers seem to me to like it.

3490. And you think "once a London tramp, always a London tramp"?—Yes, sir, as far as my experience goes. When they once appear in London, they do not many of them go away.

3491. In regard to the tramp wards with working cells, have you had any complaint of want of space in the working cell for swinging the hammer?—I have never had a complaint of that kind from them.

3492. Have you noticed anything of the kind yourself?—No; in those I saw they had plenty of room, I should say, for swinging the sledge about.

3493. Do you find more refusals for want of room in the outside wards than in those in the centre of London?—I think you will find the City has the heaviest refusals, and that is about the centre.

3494. How about the Strand district?—Strand and St. Giles refuse very few compared with what the others do.

3495. Have you had any complaints of difficulty in seeing the medical officer?—Never.

3496. If a tramp asks to see the medical officer he always sees him?—Yes.

3497. There is no systematic medical examination as to fitness for work, I take it?—No, I do not think there is.

3498. But if a tramp complains that he is not fit to do his work what happens then?—He is put to something else; the medical officer is fetched to him to see if he is fit or not. If the doctor certifies that he is fit, he has to do the work. If the doctor certifies that he is not fit, there is no further trouble.

3499. Have you had any experience of what I may call time task instead of piece work?—No, I have not.

3500. Have you formed any opinion as to whether tramps would prefer a time task or piece work?—No; because one will do his work in an hour and another will take half a day to do it.

3501. In the case of the casual who did thirty cwt. of stone; what was the stone—granite?—Yes, fairly hard granite; such as they use for the roads.

3502. I think your instructions are not to identify men, who, there is reason to believe, are bona fide working men?—Yes, that is so; if the officers consider a man is really a working man they would not identify him; they would say nothing and go on their way. That has always been the practice from the time I started till now.

3503. What happens to a sick tramp in London?—He goes to the infirmary.

3504. You have no information as to how many go into the infirmary in the year?—No.

3505. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Supposing a man simply refuses his task, and does not give any reason, he is taken before a magistrate?—Yes, sir.

3506. He is not medically examined then, unless he asks to be?—Oh, yes he is.

3507. Examined by the doctor whether he asks for it or not?—Yes.

3508. Then no man is brought before a London magistrate for refusing a task, without being examined by a medical officer?—I will not say exactly all. Some men you can see are quite fit.

3509. Then there are those who in the opinion of the superintendent are quite fit to do their task?—Yes; but in some cases the magistrate would demur, he would say he did not think that perhaps the man was fit to do his task; then he says he must have a medical certificate.

3510. There is an appreciable number of men who are not examined by a doctor?—Yes, those who are good strong able-bodied men.

Mr. Charles Simmons.

23 Feb. 1905.

Mr. Charles Simmons. 3511. (Dr. Downes.) As regards that man you mentioned, who had been convicted nineteen times, can you suggest any reason why he should go to the St. George-in-the-East wards for nine of his convictions?—No, sir, I cannot.

3512. Do the various wards differ in the number of convictions they get?—Yes.

3513. (Mr. Davy.) Do you suppose that man is sane?—I think if he were not the prison authorities would very soon find out.

TENTH DAY.

Friday, 24th February, 1905.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair).

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

CAPTAIN EARDLEY-WILMOT.
CAPTAIN SHOWERS.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary).

Mr. WILLIAM HARBURT DAWSON, called; and Examined.

Mr. William H. Dawson. 3514. (Chairman.) Mr. Dawson, I think you are aware of what the object of this Committee is. You are willing, I believe, to give us some evidence with regard to the method of dealing with vagrants in Germany?—Yes.

3515. Before we go abroad, have you any suggestions to offer with regard to the treatment of vagrancy in England?—My idea is to exterminate the vagrant. I would distinguish between the genuine seeker of work and the man who will not work.

3516. Yes?—The genuine seeker of work I think we should help in every possible way, but the man who will not work, I think we should deal with him under the penal law as is done in Germany: not under the poor law. The status of the man who does not seek and does not want work should simply not be recognised; he should be punished as a loafer.

3517. We have been perhaps rather dealing with the vagrants in three classes: one—we will put the best man first—the man who would work if he could get work?—Precisely.

3518. Then, secondly, the man who would not work if he could get it; and thirdly, the poor man or woman who, from age, or incapacity, or disease, or otherwise, cannot work?—My main idea, speaking on the broad question of principle, is that we should assist the work seekers in every way we can by making it possible for them to go from place to place in search of work. I should like to explain how that is done in Germany and Switzerland by relief stations of various kinds. The tramp—what we usually mean by the tramp—the persistent loafer, I should transfer entirely from the poor law to the penal law. To that end I should abolish the casual ward, which merely nurtures the loafer.

3519. Instead of the tramp ward where would you lodge him; in the police station?—You refer to bona fide work-seekers? I would establish relief stations or shelters where an honest working man could obtain lodging for the night, either in return for a small charge if he has money, or in return for work; but we should not pauperise him by doing that.

3520. In Germany, is there any system at all akin to the system which is in practice here in Gloucestershire and in Wiltshire, namely, by passing on a man by means of a way-ticket?—That is what is done; that is the German system practically.

3521. Does that way-ticket in Germany, or the equivalent of the way-ticket, contain any order for a mid-day meal of bread?—Here is a copy of the Wanderschein or wandering-ticket which is given to the German tramp, der Wanderer. This is used in the province of Westphalia, and its equivalent in most parts of Germany. The system has been most fully carried on in Westphalia.

3522. Could you kindly describe what it is?—I may say this is translated in the recent Board of Trade Report* prepared by Mr. D. F. Schloss. I have compared the translation; I find it is very good. On page 17 there is a literal translation of the conditions of the Westphalian Wanderschein.

3523. (Mr. Davy.) Would it not be convenient if you gave us a list of the papers the German workman has to carry?—I may explain that under the Industrial Code every man under twenty-one must carry with him a labour book. He cannot be employed without having a labour book. Above that age, he is no longer required to carry a labour book; in place of it, he can carry a certificate in connection with the insurance funds, or his army discharge papers. I have no copy of the labour book, but it contains the name, the age, the place of birth, personal characteristics, like stature, shape of face and anything by which the man may be identified.

3524. (Chairman.) By whom is that book issued?—It is issued by the police in the first place.

3525. And given to him?—And given to him before he can be employed; he cannot be employed unless he has this labour book. That applies to persons under twenty-one.

3526. It would be given to him as a boy?—Yes.

3527. (Mr. Davy.) Would you tell us the German name of the book?—Arbeitsbuch. When the young man is employed, that book is taken possession of by the employer.

3528. (Chairman.) At what age is that book given to him?—Directly he goes into employment.

3529. Is it not at any recognised age?—No, directly he is employed for the first time.

3530. Then he gets a labour book, which is a certificate that he is ready for employment?—That he is employed; that book is retained by his employer so long as he remains in the employment.

3531. Every working boy in Germany has one of those books?—He must have that book till he is twenty-one. That is required by an Imperial statute.

3532. What is the process with regard to that book when the youth goes into a factory or into other employment?—The employer takes charge of the book, and notes in it the particular kind of employment and the date of commencement.

3533. If he goes on, we will say, for four or five years, is his continued employment noted year by year?—No; but when he leaves, the employer is bound by law to certify his discharge and to give him a character, and the date of his leaving the employment is entered in the book.

* Report on Agencies and Methods for dealing with the Unemployed in certain Foreign Countries [1904].

3534. And the cause of his leaving?—Well, I do not think that is necessary, but the employer is bound to give, on the man's demand, a certificate of conduct, and with that book the man can travel. If he goes to another employment he gives up his book in the same way, and the particulars are entered as before.

3535. That book, we will say, is a local passport?—Well, not merely local; it will take him anywhere. An Imperial passport we might call it.

3536. Then, does that passport entitle him to be fed?—Oh, no, not in the least. It is really more a legitimization.

3537. Supposing the man, from one cause or another, is indigent, does the labour book in any way help him to obtain assistance on the road?—It serves to identify him, and it is accepted by the various shelters as being a proof of his bona fides. Without either that book, or, in the case of an adult, a certificate in connection with the insurance funds, he is not accepted in those shelters.

3538. Are those State shelters?—No, there are no State shelters.

3539. (Mr. Davy.) Are there not other papers which are accepted as proof of a man's identity?—There are several other documents which are accepted in lieu of these—the army discharge certificate, insurance fund papers, and others.

3540. There is nothing at all equivalent to a casual ward?—No.

3541. Is there no public place where he can go and seek bed and board?—Not a public place, because the German poor law does not recognise the status of what we know as the tramp. A man without this passport would have to go to the police; from them he would obtain lodging.

3542. What does the indigent man do; a man who has committed no crime, but who has got his book, and wants relief?—If he has his book, on the strength of that book he would be accepted in one of the private institutions.

3543. (Sir William Chance.) They are voluntary institutions?—Yes; but I shall come later to differentiate between those relief stations. We have not come to that point yet. There are two classes, one entirely voluntary, the Herberge, supported by voluntary societies; and the other known as the relief station, maintained by the local authorities.

3544. (Chairman.) I was trying to follow out what an honest man would do if he were on the road seeking work?—That I can easily explain. Having this book or its equivalent, such as a certificate that he is connected with an insurance fund, he would be accepted in one of the voluntary shelters, the Herberge, or in a relief station the Verpflegungs-station. Perhaps we might concentrate attention upon the province of Westphalia, which I know very well. The same system applies to all Germany, but it is organised in provinces.

3545. How would the wayfarer find out about the voluntary shelter?—He could inquire. These voluntary shelters are found in every town of any size; in larger towns there may be two.

3546. Those are all voluntary institutions?—The Herbergen are voluntary. The relief stations, as I have said, are maintained by the local authorities.

3547. Would you kindly describe what a relief station is?—That is a small lodging maintained by what is known as the Kreis, or district; and its cost falls entirely upon the local funds. The Herbergen are established by philanthropic societies. These societies are helped out of the public funds; but for the most part the Herbergen are maintained by philanthropic societies, and church collections and private donations.

3548. Well, then, at one of these institutions the wayfarer would get bed and board, I suppose?—In the Herbergen there are three classes of lodgers. There are those who have a little money and who are willing to pay; there are those who are given free lodging and are required in return to give four or five hours' work in the forenoon; and then there are permanent lodgers resident in the town. It is a three-fold work.

3549. Where is it that the man is required to work?—In the same building, but in different departments.

3550. You mean that work is required in the voluntary benevolent institutions?—Yes, almost invariably in Germany, but not in Switzerland. Mr. William H. Dawson.

3551. Under what compulsion does he give that work?—Of course, by accepting lodging—it is a virtual contract—he knows the conditions upon which he enters; the conditions are entered upon his book. 24 Feb. 1905.

3552. How can the voluntary institution enforce work from him?—If the man enters, he knows the conditions upon which he is received.

3553. If, instead of working, the next morning he takes his stick and walks away?—Then he can be prosecuted.

3554. I see; then the institution has a legal right to the work?—I presume not more than any private lodging-house keeper would have in the case, we will say, of a man who did not pay for his board; it is virtually a contract.

3555. You mean, then, he pays for his board by work?—Yes.

3556. There is an agreement to that effect in the book?—Yes; it is mentioned in the conditions.

3557. (Mr. Simpson.) And the breach of contract is a criminal and not a civil matter?—He can be proceeded against, and I think, indeed, he can be handed over to the police. I have not translated the whole of these rules, because I thought it was unnecessary since they are given here in the Board of Trade Report.

3558. (Chairman.) Can you state the number of the Herbergen which are now in existence in Germany?—There are at the present time in Germany 466 Herbergen conducted by philanthropic societies, with about 20,000 beds. In the year 1903 these homes received 1,937,632 ordinary wanderers, and in addition they housed 28,721 lodgers resident in the town. Of these numbers 650,820 were received free as night lodgers; that is free, except that they gave work the next day. And they received in addition 32,766 without any payment at all.

3559. In some cases, then, the work is not required, even where no payment is made?—There is power to absolve entirely from any payment whatever, if it is thought desirable; if, for example, the journey to be made the next day is too far, they let the man off. The cost of the lodgings and food given to these men averages about 6d. each per night.

3560. When the man leaves the next day, what does he do for food?—He is given breakfast, and he is then expected to walk on; he is released about noon and he is expected to walk on to the next station.

3561. He is not released until about mid-day?—About mid-day; the rule is, "work in the morning, walk in the afternoon."

3562. Then he has only breakfast before he starts?—He may have food before he goes. When he has far to travel he may even have a free railway ticket.

3563. Does he get nothing between the breakfast and the termination of his walk?—He has no formal dinner, but he may take food with him, and in many places there are what are called by-stations, in which food is supplied during the day without lodging.

3564. The way-ticket system in Gloucestershire supplies the man with a loaf in the middle of the day, which he calls for at some special place?—There are many of those by-stations in Germany.

3565. Then the honest wayfarer seeking work can call at these stations, and, I suppose, by means of his book can get some refreshment?—Yes, he can get something. The rule is to give him a ticket from the place he leaves. There is a simple contract made between the society with an inn, which is recognised as a by-station.

3566. Who supplies the ticket?—The ticket is supplied by the relief station proper.

3567. The relief station proper where he spent the night?—Where he spent the night; he hands the ticket to the by-station and receives food in return for it.

3568. Can a man always have one of those?—No, I think that is rather exceptional.

3569. Are there laws against begging in Germany?—Yes, very severe laws.

3570. How is the man dealt with who has got no means of getting food between breakfast and when he arrives

Mr William H. Dawson. at the station, say seven o'clock in the evening?—That I am not able to say.

24 Feb. 1905. 3571. If he begs, he commits an offence?—I cannot say whether in every case he is given food in the middle of the day.

3572. Well, then, as regards the cost of the relief stations as distinguished from what are known as Herbergen?—The relief stations are not private institutions; they are maintained by the public funds, and I may say there is a great movement in Germany to make the local authorities responsible for establishing an adequate number of relief stations. There are not sufficient at present. The entire support of the relief stations is thrown on the local authorities.

3573. That would be equivalent, I suppose, to our rates?—Yes.

3574. Then the relief stations would almost be equivalent to our workhouses?—In Germany there is no real equivalent to our workhouse; there is only the poor house.

3575. The poor house; now, is that paid for out of State funds or local funds?—Local funds.

3576. Neither of those places are maintained by private benevolence?—The poor houses are purely local, and the cost falls upon the local funds.

3577. Out of what funds are the relief stations maintained?—Out of the Kreis or district funds.

3578. That would be equivalent to a county rate in England?—It would be a county rate, practically.

3579. There is no Imperial fund towards the cost of any of those relief stations?—I am not aware that there is anything in Germany corresponding to our grants-in-aid. Before we leave this question of relief stations, I would like to point out how thoroughly this work is done in the province of Westphalia, which I know particularly. I have here what is known as a "travelling map" of the whole of Westphalia, and on it you will see all the main roads and by-roads; there is a mark where there is a labour colony, and where there is a relief station, and wherever there is one of those Herbergen. In every one of the Herbergen and relief stations that map is to be found, and the house-father, as he is called, helps the traveller to find the road he wants to go, and draws out a route for him.

3580. These maps are to be found at each of the stations?—Yes. They are not given to the workmen themselves. You will find one on a larger scale hung up in the hall, as a rule, so that a working man coming in can consult it, and find the route he wants to go. The route is entered in the man's travelling book.

3581. Each journey the man takes is entered up in this book?—That book is a continuous journey record. There is entered up every night the date of his arrival, and the place that he is going to the next day is noted down, so that that book really follows the man throughout the whole of his journey or any number of journeys that may be necessary in search of work.

3582. He can obtain a fresh book, I suppose?—Yes, but a book lasts a very long time. I do not know how many places there are for the stamp of the relief station, but there is a very large number.

3583. Have you concluded your description of this system?—I was pointing out how completely the province is covered by these stations, and how those who conduct those stations try to help the workmen in every possible way.

3584. Now, in your opinion, does that system do away, to a large extent or altogether, with the habitual tramp?—It does not do away with the habitual tramp but it takes away—and that is the great argument for these stations—the necessity for a man begging and loafing; these relief stations and the labour colonies taken together, of course.

3585. Does it enable the authority, we will say the police authority, to detect the habitual tramp as against the honest wayfarer?—It does.

3586. That, of course, is a most desirable thing?—The man who founded those institutions felt that it was not fair that a man should have no alternative but to be taken up as a beggar or a loafer; therefore, these institutions were founded to take away the necessity for begging.

3587. Is every wayfarer obliged to have the book?—If he has not, he is liable to fall into the hands of the police.

3588. So a man without a book becomes liable to be apprehended?—Yes.

3589. If he is apprehended, how is he dealt with?—He is taken, of course, to the nearest police station.

3590. And before the magistrate or German court, whatever it is?—Justice there is far more summary than with us; it is not necessary to have a large open court; the man is dealt with by a single magistrate, who has large power in many cases.

3591. If he is found to be an habitual tramp, what sentence, as a rule, does he receive?—There comes in the institution known as the German workhouse proper, which is an institution for the reception of tramps and loafers and people of irregular lives.

3592. Does the sentence include detention in this workhouse?—Detention follows the sentence; he is first punished for his offence, and then, if he is an inveterate loafer and known to the police as such, he is sent to the workhouse; but that is quite a secondary punishment which follows upon the sentence for his specific offence.

3593. He would be punished for his offence by imprisonment and then remitted to the workhouse for detention?—Yes, he might be remitted to the workhouse.

3594. And for how long is a man sent to the workhouse?—The maximum time is for two years. I believe the average would be twelve months; but at the discretion of the President of the province—I was going to say of the director of the workhouse, for the President of the province acts on the recommendation of the director—the time may be extended.

3595. Does not the court who sentence him say how long the detention is to be?—Yes, but the director of the workhouse may in his discretion advise further detention to the President of the province, and the President of the province may extend the detention or not as he pleases, but he invariably acts on the recommendation of the director of the workhouse.

3596. Can he also recommend that the sentence be shortened?—I do not think that is done.

3597. Then, as I understand it, an habitual tramp would be taken by the police to a court, which sends him in the first place, to prison, if he is found guilty of begging?—Yes.

3598. And after that he is sent to a workhouse where he is detained from six months to two years?—Two years is the maximum; it cannot be extended beyond that time.

3599. That is the way in which the habitual tramp is dealt with in Germany?—Yes, and I would point out that not only the tramp pure and simple, but other offenders, really cognate offenders, are dealt with in the same way. I have given in my abstract of evidence a translation from the Imperial Penal Code, section 361, prescribing imprisonment for certain classes of offenders.

3600. Yes. I see you state that section 361 of the Imperial Code prescribes imprisonment for the following amongst other classes of offenders:—"Whoever wanders about as a vagabond; whoever begs or causes his children to beg or neglects to restrain from begging such persons as are under his control and oversight and belong to his household; whoever is so addicted to gambling, drunkenness, or idleness that he falls into such a condition as to be compelled to seek public help himself or for those for whose maintenance he is responsible; any female who is placed under police control owing to professional immorality, when she acts contrary to the police regulations issued in the interest of health, public order, and public decency, or who, without being under such control is guilty of professional immorality; any person who, while in receipt of public relief, refuses out of sloth to do such work suited to his strength as the authorities may offer him; any person who, after losing his past lodging, fails to procure another within the time allotted to him by the competent authority, and who cannot prove that in spite of his best endeavours he has been unable to do so?"—Yes. By a recent amendment to the Code, there is another class, viz. procurers and panders, who are likewise subject to imprisonment. In all those cases, detention in a workhouse generally follows imprisonment.

3601. This class of offenders is somewhat similar to what we call rogues and vagabonds in England, I suppose?—Yes, that is so.

3602. Can you give any figures as to the number of persons sent to the workhouses?—I have here a classification of all people who were sent to the workhouses of Prussia during the year 1903-4. These are official figures. There are twenty-four of these workhouses in Prussia, one in every province, and in the larger provinces more than one. Those twenty-four workhouses are intended for the reception of 14,836 men and women. On 1st April, 1903, there were in these twenty-four workhouses 9,964 persons; there entered during the year 10,363; there were discharged during the year 10,278; and on the 31st March, 1904, there remained in the workhouses 10,048 persons.

3603. Those are people who were committed to the workhouse?—Committed by law.

3604. Can you tell me whether under that system vagrancy has increased or diminished in Germany, say during the last twenty years?—It is maintained by Dr. von Bodelschwingh, who is the founder of the labour colonies, that under the system there has been a great diminution.

3605. That would be a diminution in the number of people dealt with by sentence from the court?—Yes. In the year 1881-2, 23,808 persons were sentenced to the workhouses in Prussia. In the year 1903-4, there were 10,363.

3606. That is less than a half?—I believe it would not be quite fair to take the earlier figures, for the reason that at that time some of the workhouses were in the habit of receiving a certain number of people who went there under the poor law, and they are included; but after some years these people were not received in the workhouses. The number for 1884, which included offenders only, was 15,474, against 10,363 in 1903-4.

3607. Those were people sentenced?—Yes.

3608. Are you able to say, from information that you can trust, that there has been a considerable diminution under that system?—I am convinced of it. I was informed by the director of the workhouse at Benninghausen—which is in the province of Westphalia—that there has certainly been a diminution in the commitments for these offences. Of course, it is not solely due, I must say, to the stringency of the law; it is also due, to some extent, to the existence of the labour colonies, which, of course, receive many people who otherwise might be thrown upon the road.

3609. Now, may we pass to the labour colonies. Are the labour colonies distinct from those relief stations and workhouses that you have spoken of?—Quite distinct; they are carried on by philanthropic societies.

3610. Then who goes to the labour colonies?—Any one who is on the road.

3611. They are voluntary institutions?—Quite voluntary: there is no compulsion to stay there.

3612. There is no commitment to a labour colony?—No, they are quite voluntary.

3613. How many labour colonies are there?—In 1903, I think the number was thirty-four in the whole of Germany.

3614. Thirty-four labour colonies?—With 3,978 places. There were admitted in the year 1903 to these labour colonies 10,307 people, practically all men; there is only one women's colony.

3615. Every one received comes in voluntarily?—Quite voluntarily.

3616. Do they earn money while they are there?—They are allowed to earn a very small amount. It is not called wages—it is called reward, but it is not much; yet it is enough to enable them, when they leave, to make a fresh start in life; perhaps to get new clothes or tools.

3617. What is the ordinary length of time for which people go to these colonies?—It varies very much indeed. When the colonies were started it was not required of the inmates that they should stay any specified time. Now, it is usual to require them to stay a certain time; as a rule not less than about two months.

3618. As short a time as two months?—That is the minimum; an inmate is required to sign a document to that effect. Mr. William H. Dawson.

24 Feb. 1905.

3619. Can you tell us what is the average time for which they stay?—I think I can give you that. At the end of December, 1903, there remained in the various colonies with a stay of two months, 1,837; with a stay of two to four months, 933; with a stay of four to six months, 462; with a stay of six to twelve months, 479; and with a stay of over twelve months, 257.

3620. And while they are in the colony what are they employed in generally?—For the most part in agricultural work, save in the two industrial colonies. There are two industrial colonies, one at Berlin, which I have visited twice, and one at Magdeburg.

3621. Who are responsible for the maintenance of the labour colonies?—Philanthropic societies.

3622. Not the State?—Not in the least; but the colonies receive grants as a rule from the provincial or local funds.

3623. Not from the Imperial funds?—No.

3624. Is there any supervision by the State officials?—Not in the least; they are quite voluntary.

3625. Is there any supervision by the police or the local authorities?—No.

3626. Have you any knowledge whether these institutions are self-supporting, or not?—They are not self-supporting.

3627. That is clear?—Taking the average of the labour colonies, the annual cost is about £10 per head, of which the inmates contribute by their labour about £4; that is taken as an average; in some cases the inmates earn more, and in some cases less; but the average is about £4 per head, which leaves £6 per head to be found by the societies.

3628. (Mr. Simpson.) Does that include the capital expenditure for starting the colony?—It includes everything. A great deal is talked nowadays about labour colonies; but it seems to me that those who use the phrase mean something quite different from what is understood in Germany. I read this week that at a poor law conference one speaker said, "Send the tramps to the labour colonies." The German labour colony would not do for tramps. There is no restraint, no compulsion; it is simply a benevolent institution that works from the moral side purely.

3629. (Sir William Chance.) I think the Belgian system of a penal labour colony is what is generally known to guardians in this country; I do not think they know much about German colonies. Perhaps that is the explanation?—Very probably.

3630. (Chairman.) Then in no case, as far as you know, are these colonies self-supporting?—Oh, no. Of course, you must remember the class of labour that is there; the class of men who go there are the very dregs of society.

3631. I see?—And there is another point, too, which should be very seriously borne in mind when we talk of establishing labour colonies in England. The rule is to buy land in a very rough uncultivated condition. Well, of course, a labour colony in its initial stages can employ a large amount of labour, but the more it becomes cultivated the less is the amount of labour that it can profitably employ.

3632. It all depends upon what the treatment is?—Well, they are not such large areas. Bielefeld is a very strong case in point. The Wilhelmsdorf labour colony at Bielefeld, which was the first, has been compelled to establish a branch in another part of the country because it could not afford to buy more land round about. Of course at the start it got the land in a very rough, worthless condition. It has worked it up and now the land round about has got dear, and they could not afford to buy any more, and they have had to establish another colony elsewhere.

3633. Is there any sanitary inspection of the houses and buildings in the labour colony?—That I cannot say; I should presume they would be under the local sanitary laws.

Mr. William H. Dawson. 3634. To that extent there may be inspection ?—There may be.

24 Feb. 1905. 3635. Going back to the workhouses, are the men who are sent to those places medically examined on admission ?—Yes ; as a rule there is a resident doctor. To refresh my memory, I went last autumn to Westphalia specially. I went over the Westphalian workhouse. Since then I have obtained through the Germany Embassy all the documents regarding its administration.

3636. (Mr. Davy.) What is the German name for the workhouse ?—Arbeitshaus.

3637. It is a bridewell ?—Yes.

3638. It is not what we call in England a workhouse ?—I maintain we should call our workhouses, poorhouses, which they really are.

3639. (Mr. Simpson.) As they call them in Scotland ?—Yes. The establishment and maintenance of the German workhouses fall on the provincial administration. The Chief President of the province exercises oversight, the Minister of the Interior being, of course, the supreme authority. The Westphalian workhouse was built in 1821 ; and I think it is significant that it has never had to be enlarged although the population of Westphalia has greatly increased in the interval, and indeed there are fewer people in that workhouse to-day than there were in 1821.

3640. (Sir William Chance.) There have been fluctuations in the numbers, no doubt ?—Yes.

3641. (Chairman.) Perhaps you can give us some description of this institution ?—The chief official is the director ; and there are chaplains for the Roman Catholics and the Protestant prisoners. There is a resident doctor, and then there is, of course, the usual staff, the labour-master, and several clerks. Now, the statute of the workhouse specifies this main purpose : “The institution will keep the prisoners to regular systematic work, where possible (I wish to emphasise this) the learning of a mechanical occupation, will exert religious influence for their moral improvement, will accustom them to severe discipline, order, and cleanliness, and by humane treatment will endeavour to bring them to a sober way of life, by the withholding of all intoxicating drinks. The prisoners are obliged to do all work given to them, to be obedient and to scrupulously observe the house-order. Unruly conduct, disobedience, repeated and gross uncleanness, lying, the incitement of other prisoners to similar excesses, and grossly immoral behaviour entail disciplinary penalties. The measure and kind of work are determined for each prisoner by the chief inspector after a conference with the doctor and labour master.” I pass over the penalties ; they are various. The house-order provides for unconditional obedience to the regulations. “The inmates shall live quietly and peaceably together, none disturbing the other at work, but rather by diligence, order, and decent moral conduct encouraging one another to improvement and setting one another a good example. Those who distinguish themselves in this way may expect that their good conduct will be recognised. Conversation on past misdemeanour may on no account take place, nor may any inmate reproach another with any misdemeanour or with his past mode of life, abuse him, or in any way physically misuse him ; even threats are punishable.” There are other regulations which I may pass over.

3642. Are those general regulations ?—Yes ; as a rule they are more or less the same for each workhouse. I recognise several of these provisions as being the same for the Berlin workhouse.

3643. They are issued by the Minister of the Interior ?—Under the cognizance of the Minister of the Interior.

3644. I suppose there are means of punishment for various offences ?—Yes.

3645. Have they anything in the way of cells ?—They have cells, yes ; there was one man being punished while I was there ; he had tried to escape.

3646. Have they other means of punishment ?—Oh, yes, it is mostly by reduction of diet, and sleeping upon the floor ; there is no corporal punishment.

3647. Then they have cells, and, I suppose, warders to look after the inmates over and above the ordinary attendants ?—The workhouse is under strict military prison discipline.

3648. (Mr. Davy.) As a matter of fact are not these places garrisoned by soldiers ?—No, there were only two soldiers on watch when I was there.

3649. With loaded rifles ?—They have side arms, but in Germany the town police have these.

3650. (Mr. Simpson.) Do they use dark cells by way of punishment ?—Yes.

3651. (Chairman.) Who imposes the punishments ?—The director ; he has absolute control.

3652. Perhaps you can now give us the figures as to commitments to workhouses ?—Yes, these figures, I may say, quite disregard people who formerly were admitted under the poor law to whom I referred just now, so that we are comparing absolutely the same class of people. In the Benninghausen workhouse in Westphalia there were committed during the five years 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895 and 1896, 383 persons on an average per year, and taking the last five years, the average was 362.4 ; so that there was a slight reduction, in spite of the increased population.

3653. Those are all people committed by process of law ?—Yes.

3654. What is the mode of employment ?—There are three classes of work. First of all, there is the work for the establishment : domestic work, culinary work, and so forth ; then there is agricultural work ; and then, finally, there is industrial work. There are various trades.

3655. Are there teachers for the different trades ?—Yes, the men are under overseers, skilled men who teach and who supervise the work. The report for 1903 specified twenty-five kinds of employment that were taken part in by the inmates that year :—field work, locksmithry, joinery, basket-making, white-washing, chair-plaiting, tanners, masons, roofers, weavers, spoolers—that is in connection with the weaving—tailors, shoe-makers, saddlers, hair-sorters, book-binders, cigar-makers, writers, bakers, butchers, machine-turners, gardeners, seamstresses, knitters and washers.

3656. That is the occupation of the various inmates ?—Yes, they are put to all those kinds of employment. Each inmate earned £8 14s. 0d.

3657. What did he cost ?—The revenue from the proceeds of work was £6,164 ; the expenditure, including cost of material and tools, was £10,136. The revenue covered the cost of maintenance and a little more, i. e. the pure cost of maintenance, without allowing for administrative charges.

3658. When you say administrative, you mean the cost of the officials ?—Yes.

3659. Are you taking into account the interest on the buildings ?—Taking everything, the gross expenditure was £17 8s. 10d. per head.

3660. Are the inmates of the workhouse allowed to take some money away with them ?—At Benninghausen, up to the present year the inmates were not allowed to earn anything. Now they are allowed to earn a small sum ; that is quite an innovation. At the Berlin workhouse it has always been done.

3661. I suppose that depends to some extent upon the man's behaviour ?—Yes, but the sum is very small ; I say it is quite a new thing ; and the plan followed is this : when a man is discharged, before he comes out, he is asked where he would like to go, and when he has chosen the place the police of the town or village are communicated with, and the money that is due to him is sent on, and it is placed, as a rule, in the hands of some philanthropic man—the clergyman, as a rule—to watch over him and spend it for him.

3662. That is the money he has earned in the workhouse ?—Yes. I have here a note of the conduct of the prisoners during the past year showing that half of them receive no punishment whatever. I was informed that the conduct in the prison was remarkably good.

3663. Can you tell us how often these men come back to the workhouse ?—I have some figures as to that. Of the people received in the year 1903-4, 41.44 per cent. of the men and 35.87 per cent. of the women had been there before.

3664. When you say “there before” you do not mean that particular workhouse?—No, I mean committed to any workhouse; the average was 40·82 per cent., taking the men and women together.

3665. Can you give us the average length of detention in the workhouses?—I have a note here showing that the sentence was prolonged in the case of three men and three women only—six cases in all out of 434 for the year. As a rule, the average primary sentence is about six months. Taking the whole of Prussia, the duration of sentences for males was as follows:—three months, 27; three to six months, 2,857; six months to two years, 3,997; and the full sentence of two years, 1,920. That makes a total of 8,801 for the year 1903-4.

3666. Were there any short sentences at all?—Not under three months; and I may say that the directors of the workhouses I have seen have emphasised the point that a short sentence is no use whatever. They favour a long sentence if a man is to be disciplined, and he is to have any chance of learning a trade; and it seems to me that one very strong point in the workhouses is that a man has a chance of learning some simple handicraft.

3667. (Mr. Davy.) You told us that the German workman has his Arbeitsbuch. Is it necessary for him to have any other papers?—It is not essential.

3668. If he has been in the army?—He would have his paper. It is not essential that he should produce it.

3669. As a matter of fact, he would have his discharge papers?—He would in any case have his papers, and of course he would have his insurance papers too.

3670. So that the German workman is accustomed to carry papers?—Yes.

3671. Now as to the Arbeitsbuch, do you ever hear of that book being forged by German workmen?—I have not heard of that; but it is conceivable.

3672. That would be a difficulty in the way of introducing any ticket system, would it not?—I do not see that there is any great inducement to forge a book like that, because a man can obtain the book by means of a few hours' labour. If he wishes to travel and lodge in these relief stations, he may earn a book by working for it.

3673. But he cannot earn his other papers, can he?—No, he cannot.

3674. Do you know what happens if they are lost?—I cannot say.

3675. In Germany they have a pretty strict law of settlement, have they not, between union and union?—Yes: I am not able to go into the full details of the Poor Law.

3676. You see that affects the question of tramping very much?—Yes.

3677. Because a tramp is a man probably without a settlement?—Yes, of course.

3678. As a matter of fact the cost in such a case would not fall on the local union, but on the province?—It would fall on the Landarmen Verbände, which are responsible for the relief of destitute persons without legal domicile.

3679. Is there not a complaint that the expenses of the Landarmen Verbände have very largely increased lately?—That I cannot say.

3680. Is it not a fact that the German Poor Law is relieved of the care of the able-bodied because the able-bodied are in fact handed over to the police?—That would be the case; of course the labour colonies take many off the road.

3681. Yes; but it is just as well to emphasise the difference between our Poor Law and theirs?—Oh, yes.

3682. Now, for instance, under the law you have quoted, suppose a man loses his work, in Berlin say, and he is turned out of his home, the landlord of his house would have to notify the police, would he not?—That I cannot say.

3683. Any way the police would know it?—No doubt, but that I am not able to say.

3684. Otherwise they could not enforce that statute?—Yes.

3685. Within a certain time he would be obliged to find work and a house; otherwise he would be liable to imprisonment up to two years?—Yes.

3686. Are you aware that in large towns the police allow a man seeking a home a period of grace?—A man is only required to give proof that he has tried to find a home; the law threatens with punishment any person who, after losing his past lodging, fails to procure another within the time allowed to him by the competent authority, and who cannot prove that, in spite of his best endeavours, he has been unable to do so.

3687. Will the competent authority allow him time?—Yes.

3688. Where does he spend the time that is allowed him?—I can say in Berlin there are several homes or shelters for the reception of such cases.

3689. That is to say if he does not find his work and a house at the end of the time, it is a case for the police?—Yes. It may be very hard.

3690. A man in England would just get an order for the workhouse; in Prussia he is handed over to the police?—But if he is destitute he can fall upon the Poor Law.

3691. Can he if he is able-bodied?—This is an extract from the Federal Law of 1870 on poor relief:—"Every needy German must temporarily be relieved by the poor union in whose district he is found when destitution sets in." That is part of the Poor Law. This was supplemented by a statute of 1871:—"To every needy German shelter, indispensable subsistence, requisite care in the event of sickness, and in the event of death, suitable burial shall be given by the poor union which is liable." That applies to destitution in general. "The relief may in suitable cases take the form of maintenance, so long as needful, in a poor house or hospital, or by employment outside or inside such a house at work suited to his capacity." So that the destitute are provided for. The law does not provide for the wandering destitute; the stationary destitute, it seems to me, are provided for.

3692. As a matter of practice, are there any able-bodied paupers in Germany; are they not all under the charge of the police?—That I am not able to say.

3693. You have been to the Berlin bridewell; it is very large, is it not?—Yes, it has some 2,000 inmates.

3694. The people work, I think, on the Berlin sewage farm?—A large number; I can give you the actual number who work on the Berlin sewage farm, if you wish.

3695. Are not the bulk of these men sent there for being unable to find a house?—I can give you the actual figures. At the end of the year 1903 there were 1,721 men and 137 women—a total of 1,858 in the institution; 1,039 of those were men and women sent there for begging; 49 were there for immorality, and 703 for having no home.

3696. (Mr. Simpson.) Sleeping out, and that sort of thing?—Yes.

3697. (Mr. Davy.) The workhouse in Berlin is to all intents and purposes a prison, is it not?—Well, of course, it is intended so to be.

3698. What do they call the charitable organisation that runs the labour colonies?—Each is established and managed by a separate labour colony association.

3699. Is that the same association that manages the Herbergen?—No, they are quite distinct; but of course the same people might give to both. They work together, so far as they can.

3700. The relief stations being a matter for the union; they are paid for by the union?—But they are not poor law institutions; they are rather under what with us would be rural district councils.

3701. At any rate they are paid for out of public funds?—Yes, that is so.

3702. Can you tell us why these charitable institutions sprang into existence?—I remember discussing the matter with Dr. von Bodelschwingh, the founder of the colonies; and the explanation he gave was that when he took the first step to establish a labour colony, the highways of Germany were overrun with tramps. He said at that time—the figure looks a very large one—

Mr. William H. Dawson.

24 Feb. 1905.

Mr. William H. Dawson. that there were over two hundred thousand men on the roads. As I pointed out the German Poor Law makes no provision for the travelling poor. It makes provision for the settled poor, but even to-day it makes no provision for the wandering poor.

3703. Except police provision?—Except police provision; and it was in order to take away the necessity for begging that the colonies were established.

3704. At that time the German towns and highways were perfectly infested with beggars, and the police were quite incapable of coping with their numbers?—That is so.

3705. And hence these charitable institutions sprang up?—That is so.

3706. It appears from the Board of Trade blue-book of 1893 that the total number of inmates of the relief stations on the night of the 15th December, 1890, was 9,216. Have you got the corresponding figures for any later date?—I have no statistics of the public relief stations; I have only statistics of the private Herbergen.

3707. That is a very considerable number, is it not?—It is a large number.

3708. On the same day in England 5,700 vagrants slept in the workhouses: that is a good deal less?—Yes.

3709. The Herbergen are now pretty well established all over Germany?—Yes.

3710. Can you say how many resort to these places in one night?—I do not know that I have the number for a single night; I have only the aggregate.

3711. According to the same blue-book, page 300, in 1890 the total number of guests in the German Herbergen during 1890 was 3,200,000. Of these 2,000,000 paid their own expenses in cash—700,000 worked for their entertainment, and 500,000 were in regular employment at the Herbergen?—Yes.

3712. That, of course, is not individuals, but nights' lodgings?—Yes, of course.

3713. Have you any recent figures which would enable us to see whether the numbers in the Herbergen were increasing or not?—I have the figures for 1899. The total number of paying guests received, i.e., the travelling workmen as distinct from the resident lodgers, was 1,516,377, for the whole year. That was less than in 1898 by 105,000.

3714. So that the numbers in the Herbergen have shown a decrease?—I suppose the number will vary greatly with the state of trade.

3715. That is a moot point; trade was pretty good in Germany at that time?—No doubt.

3716. Whereas in 1891 they had a period of considerable distress?—Depression, yes.

3717. In which circulars were issued in regard to the relief of the unemployed in the same way as we are issuing them now?—Yes.

3718. Well, as regards labour colonies, the number of the colonies has steadily increased, I think?—Yes.

3719. On page 22 of the recent Board of Trade Report the number of admissions in 1895 was given as 7,869, and the number increases till they reach the maximum figure of 10,307 in 1903?—Yes.

3720. So that the colonies show a steady increase in their inmates?—Yes. Might I interpolate one remark? In Germany, I think, there are no lodging-houses such as we have in England, so that very many people who in Germany would go to the relief stations are found in our "model" and other lodging-houses.

3721. The Board of Trade Report shows that the number of paying travellers in the Herbergen was 2,101,281 in 1902, as against 1,931,575 in 1901; and 1,516,377 in 1899; and the non-paying travellers had increased in 1902 to 834,783 from 759,057, 553,000, 507,889 in the three preceding years?—Yes.

3722. So that the Herbergen seem to be getting more and more appreciated?—Yes, that appears to me to be a strong point in their favour.

3723. Though times are better. Might we not have expected that that would have reduced the numbers?—

One might think so, but the increased use of the Herbergen must diminish the highway population too. I know that is the strong opinion of Dr. von Bodelschwingh, who, of course, is the great authority upon these institutions.

3724. Is it not an ascertained fact that a great number of admissions to the colonies are discharged prisoners?—Oh, that is so; I could give you the figures if you care for any individual colony; that is an undoubted fact.

3725. Is that in your view anything against the colonies?—Of course my opinion of the colonies is that we could not introduce them in the same form in which they exist in Germany. My idea is that the labour colony in England should be used purely for the honest unemployed who cannot get work, and I think it should be a county institution. I should send the loafers to the workhouse on the German or Swiss pattern.

3726. You do not think the German labour colony would be suitable for the tramp?—I do not think so at all. As I said before the German labour colony is composed of the lowest classes of society; and it is not disciplinary in the coercive sense; it is purely voluntary; the inmates can stay or not as they please.

3727. As a matter of fact they do stay, do they not?—A certain proportion of them run away.

3728. Has there not become a colony population?—When they have been inmates too long there is always power to send them away.

3729. They have to send them away every two years to break their settlement?—Yes. There was originally a rule that they would not be allowed to stay more than a certain time, but now there is no hard and fast rule; it is left to the director.

3730. But surely they would not allow them to stay more than two years?—No, except in an exceptional case. One man was pointed out to me at Bielefeld who had been there eight years, but then he had made himself useful.

3731. He would have to be discharged for one day every two years or he would get a settlement?—No doubt.

3732. It is now recognised, I think, that there is becoming a class of colony loafers?—There is no doubt that is so.

3733. A new type?—I have an analysis of the colonists at the Lühlerheim colony, which is one of the most typical colonies in Germany, and of 474 colonists received in 1903-4, 161 had been unpunished, i.e., 34·5 per cent.

3734. Had never been in gaol, you mean?—Yes. The remaining 65·5 per cent. had been punished, and I have got a classification of the offences. The chief, of course, were vagrancy and petty misdemeanours; and 53·4 per cent. had been punished more than once. The inmates in that colony must stay six weeks at the least. I suppose that these figures really are representative of most of the colonies; the class of people are the same everywhere.

3735. The important point it seems to me is the question of repeated admissions?—Yes.

3736. The colonies seem to generate a new class?—Yes, of these 474 at Lühlerheim, 221 were admitted for the first time, 88 for the second time, 46 for the third time, 22 for the fourth time, 24 for the fifth time, 20 for the sixth time, 13 for the seventh time, and 40 had been admitted eight times and over. Of course I am not arguing for the labour colony in England on the German basis.

3737. But I suppose they might as well be in the colony as anywhere else?—That is so.

3738. Is not the moral to be drawn from this that the colonies do not reform people?—They unquestionably reform many of their inmates; I do not by any means believe that they reform the confirmed tramp; but I do believe that the workhouse does to some extent.

3739. You would say that the colonies do not exercise any reformatory influence?—Oh, I would not go so far as that. I most distinctly think they do exercise a reformatory influence; I know special cases, most remarkable cases; but, speaking generally, I do not think that you can regard them as being reformatory institutions.

The inmates do not stay long enough and the discipline is not severe enough.

3740. You think the same class of people are sent to the house of correction, or workhouse, as would go to colonies?—To a large extent they are the same. That is proved by the fact that so many of the inmates of the colonies have been punished before.

3741. There would be a difficulty in suggesting that voluntary institutions for dealing with tramps should be set up all over England?—Yes, I do not think that we should find enough of the spirit of philanthropy. I do not see any evidence that the public would voluntarily go to the expense.

3742. The public pay their poor rates and they do not see why they should start another system as well?—It is very remarkable; we rightly pride ourselves upon our philanthropy in England, and yet Germany spends these enormous amounts upon labour colonies and these relief stations. I do not think we should find people ready to do it in England.

3743. In the Herbergen there is a certain reformatory influence brought to bear?—They are carried on upon a purely moral basis.

3744. But still they are only open to people with papers?—That is so.

3745. I take it, you do not think it would be feasible to start anything like the German system as a means of getting rid of our tramp difficulty?—I do not; I think the workhouse is more suited for the tramp.

3746. Do you think the Germans are relieved of their tramp difficulty?—I think their system alleviates the difficulty.

3747. Reduces the number of convictions?—Yes, it is far less; even the relief stations have a great influence. I would like to read you a German official testimony upon that point. The first relief station to be started at all was that in the Herford Kreis or district, and it was established in 1882. Several years ago the principal administrative official in that district said: "Itinerant mendicancy was formerly a plague of the countryside, but since the regulation of the system of wandering, and of housing the wanderers, the annoyances caused by vagrants and beggars have almost entirely ceased." It is also a fact that in the Grand Duchy of Baden there is virtually no mendicancy and no tramps in those parts of the Grand Duchy where there are relief stations, and there is a great deal in those portions where there are no relief stations. That is an attested fact, and I believe that it holds good generally.

3748. As a matter of fact there are plenty of tramps in Germany?—That is so.

3749. I understand you to say there are in Germany two sorts of labour colonies—one agricultural and one industrial. Have you any opinion as to the advantages of the two systems?—I distinctly believe that in England, at any rate, it would be more advisable to use the industrial colony where specific handicrafts are taught. I think it would do a man more good permanently if he were taught an industry than simply to be put to agricultural work, which probably he never understood and never would understand, at the age at which these colonists generally are taken. It is my experience as a poor law guardian that the great majority of the people who enter the casual wards are people without handicrafts.

3750. Very few of them are agricultural labourers, I think?—That I could not say.

3751. But your view is clear that an industrial colony is preferable to an agricultural one?—Emphatically; it is far more useful than an agricultural one.

3752. If you have land to reclaim, there is a finality about that, is there not?—Yes, there comes a time when the land cannot support any very large amount of labour. I pointed out that that is the case at Bielefeld, where they have virtually done their work.

3753. They have reclaimed the land?—They have reclaimed the land entirely; and the number of labourers that can be profitably employed now is very small and they have had to acquire a colony elsewhere.

3754. Do you remember the area of Bielefeld?—Nearly 1,000 English acres.

3755. The reclamation was done by spade, was it not?—Mr. William H. Dawson.

3756. And it is a bad soil, if I remember?—Well, the soil is very poor. I have described it elsewhere in these words—"A peculiarity of the ground was the existence, at a depth varying from one to three feet, of a thick layer of ochre, so hard and impervious that the water collected upon it, making the land swampy in wet seasons. The mode of culture followed was, by thorough trenching, to bring this layer to the surface, where it was found soon to pulverise into the finest earth when exposed to the influence of air and rain. Thorough ploughing then mixed the sand and marl, and made the land at once ready for cropping. The double work of taming the rude primeval soil and then placing it under systematic cultivation has occupied the Wilhelmsdorf workers from 1882 until the present day, and it may be regarded as the economic basis of every agricultural colony." Yes, it was originally very unpromising land indeed.

3757. Now, they have to turn to something else?—Yes, they have to go elsewhere, because the land surrounding the colony is so expensive; they cannot afford to buy more.

3758. Have you formed any opinion as to whether we could rely in England on the institution of voluntary labour colonies to meet the difficulty?—I do not see how we should succeed in stimulating public interest enough in the question so as to rely upon voluntary financial support.

3759. It would be no good doing it in isolated spots?—I do not think so; it could only be done upon a large scale.

3760. In England, the care of the tramp as a destitute person is compulsory now on the union, is it not?—Yes.

3761. And therefore the legislature could hardly hand over that responsibility to voluntary societies?—I do not think so, and I do not think the community would do it. I think that is proved by the fact that, while the labour colonies in Germany are increasing continually, we have hardly moved yet in England, though the matter has been on foot for twenty-three years now.

3762. What do you think should be done in England?—Well, my idea is that first of all we should abolish the casual ward; cease to recognise the tramp by abolishing the casual ward. The tramp then falls into the hand of the police; I should treat him as an offender. He might be sent, I think, for the first offence to labour colonies maintained by the counties, and for repeated offences to real workhouses, but the labour colonies should not, in my opinion, be labour colonies on the German type; they should be colonies meant for a superior class. To the German labour colonies the very lowest class go, and I think ours should be more in the nature of distress colonies. That is what they are trying to establish in Germany.

3763. Would you give a power of detention at these colonies, or would you leave them voluntary?—That would depend altogether upon who conducted them, into whose hands the responsibility was thrown.

3764. Supposing the responsibility was on the State?—If these colonies received the class of men that I have in mind, that is the honest work-seekers, who temporarily have no work, I do not think that you should then introduce compulsory powers.

3765. Do you think there is a large proportion of honest work-seekers on the road in England?—Well, at the present time we have very much distress.

3766. But we may hope that that distress may pass?—But still there is always a certain proportion of genuine work-seekers among the itinerant population.

3767. (Chairman.) I may tell you that the witnesses that we have had hitherto have put the proportion rather low?—At the present time?

3768. No, ordinarily speaking?—I may be allowed perhaps to speak of five years ago. I communicated then with all the poor law clerks in the county of Yorkshire. I sent a circular out to them in order to get definite information upon various questions; and, analysing their replies, I will give you the proportion of genuine work-seekers. Of course, I can only give the figures for those who replied; a few perhaps did not. The total number of vagrants for the year of my inquiry, 1899, was 37,473, in sixteen unions. Now, I inquired what proportion, in their opinion, were genuine work-seekers and what proportion tramps; and taking the answers in which these questions were replied to, the total number of persons included in the replies was 15,330; of these 3,057 were said to be genuine work-seekers, and 12,273 were said to be vagabonds. Now, that reckoned out to 20 per cent. of genuine work-seekers, and 80 per cent. were the wastrels. These were absolutely official figures given to me, I may say.

Mr. William
H. Dawson.
24 Feb. 1905.

3769. (Mr. Simpson.) There were 20 per cent. who were actually seeking work. It is highly probable that a considerable proportion found work?—It might be assumed.

3770. Therefore, there would be no need of labour colonies for them?—That is so.

3771. So that you would reduce the proportion that would be left without being able to get work to something very much below that?—That is so. I may say that I should assume that counties would be combined in order to establish labour colonies; that there would be one colony, say, for several counties.

3772. (Mr. Davy.) And in regard to the statistics, would it not be pretty certain that a portion of those seeking work would not retain any work when they got it, owing to some bad habit?—We might assume that that is possible.

3773. But still you think that labour colonies might be established for them?—I do think so.

3774. And what would happen to the other tramps?—In cases of repeated offences by men who are known to the police to be mere loafers, I would treat them in workhouses on the German and Swiss and Dutch and Belgian pattern.

3775. That is to say put them in houses of correction?—Yes, by all means.

3776. (Chairman.) You could not treat them in our present workhouses, could you?—Oh, no.

3777. You would establish a new system of houses of correction?—Yes.

3778. Something between a prison and a workhouse?—Of course, it must be remembered that you would relieve the present prisons of a large number of their inmates.

3779. (Mr. Davy.) The present casual wards could be shut up?—Entirely, as casual wards. I think the poor law authority, being relieved of the present casual wards, might be required to establish decent houses of call, in which these 20 per cent. of honest work-seekers might be accommodated. If they had means they would pay for their board and lodging, and I should think that the trade unions would let all their men call there, and we should simply divert them from the casual ward on the one hand and from the so-called model lodging-house on the other.

3780. Then you would have labour colonies paid for by the State or the county for those who really wanted work, or wanted to learn a trade?—Yes, conducted as far as possible on an industrial basis, in preference to farm colonies.

3781. And you would have refugees to supply a night's lodging?—Yes.

3782. For which the person would pay?—Yes, though not necessarily; they would take the place of the casual wards.

3783. You would have the remnant, who would not pay and were tramps, handed over to the police?—Handed over to the police.

3784. Should you charge them in the ordinary way?—Yes.

3785. And when that remnant was convicted of tramping, what would you do with them; send them to the ordinary prisons?—First offenders naturally would be dealt with leniently, and I do not know why they should not go to the labour colonies; but old offenders should be treated in the workhouses after serving their sentences.

3786. In the new houses of correction?—Yes, after, of course, serving the proper sentences for their offences.

3787. (Mr. Simpson.) I am not quite sure what relation the German workhouses hold to the prisons in Prussia; do you know how many workhouses there are in Prussia?—Yes, twenty-four; each province has one, and the larger provinces have two or three. It depends, of course, entirely upon the size of the province. There are twenty-four altogether in Prussia.

3788. And is no one sent there except under an order of a magistrate?—No, they are committed by the magistrates.

3789. The workhouses are under local control?—Provincial control.

3790. Do you happen to know how the prisons are managed in Prussia?—I only know they are under the Home Ministry.

3791. They are under the State?—Oh, yes.

3792. Then the workhouses correspond almost exactly with our old houses of correction, which now are prisons?—Yes, they take the same people.

3793. The criminals are not sent there?—No, the classes of offenders are specified in the Imperial Penal Code.

3794. Then in England we really have institutions of exactly that description; for, in our prisons, we try to teach the prisoners trades or industries, if they have been committed there long enough?—There is one great difference; in Germany the long sentence system is followed; with us, of course, the ordinary punishment for begging is a very short sentence, which does no good.

3795. You think it does no good; you are satisfied of that?—That is my opinion; whereas, in Germany great stress is laid on the length of sentence; reformers ask that the maximum may be extended from two to six years in extreme cases.

3796. There is, of course, great difference in the systems under which the institutions are worked, but, as a matter of fact, our present prison combines the characteristics of a German Arbeitshaus with a prison?—Except that the German provincial workhouses are restricted to certain classes of offenders.

3797. Can you see much difference between an Arbeitshaus and a German prison?—That is a question I should not like to give any opinion about; I have not been within a German prison proper.

3798. The discipline in the Arbeitshaus is pretty severe?—It is a prison.

3799. Do they work on the land, or only within the walls?—They work in both ways; often their labour is farmed out.

3800. Farmed out to private people?—Yes; now, at Benninghausen, for example, the province carries on a large farm, and the labour for this farm comes from the workhouse. Besides this, the prisoners in the workhouse are engaged on road making, on public buildings, also in industries and in various work necessary in the establishment, such as domestic work.

3801. (Mr. Davy.) What is the work at the Berlin workhouse?—In that case a large number of workers are engaged in the city irrigation works, but there, too, there is a multiplicity of trades.

3802. (Mr. Simpson.) Really the State, as such, has not done anything in the way of controlling tramps or vagrants; the relief stations and the way-ticket system in Prussia are due to voluntary effort?—There are two kinds of relief stations, the Herbergen, conducted by private associations, and relief stations, generally called Verpflegungs-stationen, conducted by local authorities; bodies that answer to our rural district councils.

3803. So that all that the Government does to promote the system is to make it hard for people who do not take advantage of it—who go about without tickets?—That is so; the idea is to take away the necessity for a man begging, so that if he begs, then he voluntarily and deliberately breaks the law.

3804. But, as a matter of fact, the system has not by any means abolished tramps and beggars in Prussia?—No; human nature is the same everywhere.

3805. Is there not rather a large number convicted in Prussia of begging?—I can give you the actual number.

The number convicted in the whole of Prussia and sent to workhouses, because of vagabondage and begging, was 5,983 in the last year for which a report is published out of a population of about 30,000,000.

3806. 34,000,000 I think?—Roughly.

3807. As against that we have, roughly speaking, in the last five years an average of 11,000 convictions for begging?—On the other hand, I should point out that the law is far more stringently enforced in Prussia than with us. I think that is so.

3808. Do you not find yourself troubled a good deal by beggars in Prussia?—I do not think that the beggar is tolerated to the extent that he is in this country.

3809. (Mr. Davy.) The numbers who were prosecuted or convicted of mendicancy are fewer than they are here, but in Prussia the sentence is very much longer than it is in England?—That is so.

3810. They can go from six months to two years?—They can go to two years.

3811. So that the habitual would come round more slowly?—Yes, he would.

3812. (Mr. Simpson.) Is it unlawful to employ people in Prussia who have not their labour book with them?—It is unlawful to employ anyone under the age of twenty-one without the book.

3813. Do you know if anyone is ever convicted of doing it?—That I cannot answer, but that is the statute.

3814. Over twenty-one, they have a certificate of insurance?—Over twenty-one, it is no longer necessary to have a labour book; but they have to have a certificate of insurance, or some other recognised paper.

3815. Can a man be employed without a certificate of insurance?—That I am not able to say; but he would need to have it if he were travelling on the road.

3816. They do not use finger-prints in connection with these labour books, I suppose?—That I cannot say.

3817. Because that would make forging impossible, and identification quite certain?—Yes. I may here say that in some parts of Germany a police law exists under which people who give to the beggar are punished as well as the beggar himself. It is not a law of the country, but a police ordinance.

3818. Do you happen to know if anyone is ever convicted under it?—I do not know, but it is the law.

3819. (Mr. Davy.) The mere existence of such a law must deter people?—It is a deterrent. I know such an ordinance was put in force in some four or five places some fifteen years ago.

3820. Is it still in force, do you think?—I think it is still in force. About the labour books, I have a note here which may be useful. The book is required in the case of workers under twenty-one, who may not be employed without it. This labour book states the name, the place of birth, the year and day of birth. The book is given to the worker by the police and it is filled up by the parent or guardian. An employer must make an entry of service, when begun, and when concluded; and a workman can require a certificate of work and conduct on leaving. That applies only to men under twenty-one.

3821. To a very small proportion then of the total population?—Yes.

3822. (Sir William Chance.) There appear to be two kinds of stations for the relief of wayfarers in Germany. The relief station, which is under the local authority, and the Herbergen?—Yes.

3823. Now, what distinction is made between the classes of people who resort to Herbergen and relief stations respectively?—I do not think there is any difference between the classes; it is rather that Herbergen are not established everywhere. They are just the same people who go to both institutions; but the ground is not covered entirely by private institutions, so that the relief stations come in where private effort has not established an institution.

3824. Do these Herbergen take the place of relief stations or vice versa?—The first Herberge was established in 1854; the relief station, I think, did not come into existence until 1882, the first year in which the labour colony was established.

3825. The Herberge was found useful in giving relief, Mr. William H. Dawson. and the municipalities copied it and set up relief stations very much on the same principle?—That is so. In the relief stations themselves, as well as in the Herbergen, it is expected that a man will work a few hours for his subsistence. 24 Feb. 1905.

3826. Would the Herbergen exist in the same place as the relief station, the Verpflegungs-station?—No; where there is one there is not the other.

3827. Supposing there was a Herberge near some Verpflegungs-station?—Then you might be sure there was accommodation sufficient without the Verpflegungs-station.

3828. The Verpflegungs-station is a place where the man can be set to work?—Yes.

3829. What is the Herberge?—It is a similar institution, though it is carried on privately.

3830. In the workhouse there is a great deal of work of different kinds done?—A great deal.

3831. Are there any complaints that the labour done there interferes with outside work?—I know when I lived in Germany and first investigated the matter I did hear a complaint against prison labour competing against free labour, but the rule is followed of diminishing competition as far as possible. It is almost universal not to sell in the open market, but to provide public institutions with the necessities they require in the nature, for example, of furniture, woven goods, and various things, but not to sell in the open market; and that rule is pretty universal.

3832. (Mr. Davy.) That rule would not tend to make a colony self-supporting, would it?—I think the principle is right to diminish competition as far as possible, so long as the goods can be disposed of.

3833. (Sir William Chance.) Do any of the products of the workhouses go to foreign countries?—That I am not able to say. I would like to point out that in some of the workhouses the subsidy is very small indeed, the work of the inmates almost covering the whole of the expenditure.

3834. (Chairman.) I think you said that in some cases the expenditure and receipts were very nearly equal?—I will give you three of the best cases. In the workhouse at Gross Salze the average cost per head is £13 18s. Of this sum the inmates earn £11 11s., leaving only £2 7s. per head to be paid out of the public funds. In the workhouse at Moritzburg the total cost per head is £13 9s. 7d. The inmates produce £9 16s. 10d., leaving £3 12s. 9d. per head to be paid by subsidy. In the workhouse of Bockelholm the total cost per head is £14 9s. 2d. The production yields £11 10s. 8d., and the subsidy is only £2 18s. 6d. per head. And the reason is, of course, that these colonies are on an industrial basis; I mean they follow handicrafts rather than agriculture. In one workhouse, at Breslau, a profit was actually made last year.

3835. (Sir William Chance.) You said that in Germany there are no powers of detention whatever in the colonies?—None whatever.

3836. Do the magistrates ever commit to these colonies?—They cannot do so, because the colonies are not recognised by them; but very often the police will advise a man to go there.

3837. Do you think if a voluntary labour colony were established here, it would be advisable that a magistrate should commit to such a colony?—It depends on the colony, whether it is a penal colony or for the relief of distress.

3838. I am not talking of a penal colony, but a colony, say, like that established by the Salvation Army?—It would depend, would it not, on the character of the inmates. If men were to go there in order to tide over a period of temporary distress, they would naturally go voluntarily.

3839. I do not know whether you have formed any opinion on the question whether magistrates should be able to commit for certain periods to labour colonies?—I should say that magistrates should have the power to commit first offenders under a vagrancy law.

3840. To labour colonies?—That is my opinion.

Mr. William H. Dawson 3841. Just now you advocated in England work-houses for tramps; by that you mean similar institutions to the Arbeitshäuser?—Yes, I strongly advocate that—going by the experience of Germany and Switzerland.

3842. (Dr. Downes.) You mentioned as a proof of the reduction of vagrancy in Germany the case of the Westphalian workhouse which is still sufficient, although it was built half a century ago. Do you claim that the German system has reduced vagrancy over Germany generally, or do you limit it to Westphalia?—I think I would rather say that in Germany it is strongly maintained that the existence of the workhouses has diminished vagrancy. I know that is the strong opinion in Germany.

3843. Then how do you reconcile with that opinion in Germany the figures to which Mr. Davy drew your attention with regard to the numbers using the Herbergen. The number of paying travellers have increased from the year 1899 to 1902 by about one-third; but the non-paying ones have increased by about two-thirds?—But these travellers are not vagrants in our sense. Perhaps I should have said that the workhouses have reduced the breaches of the law; I refer, of course, to commitments under the vagrancy law; that is what I mean. I do not see how you can have statistics of vagrancy in general.

3844. Then you do claim that, because the commitments are less, the vagrancy is less?—That is another question; I could not say that, because there are no statistics of vagrancy proper.

3845. Taking the statistics of the persons who use these travellers' homes, do you not think on the face of them that they seem to show an increase of those indulging in the wandering life?—The number naturally varies with the state of trade. Then, of course, you have to allow for an enormous increase of population.

3846. I am only taking these particular years, 1899 to 1902. I have no knowledge of other years. Do you think the state of trade has affected the figures in this period?—I suppose it would do; the number must rise and fall.

3847. But I would draw your attention to the fact that it is a steadily increasing number?—I do not advocate as a reason for the relief stations at all that they diminish vagrancy; not in the least. The merit I claim is that they relieve the genuine work-seeker; to me it seems a matter immaterial whether there are more or fewer genuine work-seekers; that is another question. I want to see these genuine work-seekers, few or many, helped to find work.

3848. Taking these figures, I think you will admit that they show, assuming them to be correct, a great increase in the use of these travellers' homes?—That is so, and that to me shows their great necessity.

3849. Does it necessarily follow that, because they are more and more used by the public, it is to the public advantage?—I think it is to the public advantage that you should allow a man who is honestly in search of work—and the possession of this book is an inferential proof—every facility in his search for work by offering him good accommodation.

3850. Is there not a danger, if you set up a network of travellers' homes—and the better administered as regards comfort, so much perhaps the greater danger—is there not a danger that by so doing you increase the inducement for a wandering life?—I can only say in Germany they are still further increasing them, and they will not be content until the country is covered with an absolute network of such relief stations. That seems to show their confidence in the use and necessity for these institutions, and a movement is now on foot to get the State to take in hand entirely the support of the relief stations; to make it a public charge.

3851. (Sir William Chance.) And the Herbergen too?—No, to make the State create a sufficient supply of public relief stations. The Herbergen are not necessarily to be supplanted, because they do quite an independent work. They lodge a great number of resident lodgers, and they would still deal with people who are able to pay; but to create a sufficient number of relief stations.

3852. (Mr. Davy.) Are there any municipal lodging-houses in Germany?—No, I do not recall any save those that are purely voluntary.

3853. There are plenty of common lodging-houses, I think?—No doubt. I have not acquaintance with the common lodging-houses.

3854. (Dr. Downes.) Turning to the labour colonies, I find that as regards Germany generally there is also an increasing number of colonists?—Yes.

3855. That is to say that in 1899, 7,244 persons entered thirty-one labour colonies, while in 1903, 10,307 entered thirty-four colonies?—Yes.

3856. And at the same time the refusals for lack of accommodation have risen enormously. Page 27 of the Board of Trade Report shows that in 1899 the refusals for lack of room were 376; and in 1903 they were 1,438. Should you regard that as a healthy symptom; not only is there the increased use of the Herbergen, but there is also an increased use of these labour colonies?—Of course, it would seem to imply that there are more men on the road.

3857. Have you noticed, as regards the age of those who now chiefly use the labour colonies, that the greatest increase is between the ages of twenty-one to thirty-one; the numbers of men of that age using the colonies in 1899 was 1,297, while in 1903 it was 2,081?—Yes.

3858. I suggest that young men of that age ought not to be resorting to labour colonies, if the German system were a complete success?—Of course, I may say I am not advocating the use of the labour colony upon the German basis. I quite recognise the point.

3859. Then there is the question of the average duration of stay in these German colonies. On page 29 of the Report you will see that the number of those who stay less than two months is very nearly half the whole. In 1899 the number staying less than two months is 1,484 out of a total of 2,982 and in 1903 it is 1,837 out of a total of 3,968?—Yes. But I may point out that many of the colonies have of late years insisted upon the colonists remaining a certain length of time. Originally there was no specified time; now it is more and more the rule to require that the men should stay a certain time. Even at Bielefeld the man must sign a paper that he will stay a certain length of time. That is a recent innovation.

3860. (Sir William Chance.) How could they enforce that?—They cannot enforce it; it is purely voluntary; there is no means of forcing the man to stay; they trust to his honour. The whole institution rests upon a purely moral and philanthropic basis.

3861. (Dr. Downes.) In view of the network of travellers' homes and the comparatively few convictions that are obtained, is there not a danger that such a system passes the man on from place to place rather than obtains convictions against him?—Convictions for what?

3862. For not performing his work, or a conviction for any vagrancy offence. There is a footnote, for example, on page 18 of the Report, as follows:—"In some instances (as ascertained by enquiries made in Germany by the writer of this Memorandum) the police simply hand the "homeless" applicant a few pence in cash and direct him to go on to the next town." I suggest that the system of the network of homes taken in connection with the few convictions that are obtained rather suggest that cases are passed on instead of being dealt with rigorously?—Well, of course, the idea is that the men who enter the relief stations do not belong to the ordinary tramp fraternity; they are generally regarded as being genuine seekers of work.

3863. At the same time it is extremely easy to obtain a pass?—There is a condition imposed that the man must either get one from the police or he must have worked for it; and then he gets it at the next station; he cannot get a pass at the place where he earns it. I think 6d. is charged for it. He must earn that 6d. with labour, but he cannot get his book at the place where he has earned it; he can only get it at the next one.

3864. A tramp has only to do a few hours work to get a pass?—Yes.

3865. Then the passes are easy to obtain?—Yes. Ultimately of course a man is found out. If he is found to be merely sponging upon the stations, then of course he is handed over to the police.

3866. On whom would the task of prosecuting the man fall; would it fall on the local authority?—No, it would be a State charge.

3867. Have you studied the Herbergen in other parts of Germany beside Westphalia?—In Rhineland; I have seen them at Cologne; it is very much the same system.

3868. Should you attach great importance to the strict administration of the Westphalian regulations?—I should indeed.

3869. As to requiring work and so on?—Yes, the conditions should be very rigorously enforced.

3870. In Bavaria, it is stated, about three quarters of the Herbergen require no work?—I think the right thing would be to give the director powers of discrimination, and that of course is done, to some extent, in Westphalia. If the distance the man has to go the next day is a long one, he may be relieved of work.

3871. You propose, I think, in the first place to abolish casual wards in England, as they at present exist. What use would you make of the existing casual wards?—I should say if the existing buildings could be adapted into decent houses where honest work-seekers could be accommodated, let them be used in that way; otherwise I would not use them.

3872. You would as far as possible adapt them?—As far as possible I would adapt them, but I think one very essential thing is that a man should not be pauperised by being accommodated in these places; for example he should suffer no electoral disqualification.

3873. And you recommend that the passport system should be adopted?—Some adaptation of the passport system. I think that a pass might be given either by the police or by a man's trade union, or by the Charity Organisation Society.

3874. Have you anticipated any objections to that proposal in England, such, for example, as an infringement of the liberty of the subject?—I am beginning to think that in the case of the tramp we give the subject too much liberty in these matters.

3875. You think that the advantage of giving the man a certificate of character ought to override the sentimental objection?—I do. We ought to emancipate ourselves from phrases. I appreciate the liberty of the subject like a good Englishman, but I think the liberty of the community is of far greater value.

3876. Now what would be your test of the man who should be passed on to the house of correction, or the workhouse, as you would call it?—My idea would be that the house of correction should deal with the old offenders.

3877. How would you recognise your habitual tramp and loafer; what test would you apply to him?—That would be left to the discretion of the magistrate, in the same way as now the length of sentence is left.

3878. You would leave it entirely discretionary to him?—I do not see how you would be able to do otherwise; you could not say beforehand whether a man should go to a workhouse or not.

3879. Would you have him taken before more than one magistrate?—I have no opinion as to that.

3880. Have you gone into the question of the cost of the maintenance in Germany as compared with this country, say in the travellers' homes; is the cost of food cheaper?—It is very hard to say, and I would hardly like to say in these troublous days, but I do not suppose there is any great difference.

3881. And with regard to the supervision, is there much cost involved in that?—I know that the administration is extremely simple, the only paid official is what is known as the house father, with, of course, domestic service; but it is very simple.

3882. And who looks after the women?—These relief stations are not for women. None have yet been established, so far as I know, for the reception of women only.

3883. (Mr. Simpson.) Is a hot bath given on admission to the relief stations?—There is no compulsion about it; a man can get a bath.

3884. That would reduce the expense as compared with a casual ward?—I suppose so.

3885. (Captain Showers.) What sort of work would you provide at the workhouses you suggest for England?—I think the men should be put to the handicrafts which are most easily learned and which offer them the best chance afterwards of earning a regular livelihood. Mr. William H. Dawson.
24 Feb. 1905.

3886. What work are they put to in Germany?—I could answer that question best by giving you some of the employments that are followed in the Berlin workhouse.

3887. Would that be suitable in the case of tramps, do you think?—Of course it all depends upon how you would use the products of their labour afterwards. Now in Germany the plan followed is of supplying all municipal and provincial needs; any articles that provincial institutions require; for example in Benninghausen they supply all things which are needed in the provincial institutions for the blind, the deaf and dumb, and so forth, and the hospitals; they supply all articles of furniture, woven articles, linen, various utensils of tin and iron, and so forth.

3888. If that was done in England, would there not be an outcry that you were taking someone's trade away?—Well, it is a question whether the community should not be considered first. If this is done, you are saving the community expense.

3889. What is done in Germany with the ordinary tramp who is not a bona fide traveller?—He falls into the hands of the police; it is those men who fill the workhouses.

3890. You propose the same system here?—Yes, the workhouses would be for that class of offenders, amongst others.

3891. In Germany, I take it, they have very much longer sentences than we have here?—Very much longer; they go as far as two years.

3892. The idea is, I suppose, that the idle man should be forced by the length of the imprisonment to learn some trade, and become a useful member of society?—Precisely, he is given a long sentence so that the institution may have a reasonable chance, by discipline, of influencing his character; and I must say the directors of workhouses whom I have seen spoke highly, with limitations, of course, of the influence that is exerted upon these men.

3893. What do you think would be a suitable sentence to enable a man to learn a handicraft?—I would hardly like to answer that question; it would be merely a matter of personal opinion.

3894. Would you not advocate giving a man a long sentence, and having some means of letting him out before the end of the sentence if he has learned a trade, or shows that he could maintain himself?—I should quite think that that would be the right thing.

3895. And should he after that fall again into the hands of the police, would you have the full sentence enforced?—I presume that would have to be taken into account, just as now, in the case of prisoners, their antecedents are considered.

3896. (Mr. Davy.) There is a considerable number of trade societies in Germany, I think?—Yes.

3897. Do you know whether these trade societies give their members travelling tickets?—They give them travelling relief.

3898. Do these men make use of the Herbergen?—Very largely. I have seen these men enter, have examined their papers, and conversed with them. I should say, however, that the fact of the Herbergen having a religious basis prejudices many German working-men against them, but that is a condition that would not apply in England. The hatred of the Socialists for everything that savours of religion indisposes them to let their members enter these Herbergen. That would not apply with us.

3899. The whole institution of Herbergen and labour colonies was to a certain extent begun on account of the Socialist movement, was it not?—I will not say that, but I will say the whole work is really a part of what is known as the "Inner Mission" work of the Prussian State Church.

3900. This is in antagonism to Socialism?—That is so, but I do not think there was any political motive; I think it was pure philanthropy.

Mr. William H. Dawson. 3901. After the war there was a great recrudescence of socialistic ideas?—That is so.

24 Feb. 1905. 3902. And considerable distress?—Yes, I think it was a pure work of philanthropy.

3903. I remember a statement that "The tramp under modern conditions rolls along the network of Herbergen Stationen, and Kolonien like a ball until he finally settles down into a comfortable poor-house infirmary"?—It must have been written by some critic, I presume.

3904. Do you not think there is something in the statistics which would justify that criticism?—I see myself obvious defects in the German colony system. As I say, I do not advocate the introduction of the German system here.

3905. I will read an extract from "Tramping with Tramps" a book written by Mr. Flynt, which deals with vagrancy in Germany. It is this:—"The community practically says to the culprit: you can make use of our Verpflegungs-Stationen, where you can work for your lodging and meals, and have also a half day to search for work, if you can identify yourself as a seeker of labour. We not only offer this, but also attempt to guarantee you through the efforts of our philanthropists, a casual refuge in the Herberge zur Heimath, while you are out of work. And if, through untoward circumstances or through your own carelessness and weakness, you have fallen so low that the Stationen and the Heimath cannot take you in because your identification-papers are irregular, and you appear more of a vagabond than an unfortunate labourer, we then invite you into the labour colonies founded also by our philanthropists, where you can remain until you have earned good clothes and proved yourself worthy. But if we catch you begging we will punish you as a vagrant; consequently you would do better to make use of all the privileges we offer, and thus break no laws. This is the theory, and I consider it a good one. But the man who will not work passes through the institutions as freely as the man who will, owing to the lack of determined discrimination on the part of the officers, and the desperate cleverness of the offenders."?—Yes, of course that is no doubt a true statement of the facts. But, assuming that many of these men do commit and repeat offences, it is what they do here too, and you must punish them. If a man will break the law, you must punish him.

3906. I am neither agreeing nor disagreeing, but so far as my memory goes that is quite a vivid picture of the state of things?—It is true to fact, of course, but it does not seem to me an argument against the punishment of the tramp by sending him to the workhouse. If he breaks the law he must suffer. And I would point out that the people who abuse the right of using the relief stations are very soon found out. If you read carefully through the conditions, you will see that if a man is found out he is handed over to the police at once, so that the malingerers do not long impose upon the relief stations. It is within the power of those who conduct them to say at once, "Now then, you are a rogue; we have done with you."

3907. I merely read that extract as being what seems to me a fair summary?—And I confess that I endorse it.

3908. (Mr. Simpson.) The German system is founded on the assumption that in Germany there is a large body of working men who perfectly legitimately have to travel on foot from one part of the country to the other?—Yes.

3909. Now, so far as regards the evidence we have received, there is very little reason to suppose that any similar large class exists in this country. There may be sailors going from one port to another, and there are a few working men travelling on foot in search of work. It may be that the industrial circumstances of Germany make a difference in that respect?—Well, I would only point out, going by the figures that were given to me five years ago as to Yorkshire, that in some cases the proportion of genuine work-seekers was put at 5 per cent.; in other cases it was 20, 15, 30, and in one case 50 per cent.; that is very excessive. But still, taking the whole average I was assured 20 per cent. were genuine work-seekers.

3910. 20 per cent. of the total?—Of the total number of users of the casual wards. But the fewer the genuine work-seekers, the less accommodation we should need, on my plan, to provide for them.

3911. (Mr. Davy.) In dealing with this German question have we not forgotten another class, those who travel for their instruction; people going on their Wanderjahr?—That is so; there are a good many of them.

3912. It is quite a common practice in Germany for a working man to travel to instruct himself?—The old guild idea is still carried out.

3913. That class would not exist in England?—I admit that.

3914. In Germany those people would use the Herbergen?—That is so.

3915. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you know sufficiently the industrial circumstances of Germany to say whether it is the case that a town will change much more rapidly than English towns are accustomed to do; that is to say, there is a sudden boom or a sudden fall in the industries?—I think Germany now has taken its permanent industrial form, and things have settled down.

3916. (Dr. Downes.) What are the arrangements in Germany for dealing with sick travellers?—I cannot speak in detail of the poor law relief, but such persons are maintained by the Landarmen-Verbände, that is the unions that deal with people who have no settlement.

3917. Would the officer in charge of the Herbergen call in a doctor if a man were sick?—That I cannot say.

3918. If he passed into the local hospital he would become a local charge?—He would be maintained during sickness; that I know. There are two classes of poor law unions, the local unions to deal with people who have domicile in the locality, and the district unions that deal with people who have no domicile.

3919. I do not know whether you have any examples of the dietary of any of these institutions?—Yes; I have the dietary at Benninghausen.

3920. Perhaps you would kindly let us have that?—I will send it to the Secretary. (See Appendix XXIII.)

ELEVENTH DAY.

Tuesday, 7th March, 1905.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair):

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.

Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.

Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.

Captain SHOWERS.

Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary):

MR. JOHN HUTTON, M.P., called ; and Examined.

3921. (Chairman.) Mr. Hutton, you have been good enough to come to-day to give us your views with reference to the subject of our inquiry?—I come at the suggestion of the Home Secretary, sir.

3922. You are, I think, the chairman of the North Riding of Yorkshire county council?—Yes.

3923. And you were for seven years chairman of the North Riding quarter sessions?—Yes.

3924. You have taken very great interest, I know, in the question of vagrancy?—Yes.

3925. In the first place with regard to the existing law, have you any suggestions to make as to an alteration in the law?—Would it be convenient if I made a statement to you first?

3926. If you please?—I have not brought any statistics, because I understand the chief constable of the North Riding is coming before this Committee; I thought he would produce them with better effect at first hand than I could myself.

3927. Very good, then?—England appears to be the only important country in Europe where the tramp or vagrant classes are allowed to wander about unchecked. Loafing is the beginning of all vices, or more truly "tramp means scamp," as Mr. Preston-Thomas says. It seems a true description of this class. They are not only wasters, but a source of real danger and injury to the State. They are also a source of great annoyance and fear to our country wayside-dwellers; they call at a cottage and demand milk or meat, refusing bread or a drink of water, and threaten with abusive language every woman who refuses their demands. There are frequent cases of that class close to my own door. The first preliminary requirement is that the charge of these people should be removed from the poor law authorities to the police. In the North Riding of Yorkshire, and I believe in many other counties, a wayfarer has now to apply to the police station for his order for the casual ward of the house, an inspector or sergeant being appointed assistant relieving officer by a written order of the board of guardians. A very large proportion of the wayfarers are professional vagrants, and are therefore already members of a semi-criminal class, and the police are the proper persons to deal with them. An experienced policeman or relieving officer has little difficulty in determining whether an applicant for relief is a genuine working man in search of work, or a professional vagrant; though there must be some men on the border line and mistakes may be made, and very great care should be taken in drawing up any future rules for determining the two classes. The enforcement of the Local Government Board Orders with regard to the detention of vagrants has been effective to a certain extent, but the weakness of the administration is in the fact that the workhouse master is the sole judge as to what men he detains and what men he discharges on the following day. In the North Riding of Yorkshire vagrants have been reduced from 34,579 in 1899 to 24,171 in 1903. This is, I believe, due to the gradual adoption of the Local Government Board rules by the boards of guardians. But at the same time there has been a great increase in the number of vagrants committed to prison. This is partly due to the action of the chief constable in instructing the police to arrest all persons found begging; but the result seems to be that the vagrants have found the prison so comfortable that they gladly allow themselves to be taken by the police, or commit some assault or damage to compel the police to arrest them. May I point out to the Committee the difference in treatment in the casual ward and prison? When a vagrant applies for an order at the police station (he must apply before eight in the winter or nine in summer) he is asked whether he has any money; if he has less than 4d., he receives an order, and he is then, if the constable thinks fit, searched; he then goes to the workhouse and is admitted to the casual ward; he is there ordered to turn out his pockets, and is further searched, and whatever is found is taken care of. Women are searched at Northallerton by the matron or the cook. The man has a bath, leaves his clothes on the floor, and puts on a shirt provided by the guardians, which is "washed by a tramp woman from time to time"! He has a supper of eight ounces of bread; he is locked up in a cell and sleeps on a board bed with three blankets which are "washed occasionally"! Unless he can persuade the master to let him go next morning, he is detained all day and a second night. He has a breakfast the same as his supper and a dinner of eight ounces of bread and 1½ ounces of cheese, or six ounces of bread and a pint of soup. He has to pick four pounds of oakum, and if he does not do it, can be detained another day. If he comes in on Saturday he is detained till Tuesday. The women have their allotted task, but are sometimes persuaded to remain to help in the work of the house and also to wash the shirts and blankets. But if a vagrant is arrested by the police, he is locked up in a roomy cell at the police station and he has a supper of bread and butter, with tea or coffee. Next morning he is brought before a justice, and possibly sentenced to seven days' imprisonment. He is removed to the prison and is taken to a reception cell. There he is stripped and has a clean warm bath—97° temperature—and a clean kit; he is probably seen by the doctor the same evening, who examines him, and if there is anything the matter prescribes for him. He has then a number given to him and is taken to his cell, where he has a plank bed, but with three blankets, a rug, two sheets (though not linen sheets they are sheets) and a pillow slip. The cell is beautifully warm and clean and ventilated. In the morning he is called by a gentleman in livery who brings him his breakfast. The prisoner has to sweep his cell, and the dustpan is taken away by the attendant; he attends chapel and takes an airing, and at 10 o'clock two pounds of oakum are given him to pick. As a rule he does not trouble to do it, and there is no means of punishing him. He has more and better food, excellently cooked, than he would have had in the casual ward, and if he is committed on the Monday he is discharged on Saturday morning after four days so-called work—after a comfortable rest in luxury unknown to him; and no wonder the vagrant prefers the prison to the casual ward. Personally, I am most strongly in favour of a pass system on the lines of the well-known Gloucestershire plan. But to be effective it is extremely desirable to transfer the charge of the wayfarer to the police and to the police county rate, so as to have one authority dealing systematically throughout the larger area of the county. At present the Gloucestershire system is impossible to work unless all the boards of guardians in the county agree to adopt it, which I fear is impossible, where there are over twenty unions, as in the North Riding. Short sentences are, in my opinion, most harmful; the whole object of imprisonment is (1) to reform the criminal, (2) to punish him, (3) to deter others. Any sentence under a month, especially under modern conditions of prison life, fulfils none of these requirements. The terror of the prison is outside it. The responsibility of sending a first offender is very great; but, when necessary, the sentence should be of sufficient length to make an impression on the prisoner's mind. I do not think that by simply arresting beggars and committing them to prison we diminish the number of vagrants so long as prisons are made into comfortable modern lodging-houses. All genuine wayfarers looking for work should have a bed provided for them in lodging-houses, shelters or labourers' cottages, as lodgers, at the expense of the county rate, and sufficient food to enable them to reach the next stage under a pass system. In my opinion labour colonies and penal workhouses, as in Denmark and Switzerland, are essential for dealing with the vagrant question, and I believe the labour bureaux in Austria are also very effective. There must, of course, be an alteration of the law to enable these men to be detained for a long period. Every possible facility and help should be given to the genuine seeker for work. Labour statistics should be from day to day supplied to the police so that they may help men to find work. Much seems to have been done in this way in Switzerland according to the very interesting report of Mr. Preston-Thomas. The Lindsey report expresses my views with regard to the present treatment of vagrants. But I do not approve of the vast Belgian colonies, which I am informed are far from successful, and, on account of their vast size, are a real danger to the State. In any system which may be adopted in this country, I venture to think that if men are to be reclaimed to work from vagrancy and idleness they should receive some remuneration for their work, to show them that labour produces money. Even in the casual wards of the workhouse a 1d. or 2d. for work done would encourage men to work with hope, and help them on their discharge. "Surely it is better policy to spend money in the prevention of pauperism rather than in the relief of paupers," said a Danish poor law official, on seeing a vagrant breaking stones in an iron grated cell in a London casual ward.

3928. I will ask you one or two questions, although it is rather difficult to find anything to ask after that excellent memorandum you have read to us. I take it you yourself are in favour of some actual alteration in the Statute law?—Oh, yes, certainly.

3929. I mean what you seek could not be accomplished by the issue of further Orders and Circulars by the Local Government Board?—No, I do not think it could be.

3930. You are strongly in favour of having really effective sentences on vagrants, and not committing them for these short periods of imprisonment?—Yes, certainly.

3931. Have you gone into the question of what are the most effective tasks in casual wards on which a vagrant could be engaged and for which he could be paid some small sums of money?—It so depends, I think, entirely upon the locality. It must, of course, be some form of unskilled labour. Where, for instance, stones can be broken more cheaply and are wanted in a particular district, I think stone breaking is a very proper task. Oakum picking seems to interfere less with other trades than almost anything else, and it is, I believe, partly remunerative; it does produce something, and it is a very convenient form of labour because it can be done in the cells.

3932. Have you had any experience of wood chopping?—No, but I should think that would be a very good form of labour too.

3933. It is in force in a good many workhouses?—Yes, it is.

3934. It depends partly on having a ready sale for the wood when chopped?—Yes.

3935. Have you anything fresh to suggest in the way of task?—No, I have nothing fresh to suggest.

3936. No doubt you are aware of the Gloucestershire way-ticket system?—Yes.

3937. If you had the initiation of a way-ticket system, how would you suggest that it should be begun and carried out?—Well, supposing a man wanted to go from my own town, namely, Northallerton, to look for work at Liverpool, I should suggest that he should bring some certificate from his employer, or some other well known person in the town, stating that they had known the man, that he had been regularly at work up to a certain time, that he was a respectable man and wanted work, and that he had good reason for supposing that he would find work at Liverpool. He should take that certificate to the policeman who would be acting on behalf of the system at the police station, and if the police knew nothing against the man, a pass ticket should be issued to him, and this should mark his route throughout and entitle him at each place he came to to obtain bed and board; he should not be allowed to loiter. I was reading only a day or two ago about a system which is carried out in Switzerland; I think there is a card with squares marked upon it; at each police station the man goes to there is a stamp placed upon it, showing the date on which he arrives, and the date on which he leaves.

3938. You are contemplating the case of the honest wayfarer?—Yes.

3939. Now, let us take the idle man, and the man who does not want to work?—I should not let him go any further. I should alter the law. If it were proved that he was a professional vagrant, I should have him arrested and committed to one of the labour colonies or penal workhouses which I suggest.

3940. Yes, but supposing you do not know what the man is beyond that he is an indigent man and he tells you that he desires to get from one place to another, do you not think that the giving of a way-ticket to him would assist the police very materially in ascertaining whether he is an idle man?—Yes.

3941. Because if he does not pursue the route he has specified to the police, that would probably mean that he has not told the truth, and that consequently, in all probability, his desire was to loiter and gain a livelihood by begging and the like. Do you not think that in that case the way-ticket would be of very material assistance?—Yes, it might be of some benefit in the case of a man who is on the border line, as I said just now, between the professional tramp and the working man, a man who is drifting into the vagrant class. He does require, of course, special treatment, and he should have some kind of pass, as you say, from place to place, and he should have the chance of work given him; then if it is found that he refuses to work, and is descending rapidly into the vagrant class I should not hesitate to remove him to one of the vagrant workhouses or colonies.

3942. Quite so. The very fact that a man says that he wishes to go from Northallerton to Middlesbrough and you find that he has gone off in the direction of York, is prima facie evidence against that man that he is one of the idle class?—Certainly.

3943. And in that way the way-ticket, if it was found on him, would be prima facie evidence against him?—Certainly.

3944. From that point of view, the way-ticket system would not only be of assistance to the honest man, but would very likely lead to the detection of the dishonest man?—Yes, certainly.

3945. If some scheme of way-ticket, which would serve both ends, could be devised, do you not think it would probably be a very good thing in dealing both with the honest and the dishonest man. It would be no slur upon the former to have a way-ticket; and it would be a means of detection of the latter?—No; but I want to differentiate between the really genuine respectable hard working man, and the in and out sort of man, the man who is working to-day, gets a job or two, and then goes off on the road, but who is not necessarily a vagrant. I should like some form of way-faring ticket for the best class of man to be almost a character, a written character for him to produce at any place where he is going for work.

3946. That is something like the German system under which a young man has to carry a work book?—The fact of a man getting this particular pass from the police in the place where he starts should be a character for him, so long as the route upon that pass was followed.

3947. Quite so?—So that when he gets to Liverpool he can then produce this pass from the police at Northallerton which would be in itself a certificate that the man was well-known in his own district and a respectable working man.

3948. With regard to labour colonies, would you have them conducted by the guardians or under the supervision of the Home Office?—Under the supervision of the Home Office, undoubtedly.

3949. Then you would, I suppose, have a body of visitors to report to the Home Office, as now in the case of prisons?—Yes, certainly, there should be a visiting committee.

3950. The committee might consist of say, magistrates and guardians?—I would suggest that the standing joint committee would be probably the most useful. I wish if possible to get the treatment of the vagrant question entirely out of the hands of the Poor Law.

3951. However, you probably would be of opinion that it would be well to have some local inspection, like that by the visitors of prisons, combined with the superintendence of the Home Office?—Certainly.

3952. (Mr. Davy.) I gather that you are in favour of absolute uniformity of administration with regard to vagrants?—Yes.

3953. And you think that uniformity could be best attained by having one authority to deal with them?—Yes.

3954. And that authority you suggest should be the police?—The Home Office.

3955. The Home Office, and locally the police?—Yes.

3956. Would there not be some difficulty in connection with the buildings which are now used as casual wards?—Well, I have thought of that. If it were necessary to build new cells at all the police stations that would be a very costly thing, but I think that nearly all our workhouses in the North Riding have the casual ward cells close to the entrance to the workhouse, and with very little difficulty arrangements might be made to transfer the use of the present casual ward to the police. I do not think it would interfere with the workhouse or with the workhouse discipline, and it would save great expense on both sides.

3957. But in many cases the casual wards are some distance from the police station, are they not?—Well, in small country towns that is not so, I think.

3958. But that is a point which we should have to consider?—Yes, certainly.

3959. I think it may be historically stated that the pauper vagrant arose in this country owing to the applications of non-settled men for admission to the workhouse?—Yes, I suppose it was so.

3960. Well, would you not again have applications for admission to the workhouse from destitute men of the same sort. I am assuming that, as you propose, the casual wards at the workhouse are handed over to the police. How would you deal with such cases?—I should refer them to the police, who would inquire into each case. If the police considered that the man should be dealt with as a vagrant, they would then deal with him. But if he were not a subject for the police, and was entitled to poor law relief, and satisfied the police to that effect, I should send him back to the master of the workhouse and say he should admit him.

3961. I am not suggesting that the difficulty is a very serious one, but there is a difficulty that would have to be considered?—That might be so. I do not think it would occur in the country districts; I do not know the large towns.

3962. If there were no vagrant wards at the workhouse, vagrants would still come and ask for admission to the workhouse?—They are not admitted into our workhouses now unless they come with an order from the police officer.

3963. They go to the vagrant wards now?—Yes.

3964. Suppose there are no vagrant wards near?—But I do not contemplate that; I contemplate that there should be vagrant wards, as there are now, in every market town.

3965. But that the management should be handed over to the police?—Yes. The vagrant ward should be entirely administered by the police.

3966. (Sir William Chance.) You contemplate a different kind of vagrant wards altogether from the present kind?—I suggest that the old vagrant wards should be utilised, wherever possible, for the purposes of the new wards we are contemplating under the police; that the guardians should either rent them to the police, or that they should in some way arrange to transfer them, wherever they are suitable, so as to save the expense of building special vagrant wards connected with each police station.

3967. (Mr. Davy.) So that new vagrant wards would only be necessary in a few cases?—Yes.

3968. Under that system you might close certain vagrant wards, might you not, where they are now rather close to one another?—Yes, certainly.

3969. That would be one advantage from having a single administration for the whole county?—Yes, certainly.

3970. In each case there would have to be a police officer in charge of the vagrant ward, I suppose?—Yes.

3971. You say that there can be no great decrease in vagrancy in the North Riding unless there is complete unification of authority. But I suppose you would agree that, if it is necessary to continue the guardians' relief of vagrants, co-operation with the police is very desirable?—Yes, I do.

3972. And you have that co-operation in the North Riding to some extent?—Yes, we have.

3973. More than in most districts?—I do not know to what extent it is adopted in other districts. It has always been the case in the North Riding, I think, so long as I can remember.

3974. You have told us that there is a great increase in the number of commitments of vagrants to prisons?—Yes.

3975. What is the sort of average sentence which a man gets in the North Riding for an offence under the Vagrancy Act?—Well, seven to fourteen days, I think, is the average sentence.

3976. Is there any common understanding amongst the magistrates as to the sentences to be given?—No, I do not think there is.

3977. Not even in the same petty sessional division?—No, I think it depends on the magistrate in the chair.

3978. Do you in any case give sentences up to twenty-eight days?—Oh, yes, occasionally.

3979. Do you think that would be a deterrent sentence?—I think as a first sentence it is sufficiently deterrent.

3980. But the seven days is not a deterrent sentence?—No, not the least.

3981. And the vagrants think that the prisons are comfortable?—Most comfortable, I think.

3982. And say so?—And say so. May I read what some vagrants have said who were committed to prison during the last autumn in the North Riding. I have got three instances here which show the endeavours they make to get into the prison instead of the workhouse. This is a cutting from a local paper I got last autumn.

"On Tuesday last, William Davis, tramping labourer, petitioned Inspector Henderson to take him to gaol for being drunk. He was drunk, but not so bad as to call for police help, and the inspector declined to oblige. The philanthropic inspector told him to go to a lodging-house, and he replied he had no money. Why did he not go with the money he had got drunk with? He preferred to have a good 'booze' and then a rest! The philanthropist advised him to go to the vagrant ward, and the petitioner shuddered. He would not be pushed off and a constable led him away; in vain the inspector threatened with his stick, and the petitioner squared for fight, and eventually the inspector had to comply with the obstinate petition. The applicant said he was footsore and tired, and wanted a ten days' rest before he started work again! The Bench were there to mete out penalties and rewards, and they did not concede the whole reward desired; but Rhadamanthus smiled when he said: 'We give you seven days' rest!'"

Then there is another case :—

7 Mar. 1900.

A New Aspect of Prison.

"During the last two weeks the gaol has been presented to Northallerton magistrates in a new aspect—as a place of rest and recuperation—a kind of health resort and sanatorium. Last week an inveterate, incorrigible, typical tramp, Walter Rowlett, for begging alms at Osmotherley, was sent to gaol for fourteen days with hard labour, and he complained this was not enough—he wanted more. He received fourteen days at Lincoln, Wakefield, Derby, and elsewhere, and he desired a longer period of rest ! The magistrate, Mr. John Weighell, genial, kind gentleman though he is, could not see his way to comply."

Here is the third case :—

The Attractions of Prison Life."

"In a recent note allusion was made to the experiences of the Northallerton magistrates, who had before them two members of the nomadic fraternity, who implored to be sent to prison 'for a rest.' This new aspect of prison life is not the exclusive possession of Walter Rowlett and William Davis, for at Guisborough, this week, Ernest Jones intimated his conviction, though not in poetical language, that

'Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage.'

Jones was described in the charge sheet as a tramping labourer. In the course of his peregrinations he arrived on Sunday at the staid little village of Pinchingthorpe, and made play on the windows of the railway station with half-bricks. He carried plenty of ammunition, several other stones being discovered in his pockets, but his aim was true, and the few missiles he spent were sufficient to warrant his arrest. He confessed his guilt with a weary smile, observing that he did it because he wanted a rest. The magistrates feelingly gratified his desire by ordering a fortnight's imprisonment, and the only regret Jones appeared to feel was that the term was not a longer one."

Those are simply casual cuttings taken out of a local paper last autumn.

3983. Do you suggest that it would be possible to enforce minimum penalties by legislation, so that no man should be sent to prison for an offence under the Vagrancy Act for, say, less than twenty-eight days or less than fourteen days?—Personally, I feel so strongly about twenty-eight days imprisonment that I consider if a man has not committed an offence worthy of twenty-eight days imprisonment, you must forgive him a first fault or a second, or even a third fault.

3984. But do you think that you could insist upon magistrates giving a certain length of sentence?—Of course, the difficulty is in the case of fines; a small fine carries imprisonment. But I would certainly legislate to prevent any person of any kind or description being sent to prison for less than twenty-eight days.

3985. And certainly a person of the vagrant class?—Yes.

3986. The vagrant population are people of a very low standard of comfort, are they not?—Oh, very.

3987. Therefore, what would be a hardship to a well-to-do man in a prison is no hardship to a tramp?—No.

3988. So that a prison, to be a real punishment to a tramp, would have to be rather harder than the prison for an ordinary person?—Yes.

3989. And it is suggested that the way to remedy that is to give longer sentences for persons of the vagrant class?—I should rather have the vagrant prisons which are called penal workhouses; the same as there are in Denmark.

3990. And in Germany?—I am sorry to say I have not been able to find any description of the German system.

3991. Those penal workhouses in Denmark are, to all intents and purposes, prisons, are they not?—Yes.

3992. They were built under the Danish Act of 1892. Within five years after the passing of this Act, penal workhouses had to be built?—Yes.

3993. To those penal workhouses are committed persons who are guilty of workhouse offences?—Yes.

3994. You are aware that in Denmark no destitute person may leave the establishment to which he is committed, without the consent of the poor law authority?—Yes.

3995. So that they are not troubled with ins-and-outs there?—No, a most desirable improvement of the law.

3996. You are also aware that every pauper in Denmark is paid a certain small sum, a penny or twopence a week?—Yes.

3997. And part of that accumulates until the man has enough to keep himself for a fortnight?—Yes, that is so, I believe.

3998. He then can appeal to the poor law authority to let him out?—Yes.

3999. And they do let him out, as a matter of fact?—Yes.

4000. Do you think that system would be worth considering in England?—I do.

4001. It may be a way out of the difficulty of sentencing people to long sentences for what the public think venial offences?—Yes.

4002. Well, these penal workhouses are practically prisons?—They are.

4003. And men are sent there for six months?—They are prisons where work is done outside in the gardens or in the fields.

4004. I think it would be an accident whether there was or was not outside work. They are places in which the discipline is supposed to be very rigid, are they not?—Yes, very much so.

4005. Under the Danish Act the regulations, which are approved by the Minister of Justice, may prescribe, as punishment in cases of important breaches of order, confinement in the cells of not more than two months?—Yes.

4006. It looks like a prison?—Oh, yes, it is a prison.]

4007. The head of the police must assent. So that if we had in this country labour colonies or penal workhouses they would be essentially prisons, would they not?—Yes.

4008. And therefore, properly, under the supervision of the Home Office?—Yes, and vagrants would be committed direct. Instead of being committed to the prison, they could be committed direct to the penal workhouse.

4009. As I take it, after repeated convictions for vagrancy?—Yes.

4010. You would advocate that a man should be sent to one of these penal establishments?—Yes.

4011. With, as you say, a longer detention. Have you formed any opinion as to how long that detention should be?—Well, it should be up to three years, most certainly.

4012. It varies in different countries of Europe from six months to three years?—Yes.

4013. You think three years?—Three years is a reasonable time.

4014. What do you think would be the proper tribunal to impose that penalty—quarter sessions?—Yes; I do not think that should be left to petty sessions.

4015. So that the petty sessions would convict, and send up for sentence to quarter sessions?—Yes, that would be so.

4016. (Mr. Simpson.) Like an incorrigible rogue now convicted at petty sessions and sent up to quarter sessions to be further dealt with?—Yes, the same kind of thing.

4017. (Mr. Davy.) But you would not advocate that such a punishment as that should be in the hands of petty sessions?—No.

4018. About the wayfaring ticket; the honest wayfarer is a very small proportion of the total number of vagrants, is he not?—Oh, yes, very small.

4019. And yet public opinion makes it necessary for us to deal with him in some way?—I think it is only right it should be so.

4020. And you suggest a ticket system?—Yes, I do not see any other way of getting out of it.

4021. A ticket given to a man, not because he is in search of work, but because he has been working?—Because he has been working and wants to go somewhere else to obtain work owing to the work where he is slackening off.

4022. Would you give him a ticket because he was going to such and such a place to find work?—Well, there are two classes of men; there is the man with a character, who wants to go to some definite place to find some definite work; and there is the man who says he is looking for work and may take a day or two, on the border line; he wants to be treated, I think, in a different way to the man I have just spoken of; he is on trial as it were.

4023. That is just what I want to get at; would you give him a ticket?—I think he should have a ticket, but not of the same kind as the first man.

4024. Supposing an improper person got hold of a ticket, might he not use it as an instrument of mendicancy?—Of course, that might be so; that, of course, is a danger.

4025. But that can be dealt with as the difficulty arises?—They should be punished where found out. The man would be traced, and, therefore, he could be punished much more easily in that way than he could at the present time for begging.

4026. (Chairman.) With regard to your proposal that on, say, the first and second convictions, you would not give imprisonment, what would be the best way of identifying the man; I take it you would have his convictions recorded?—Yes.

4027. There would be a register of tramps so convicted?—Yes.

4028. Care would have to be taken as to how that register was kept, because you would want to identify the man from it?—The difficulty would only be in the first instance, for as you gradually got these tramps off the road they would gradually disappear, and the numbers would be so much reduced that there probably would be less difficulty in identifying them.

4029. But in the case of a man who you had every reason to believe had been convicted before, you would want to get at his convictions?—Yes.

4030. The clerk of the petty sessions would keep the convictions of every man, as far as he could, his description and his name—which would perhaps not be of much use; but his description might be kept by means of a system of finger marks, and so on; and a man could be identified so that in his third conviction he could have a longer term of imprisonment?—Yes.

4031. In connection with another Committee on which I sat, Sir John Bridge advised that in the case of an inebriate the seven days' sentence was the very worst thing you could give him, either as a deterrent or for his health's sake?—Yes.

4032. His advice was that you should bind the man over. That would be recorded against him; and that should be the practice for first and second convictions for drunkenness; on the third conviction you would give him, not seven days, but a considerably longer period?—Yes.

4033. You might in this case adopt a somewhat similar plan to that recommended by Sir John Bridge?—Yes, exactly.

4034. (Mr. Simpson.) As regards the way-ticket, if there are stations marked on it and there is a considerable distance between one station and another, say ten or fifteen miles, do you not think that if a wayfarer sticks to his route, and walks his ten or fifteen miles a day, that is pretty good evidence of his bona fides, that he is not a mere loafer?—Oh, I think the tramps do that now. No, I do not think that would be at all enough. The tramp at the present time frequently walks fifteen miles a day, or even more.

4035. You have actual knowledge of the nuisance the tramps are to cottagers near you?—Yes.

4036. And you think the nuisance is great?—Oh, very much so. In the North Riding there has been almost a state of terror. This last Christmas there were several very serious assaults in the road, quite early in the evening, upon respectable people, and in my own neighbourhood neither man nor woman dare go out after dark to church or anywhere; they were in a perfect state of terror. There was a case of assault a day or two ago near Thirsk.

4037. (Chairman.) Do you live near the Great North Road?—No, the Great North Road is on the other side of me. We are on the main road, or nearly so, between Ripon and Northallerton. As a matter of fact, we never have a tramp at our own house.

4038. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you think a considerable proportion of the tramps are guilty of serious offences?—No, I do not think as a rule we do find that; I do not think the tramp is very much of a thief. If he is, it is in a very small petty sort of a way; I do not think he takes the trouble to break into a house or anything of that kind.

4039. When you were chairman of quarter sessions and incorrigible rogues were sent up from petty sessions to quarter sessions for sentence, were they mostly regular tramps?—I do not remember ever having a case myself.

4040. But probably if the magistrates in petty sessions knew that by sending a beggar, say, up to quarter sessions he might get some such sentence as three years in a penal colony, they would be much more likely to send him up?—Yes, certainly.

4041. Did you not say that in the North Riding the man who is arrested and taken to a police station gets a supper of bread and butter with tea or coffee?—Yes.

4042. That is supplied by the police?—That is supplied by the police-sergeant.

4043. That is much better than what he gets in prison?—Oh, yes.

4044. Or in the vagrant wards?—Yes.

4045. Then suppose you hand over the vagrant wards to the management of the police, would not there be rather a prospect of the tramps being better treated than now?—There would be, I suppose, some regulations made for their treatment. I assure you I would much rather trust to the discipline and management of the police, than of the present country workhouse master and his assistants.

4046. In Sir John Gorst's Vagrancy Bill of last session, it was proposed that county councils and councils of county boroughs should contribute sums towards the establishment or maintenance of a labour colony; do you think your county would be likely to contribute something towards that?—Well, I take it that would be in relief of the poor rate.

4047. Yes?—I would rather keep the county councils out of it to this extent; I would rather it was a police matter, and left to the standing joint committees; let them make their demand the same as is done now in all police matters upon the county council, simply to pay the rate. I think that in all matters connected with the police the standing joint committee is a very useful intermediate body between the county council and the justices. It prevents a great deal of general discussion upon matters which perhaps are none the better for open discussion, and the standing joint committee is quite capable of doing whatever would be the best in the general interest of the county. The county council, I think, should simply have to find the money on their demand.

4048. But, speaking generally, you would agree that the rates should pay a good deal of the cost of labour colonies, even though the taxes paid some of it?—Yes; taking it simply as a transfer by law from the poor law to the special police county rate.

4049. (Sir William Chance.) The particular union to which you referred, and of which you gave us a description, was the Northallerton union?—Yes.

4050. And the prison was the county prison of the North Riding?—Yes.

4051. For some years you have been very much interested in all questions of poor law administration?—Yes.

4052. Have you been a guardian?—I served as an ex-officio guardian some years ago, and worked very hard for a few years.

4053. In the Northallerton union?—In the Thirsk union; that is my union.

Mr. John
Hutton, M.P.
7 Mar. 1905.

Mr. John Hutton, M.P. 4054. But the union you described is Northallerton?—Yes.

7 Mar. 1905. 4055. What kind of casual wards are there in that union?—There are, I think, about eight cells. This was about the first union which adopted the cellular system.

4056. How long have these cells been in use?—I should think for twenty years, at least.

4057. Do you remember the effect of the cellular system, when first started, on the number of vagrants?—I am speaking only from dim memory, but my impression is that the effect was instantaneous.

4058. There was a decrease?—At once; a very considerable decrease.

4059. How long did that decrease last; can you remember that?—No; I do not think the effect has really ever worn off. I have here a return issued by Mr. Lowry, the Inspector of the northern district, which shows the number of vagrants relieved during the five years ended Michaelmas, 1903. At Northallerton the number varies from 846 in 1899 to 987 in 1903; it is always under 1,000; it has been down to 739 in 1900. Northallerton is a very central market town; it is where there is a great converging of highways from the West Riding to the Cleveland district. At Reeth, a little town in Swaledale, a most out of the way place, they had 1,148 in 1899, going up last year to 1,382; there they have no cellular system, though it is a place not half the size of Northallerton, which is on the high road.

4060. Is there any special attraction for vagrants to go towards that particular place?—No; that is a thing I cannot understand.

4061. You think possibly that they may go there on account of the Order of the Local Government Board not being carried out?—I think partly so.

4062. I think in Northallerton, according to your description, the Order is carried out?—Yes, it is.

4063. Detaining for two nights or four nights as the case may be?—Yes.

4064. And has there not been any special increase of vagrants in Northallerton?—No.

4065. Though there has been in other neighbouring unions where the Order has not been so well carried out?—Well, I do not say an increase, but they go on with a very high figure.

4066. Has there not been a very large increase in other places?—There has been a decrease in vagrancy in the whole of the North Riding for the last five years; it has gone down from 34,000 to 24,000.

4067. That is rather remarkable?—It is so different in Durham. There the number had increased from 44,000 to 50,000; and in Northumberland from 27,950 to 35,771.

4068. You can give no reason for that?—The only suggestion I can make is the more general application of the cellular system in the North Riding.

4069. There are more workhouses with the cellular system in the North Riding than in Durham?—They have increased in the North Riding; first one union and then another has adopted the Local Government Board regulations, and that has always had a good effect.

4070. And are the guardians generally pleased with the result of their establishing the cellular system?—Yes.

4071. They have found that the result is that vagrancy has diminished, or at any rate not increased?—Diminished, as a rule. May I refer to a difficulty in connection with vagrant ward statistics. I have no specific charge to make, but there always seems to me a very great danger of leakage. I can see no reason why if a workhouse master is a dishonest man he should not discharge his vagrants on the first morning after they have been received and draw rations for them for two days; and I have heard of workhouses—I do not wish to be more specific than that—where, on a change of master, as soon as the new master came into office, the vagrants were reduced by half, although there was apparently no diminution in the flow. It is a curious point of leakage.

4072. Your desire is that the vagrant should be entirely transferred from the guardians to the police?—Yes.

4073. That would include all classes of wayfarers?—Yes.

4074. Do you not think there are bona fide wayfarers amongst these vagrants?—Yes, certainly.

4075. Might there not be an objection on the part of some of those to go to a police station, if they are prima facie honest men seeking work?—I do not think so; at least there is no feeling of that kind locally in the North Riding. I understand there is a very strong feeling in some counties against it, but with us I have never heard the objection raised in any way at all.

4076. You think that with the tickets you have suggested there would not be that objection?—I have thought about it a great deal; I do not think there would be any objection to them at all, certainly not in the North Riding.

4077. Then these bona fide wayfarers, when they have satisfied the police with the production of the proper way-ticket, are to be given accommodation in lodging-houses; is that your idea?—Yes, wherever accommodation can be found for them.

4078. Would you suggest that the existing casual wards might be utilised in that way; the police could say "You will have a bed in the casual ward for the night"?—If the wards were made comfortable; but the honest wayfarer should not be treated in the same way as the tramp.

4079. Your suggestion is that the professional tramps should not go near the workhouse. How would you distinguish the treatment of the two classes after the application to the police?—I suggested that the casual ward cells should be transferred wherever possible to the charge of the police. Where they are the old casual wards under the charge of the police, or new cells adjoining the police station built for the purpose, there is no reason, of course, why some of them should not be fitted up better than others for the better class of wayfarer; otherwise, I do not see why the treatment should not be as now at Northallerton where, if a respectable man comes for relief to the police sergeant, he gives him a pass for a lodging-house.

4080. You wish the responsibility for dealing with all these vagrants transferred to the police; you do not wish to see the present casual wards abolished, but that they should be under police control?—For the sake of expense, where the casual wards are so detached from the workhouse buildings that they can, without interfering with the workhouse, be transferred to the police, I should certainly allow that to be done.

4081. Would it not be possible under your scheme for a wayfarer to apply in the first place at the casual ward, and then, if his papers were in order, he should be kept in the casual ward and properly treated and sent on the next day; but if his papers were not in order, then he should be referred to the police station and the police should take charge of him?—I should abolish the connection with the poor law authorities entirely, and compel the vagrant to deal with the police and the police only.

4082. (Chairman.) As I understand you, the casual ward becomes a police station?—That is my idea.

4083. (Sir William Chance.) You do not approve, I understand, of the Belgian colony system?—I do not know it personally; my opinion is formed from what I have read about it and heard about it.

4084. And from what you have heard about the colonies you do not think they would be applicable to England?—Oh, no. They are an enormous size; they have about 8,000 persons altogether in the two colonies.

4085. What is your opinion as to the effect they have upon the vagrant?—I am told it is perfectly hopeless any person going in there. If he was rather bad, he is made very bad; the effect is most deteriorating and most harmful in every possible way. If a person accidentally gets in there, a semi-respectable man, I am told there is no hope for him at all, and that he will come out a most perfected villain and blackguard. This is all from hearsay; I have not been there myself; but from what I have heard of the colonies from people who have been there they seem to me to be very dangerous and very deteriorating in every sense, and they are much too large.

4086. Have you considered the question of women and children; how should they be dealt with under this new system of putting the vagrants under the police ?—It is a smaller branch of the question, which will have to be dealt with. It did not seem so important to me as that of the male tramps. My own impression would be that as soon as you have taken the men off the road the women and children would disappear off the road. They would settle down somewhere.

4087. You say that a great deal of alms is given by the poor people to vagrants ?—Undoubtedly.

4088. And you think that the greater part of the support which they get comes from the poor ?—Yes, I do.

4089. I suppose you are of opinion if this almsgiving could be put a stop to, that the vagrant would not think it worth his while to keep on the road any longer ?—I quite think so.

4090. If giving alms were made an offence, vagrancy would probably cease ; the vagrants would find some other employment ?—In some of the Swiss Cantons, I think, a person is fined 10s. if he is found giving anything to a vagrant ; but I think that would never be applied here.

4091. (Dr. Downes.) You were speaking about the lack of criminality amongst the tramps in your district ; do you get any stack-firing or burning of barns ?—Yes ; but these are not done on purpose, from a criminal intent. I think they are chiefly caused by carelessness.

4092. A man who is smoking drops a match ?—No doubt that is a source of danger ; but I do not think it is from criminal intent.

4093. It is one of the drawbacks of the tramp ?—Yes a very serious one indeed.

4094. I think from what you said you would regard the question of classification as very important in connection with the labour colony or penal workhouse ?—Yes.

4095. That is to say that, if possible, you would exclude the criminal class ?—Certainly.

4096. The arrangements should permit of some persons being separated, if necessary, from the worst class, if the latter were found to have a detrimental effect ?—Yes.

4097. You would have to consider the question of association of the inmates in any such colony ?—Yes.

4098. In connection with the pass system you propose there is the question of identity ; do you think it possible that a man who had obtained a pass might sell it ?—Yes, I do.

4099. So that it would seem almost necessary to have some evidence of identity on the pass itself ?—It would be much better if it could be done, no doubt.

4100. A thumb-print might perhaps do ?—Yes.

4101. You propose that the genuine wayfarer who has a pass, should be provided with food and lodging at the expense of the county rate ; do you think it would be necessary to have any remedy, in case of default on the part of the county in providing such facilities ?—Well, if an Act were passed dealing with the tramps in this way, I do not see that the county could refuse, especially if the system is conducted by the standing joint committee. The standing joint committee act independently of the county council as a rule, being half of them justices ; my experience is that the standing joint committee could be trusted to carry out the law without the discussions or the objections which might be raised in a full county meeting.

4102. You think that perhaps that point might be left until it is found, in practice, that some compulsory power is necessary ?—I think it would not be necessary.

4103. Would you require the genuine wayfarer to perform any work in return for that food and lodging ?—No, I do not think I should. I should not like to express any strong opinion upon it, but I think he might be allowed to go on as speedily as possible.

4104. In fact, it would be more important to the State to get him to his work than to keep him to perform some task which is more or less useless ?—Yes.

4105. At what distance apart would you have the stages for the genuine wayfarer ?—I should say, not less than ten miles ; I think that a man ought to be able to do fourteen miles a day.

4106. A fair day's walk might be regarded as the equivalent of the work ?—Yes, quite so.

4107. As regards the casual applicant at a workhouse, who is destitute, if there were no casual wards under the Poor Law, would it meet the case if the master had power to admit that man and set him to work and detain him, pending police inquiries ?—I think that if there is no police station in the immediate neighbourhood of the workhouse, probably some arrangement of that kind should be made.

4108. (Sir William Chance.) It is often the case where the workhouse is in a country village, that the only police station near is the house of the policeman ?—That is not the case in the North Riding. I think there is only one village in the North Riding which answers to that description ; but in that sort of case arrangements ought to be made with the workhouse master to deal with the applicant, and then the guardians could recover the cost of his maintenance from the police rate.

4109. (Dr. Downes.) Pending inquiries ?—Yes ; I mean, I would not leave it to the village constable to deal with ; I do not think he is the proper man to deal with these cases.

4110. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) The reduction of vagrants in the North Riding from 34,000 to 24,000 is a great drop ?—Yes.

4111. When did that occur ?—That was in the last five years.

4112. You attributed that decrease to the enforcement of the regulations in the casual ward and to the activity of the police, I think ?—Yes, I think that is the proper way of putting it.

4113. In what does the activity of the police consist ?—I would rather you asked that question of the chief constable, who, I understand, is coming to give evidence before you. I gathered from what he told me that he has given instructions to the police to run in every man they see begging.

4114. Does not that show that prison is not so attractive after all, to these vagrants. Behind the police is only the prison ?—Yes, but I should prefer the chief constable, if you do not mind, to answer those questions.

4115. (Chairman.) Is it not also that you have been more strict in the matter of enforcing the bath and search ?—Yes.

4116. Has not that been a deterrent to a certain extent ?—Yes, I have no doubt it has. If you saw the bath at the workhouse, you would feel it a great deterrent.

4117. (Captain Showers.) They have a bath in the prison ?—Yes, there is a lovely bath there. I went through these two places, and I said to the police sergeant, " If I want a bed I will make you run me in here, instead of going into that awful looking place."

4118. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Do you happen to know Lincolnshire at all ?—No.

4119. In that county they have practically no vagrancy, owing to the vagrants being vigorously run in and sent to prison ?—Yes, I have read the very interesting report of the Lindsey justices.

4120. (Captain Showers.) How would you suggest that prison should be made more distasteful so as to keep tramps from wanting to go there ?—Well, that goes to the whole question of prison discipline ; I think, myself, it is a very great pity to have done away with the mill. I think that those old really hard labour punishments were a very great deterrent. So long as the wheels ground corn, or pumped water, they were not humiliating or did not diminish the self-respect of the prisoners ; very few of them have got much self-respect to start with. I think the whole idea of the last few years of the discipline of the prison has been going quite in the wrong direction. The whole idea, so far as I can make out, of the prison measures, is that prisons are merely for reformation ; that you must do everything you can to bring the men under nice and sweet influences, and make them see how naughty they have been, and try to make them respectable members of society. I have full sympathy with that for first committals. I think that first committals should always be " chaplains' men " ; that everything should be done

Mr. John Hutton, M.P.

7 Mar. 1905.

Mr. John Hutton, M.P. to try to reform these men and raise them. I think that the men who have been committed twice may have a little bit of that, but a little bit sterner discipline should be used; and the old hands I have no sympathy with at all; I think the only thing is to keep them in prison as long as you can, and make them work as hard as you can, and give up all ideas of reformation.

7 Mar. 1905.

4121. You propose that the police should manage the casual wards. Well, that would not really be police work?—No.

4122. Do you not think that this work would render the police liable to catch smallpox or some other bad disease from the tramps?—Tramps now go to a police station to get their order for the casual wards. I do not think there would be any greater danger than there is now, where the police act as assistant relieving officers.

4123. Do you not think there would be more danger if the police have to look after the tramps in cells than now when they see them only outside a police station?—As a matter of fact, at the two or three police stations I know, the tramps are now brought into the premises; and are generally searched there. I do not think there would be very much difficulty.

4124. What would be the rank of the policeman you would put in charge of these cells?—Nothing under a sergeant, most certainly; I should prefer an inspector.

4125. You would require more than one sergeant to supervise the tramps, I take it?—I mean, to be responsible; but he would employ constables under him. For instance, at Northallerton at the present time, an inspector is the assistant relieving officer, but he himself told me he very rarely sees the tramps; there is a sort of sergeant, or senior constable, who is in charge of the young constables, and he receives the tramps and issues the tickets to them. I do not care much who does the work as long as it is under the supervision of a superior officer.

4126. If the police are to have these extra duties put upon them, would it not be necessary to increase the force?—No, I do not think it would be necessary. You see, there are not many tramps in each town and already the police have to look after prisoners whom they lock up in the cells; they are accustomed to that kind of work; it is only a matter of making a little more broth.

4127. Who would have the looking after of the female tramps?—The wife of some inspector or sergeant who now looks after the female prisoners.

4128. Would not that be rendering her and her family liable to disease?—Not more so than searching prisoners who are brought in.

4129. With regard to the identification of these tramps, it is proposed, I think, that their finger-prints should be taken?—Yes, some of them.

4130. Then if you want to find out if a particular tramp has been convicted before, you would have to have him remanded, would you not?—Yes.

4131. That would take a certain number of days?—Yes.

4132. He might have to wait a week before he was dealt with?—Possibly, and then if you had a penal settlement he would probably be sent off for his three years, and you would get rid of him altogether. It would be well worth while retaining him for a few days to get rid of him altogether.

4133. In the labour colony, I suppose you would keep the confirmed tramp apart from the man who was only out of work?—I should try and keep the latter class of man away if possible until he became a confirmed vagrant; I should rather give him a passport to try and get work, and then, if he failed to get work, treat him as a tramp.

4134. As regards the number of tramps, is it not a fact that the same men are counted over and over again?—Oh, undoubtedly.

4135. And that gives a total number of tramps for a county much higher than the real number?—Yes, certainly.

4136. I think you are in favour of labour bureaux?—As far as I understand, labour bureaux might be made most useful things. I believe in Austria, especially, they are extremely well-conducted and extremely useful.

4137. Supposing employers were to let the police know at the different police-stations when they wanted labourers; notices could be put up, and wayfarers in search of work would have an opportunity of knowing where to go?—Yes.

4138. If the work was some distance off, would it not be cheaper for the man, instead of tramping on and being relieved at various workhouses, to be passed on by rail to the work?—Yes.

4139. And it would give him less chance of becoming a tramp?—I should certainly be in favour of that.

4140. (Mr. Davy.) You are of opinion that before a man is sent to a penal establishment for a definite time, it ought to be proved before a competent court that he is an habitual tramp?—Yes.

4141. It would be by a formal process of law?—Yes.

4142. There is a good deal of loose talk about sweeping the tramps into labour colonies, is there not?—Of course, we cannot do that except according to law.

4143. In your opinion, would it not be enough to prove that the man was an habitual tramp, or must he have committed some offence?—No, I would only require it to be proved that he was an habitual tramp; that would be an offence in itself.

4144. That would be an offence—his habit of life?—Certainly.

4145. So that it would not be necessary that a man should have committed some offence that would bring him before the magistrates?—No.

4146. In that way you would deal with tramps like the miserable creatures we see wandering about?—Yes.

4147. You would take away their liberty?—Yes, certainly.

4148. What would you do with hoppers and fruit-pickers?—I have absolutely no experience upon that matter.

4149. In some counties in England a large number of people come at certain times of the year for hopping or fruit-picking; they live in temporary sheds or sleep out or go to workhouses; would you make the county provide for them?—I do not know; the only thing like it we have in my part of Yorkshire is the influx of Irishmen.

4150. Do they come into Northumberland as well?—I do not know about Northumberland, they come into Yorkshire.

4151. (Chairman.) You said that in the Belgian labour colonies, the number of inmates was very great and constituted a danger. Now, what do you think would be a reasonable number for a labour colony. I suppose in the first place you would have the sexes separate?—Yes, of course.

4152. How many men would you have in the colony?—I should think they should not exceed 200; from 100 to 200.

4153. Do you know what the numbers in the Swiss colonies are?—I think they are about 150.

4154. I take it you look forward to there being agricultural labour in the colonies?—Yes.

4155. (Mr. Davy.) Is that essential?—No; the penal workhouse need not necessarily, of course, be agricultural at all. Under the Danish system, in some cases at least the penal workhouses have land attached.

4156. (Chairman.) There is one matter connected with the way-ticket: under the Gloucestershire system the way-ticket includes a bread ticket?—Yes.

4157. As being a means of obviating begging?—Yes.

4158. A man who leaves the workhouse in the morning gets a way-ticket and that tells him where he can get a loaf of bread during the day?—Yes.

4159. That relieves him of any fear of hunger, and it also takes away any excuse for begging?—Yes.

4160. Now, would you contemplate a similar system in connection with your way-ticket?—Yes, I think so, certainly; it seems to me to be obviously the best plan.

4161. One imperfection in the present arrangements is that a man is turned out of the casual ward in the morning and expected to walk till six or seven o'clock at night without being given any means of getting a meal in the meantime?—Yes. He should certainly be provided in some way with a meal.

Mr. W. HENRY BARNEBY, called; and Examined.

4162. (Chairman.) You are a county alderman of the county of Hereford?—Yes, I am.

4163. And you have been a guardian, I believe, since 1867?—Yes. I was an ex officio guardian first of all; and afterwards an elected guardian, when ex officio guardians were done away with.

4164. You have been taking an interest in and working on boards of guardians since 1867?—I have very regularly.

4165. I think you were chairman of the Hereford guardians from 1890 to 1894?—Yes.

4166. And of the Bromyard board of guardians from 1895 to 1900?—Yes.

4167. And you were chairman of the Hereford rural district council from 1894 to 1903?—Yes.

4168. And now you are a guardian for both Hereford and Bromyard?—Both; I am now chairman of the county council finance committee and of the education finance sub-committee. I have had to give up the guardians' work to a certain extent on account of these committees.

4169. I think you are aware of the object of the present inquiry?—Yes.

4170. Now what have you to say with regard to the enforcement of the regulations as to casual paupers, and as to uniformity amongst the different boards of guardians?—My view is that if every workhouse had sufficient accommodation to carry out the existing regulations, it would go a long way towards reducing the numbers of tramps, especially if they were under police supervision. But this is not the case in many rural workhouses. At present a tramp will make for a workhouse where he knows he will be treated with greater leniency than in others, i.e., owing to lack of suitable accommodation or to the system being lax.

4171. Are you referring to casual wards where there is no cellular accommodation as against wards where there are cells for vagrants?—No, I mean where the vagrants know there is shortness of accommodation, and where they know they are not detained two nights; these are the important points. And where they know they are not properly examined and properly washed. My experience of workhouse officials is that they cannot all do their duty in that respect; they have not got the opportunity of doing it; they have not the means and they have not the staff.

4172. Do you know of many workhouses where the requirements of the Order with regard to the bath and search are not carried out?—Well, I should not like to accuse any particular workhouse, but I know that this is frequently the case of necessity.

4173. I do not ask you to mention any particular one, but you are aware that there are cases in your part of England where the Order is disregarded?—It is impossible to comply with it with the accommodation and the staff they have got.

4174. Then it is not so much the fault of the workhouse masters as the fault of the accommodation?—I am not blaming the workhouse masters; they have not got the staff or in every case the means by way of accommodation.

4175. Workhouses, in fact, want bringing up to the present requirements?—Well, is it fair upon the ratepayers to increase the accommodation for these tramps? I do not think it is. They put off coming in until the very last minute, 8 o'clock at night, and then they come in a troop; there is not enough accommodation for them in most of the country workhouses, especially in Herefordshire in hop-picking time; there is only just the porter and his wife to look after them. It is quite impossible to do it properly without a staff. And then there is not the accommodation in the house to receive them; they are huddled away anywhere.

4176. You say the ratepayers would feel it very much if the necessary accommodation were provided?—Decidedly, because they would have to accommodate people who do not belong to the union at all. There is no question about that; in fact, the ratepayers complain very much now.

4177. You think there would be great difficulty in enforcing uniformity amongst the different workhouses?—Well, in 1894-5 I took a good deal of trouble to put in force the Local Government Board Order of 1882, and I presided over a large meeting at the Shire Hall, Hereford, to enforce that Order; for a certain number of years it was very successful, but now it is often given up. In many workhouses—take Hereford for instance—they have given up detaining anybody two nights. First of all, they detained them for two nights, and then some of them gave it up, partly on account of the soft-heartedness of the guardians themselves—"Oh, poor fellow, what a shame it is to keep a traveller in the house for two nights." He might be the biggest blackguard in England; they have got no means of distinction whatever. To show you how the numbers have increased, I have a return here from the Bromyard workhouse, from which it appears that in the year 1871 the total number of tramps admitted was 106, and in the year 1904 the number was 4,423.

4178. Now, to what would you attribute that very large increase?—Well, I think in a great measure to finding the casual wards are so exceedingly lenient. But may I say one word as to Hereford? In the year 1894, the total number of vagrants was 6,952, and in the next year (after the conference to which I alluded) it dropped to 4,170; and in the year after that to 3,424; and in the year after that to 2,720; it was only one-third you see. And then the authorities became rather slacker, and then vagrants increased again. Now they do not detain any of them for two nights.

4179. Was that partly owing to the condition of the labour market; was there less work?—Oh, no. On the contrary, so far as Hereford is concerned, in September, when hop-picking is coming on, these tramps come in and infest the country in thousands; 400 to 500 present themselves at the workhouse for sleeping accommodation and claim it, where there is only accommodation for fourteen people.

4180. Are those men really working men who are on their way to get work?—No, these people come out of the Potteries and the Black Country; they come for a summer holiday. They start about a fortnight or more before the hop-picking begins, and they rob orchards and steal sticks and so on, and they go to the workhouse for accommodation at night. Directly the hop-picking begins in Herefordshire, they are employed by some of the farmers, and the farmers have to find them accommodation of some sort or another; they sleep in out-buildings and so on. But about September the place is infested with them, and it is not safe to go along the roads. It is impossible to deal with that class of person.

4181. Do they earn wages sufficient to take them home at their own expense?—Yes, I think they do; and in some cases the farmer will put himself into communication with some large employer of labour and will pay their expenses down. They will come down then when he is ready for hop-picking and they will be employed at once. A lot of the ordinary vagabonds, as they call them, come down three or four weeks beforehand to have a lark; there is no accommodation for them in our workhouses, and they sleep in the sheds and come in and are fed and are sent off next morning, doing no work, and the workhouses are keeping them for nothing.

4182. Those men, when they come in that way, put themselves within the reach of the law?—Oh, yes; that is the reason the police ought to have more control over them.

4183. If a man comes down with the intention of doing nothing for a fortnight and lives upon what he can pick up, that man, for the time being, is a vagrant in the eyes of the law?—He ought to be taken up for sleeping out, to begin with.

4184. There is a legal remedy against him?—Yes, but it is not put in force.

4185. Now, with regard to the task of work in casual wards, what do you consider the most suitable form?—Tasks of work must of necessity change in different localities. In country districts stone breaking appears to be the most suitable for men, but women and children cannot be properly employed and are generally given very light work, such as cleaning out their own sleeping quarters and washing rough garments, etc. In the country there is no other task for the men at all except breaking stone and digging in the garden.

4186. Do you ever have any wood cutting?—Oh, yes; there is some, but that is kept more for the indoor paupers in the workhouse.

4187. Any oakum picking?—No, that is kept for the prisoners. I am a visitor at the local prison. Oakum picking is done in the prisons, and wood chopping, as a rule, is done by the regular inmates of the workhouse. The casual vagrant, where he can do it, gets stone breaking to do; and, where there is a garden, if he cannot break stones, he is given work in the garden.

4188. Digging, I suppose?—Yes. There is a large garden attached to some of the workhouses. So far as the women are concerned, there is nothing whatever for them to do.

4189. Except, as you say, some washing and cleaning?—They are put to cleaning windows; they are put to sweeping out their own wards; they are not admitted into the inside of the workhouse, but any rough clothes there are sent out to them to wash; still there is practically no employment for them and they get hardly any work.

4190. Is the dietary sufficient?—Yes, quite sufficient for the ordinary vagrant, but he ought to be put under the police and not under the workhouse authorities. I think a more liberal diet might be given to the bona fide traveller and charged to the union from which he starts. In any such case the traveller should produce a way-ticket issued either by the district council, or board of guardians, or some other local authority. I think the bona fide traveller should be lodged at the casual wards, while the vagrants should be entirely under the supervision of the police and in separate buildings to the bona fide travellers. The ordinary vagrant now, I think, gets enough food. There is a question about giving some bread on starting, but personally I am not in favour of it. The mendicity society, who issue bread tickets for wayfarers, have taken lately to send the tickets round to the porter's lodge at Hereford, and when a man leaves this workhouse, by applying at the porter's lodge he can have his mid-day meal given him for nothing.

4191. Is the meal given to him at the porter's lodge or only a ticket?—A ticket. He is asked where he is going and he is given this ticket, which takes him on to the next workhouse, and he can get the meal on his way.

4192. Is this a newly-instituted system?—No, the society has been going on for seventeen years, but it is a new thing to give the tickets at the porter's lodge. Well, what is the result? I see from a recent report of the society that in the year 1901 the number of vagrants relieved in Herefordshire in workhouses was 18,174—that is four years ago; and in 1904 the number comes up to 37,055—more than double. I do not believe in the system.

4193. (Mr. Simpson.) Those would be the number of admissions to casual wards?—Yes, during the year for the whole county.

4194. (Chairman.) And do you attribute that increase to the extra relief which is given?—No, I do not, because this extra relief is not very much; it is only about one pennyworth of bread. But the figures show how very much the vagrants are increasing; they have more than doubled within the last four years.

4195. Well, to what do you attribute that very large increase?—Well, I attribute it in great measure to the facility with which they can get accommodation at the workhouses; that is my opinion.

4196. In other words, I suppose, you would attribute it generally to the fact that the workhouse authorities do not strictly carry out the regulations of the Local Government Board?—I do not know what the reason is. The facts speak for themselves. But, whilst on the subject, may I say one word more in reference to these vagrants? I am of opinion, and I have found it out as a certainty, that there is no necessity whatever, or very seldom, for a bona fide working man who belongs to a friendly society, or who belongs to a trade union, to go to a workhouse at all. And, what is more, they do not. The unionists, and the Foresters, and the Oddfellows have all got tickets now. They can pass a respectable man from one end of England to another free of the workhouse altogether, and very few indeed go to the workhouse; there is no necessity whatever to have these vagrants about the country.

4197. How would you draw the line between what you call the bona fide traveller and the vagrant—that is, the idle vagrant?—I would not let any man be relieved at a workhouse casual ward unless he had a pass from the place he started from: but would treat such men who had no pass as vagrants with no occupation and let them be relieved by the police.

4198. Then, I suppose, by means of the pass you would be able to distinguish the bona fide traveller from the idle vagrant?—Unless he had a pass to show, he would have no business to live upon the hospitality of the country.

4199. To turn to another point: we have had evidence to the effect that the vagrant often prefers prison to the casual wards. Have you anything to say as to this?—If the tramp really means this, the reason would be, I think, that the prison is warmer, cleaner, and better managed, the food is better and more regular, and there is less work on a seven days' conviction (practically only five days' work); and, in fact, the prison is far more comfortable in every respect. That is my experience as a guardian and as a visitor to the gaol. If I were a tramp I would much sooner go to gaol than I would go into the workhouse.

4200. Have you ever asked any of these men why they preferred the prison?—No, I have not; I think it is more swagger than anything else. I think the tramp very often says to the master, "I do not care about being with you; I would much sooner be round at the prison than be with you," and that sort of thing; I think that is what has given rise to it a good deal. Still, at the same time, I have, as a magistrate, come across cases where a man has been very anxious to get a conviction and be sent to prison. We had a case of a man who set fire to a rick or something, and he at once ran to the police station and gave himself up. When he was given twenty-one or twenty-eight days in prison he was very much obliged. That was in the winter months.

4201. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Twenty-eight days for setting fire to a rick?—I forget exactly what the sentence was, but it was something of that kind. The man was so very evidently anxious to be sent to prison, but I do not think the magistrates quite gave him what he wanted; he wanted about six months.

4202. As a rule it is seven years for such an offence?—I am only giving that as an instance.

4203. (Chairman.) Do you know the way-ticket system they have in Gloucestershire?—Yes, I know the system well.

4204. Would you be in favour of making that system general all over England?—No, certainly not; I was always against it from the beginning. In Herefordshire, when we put the Order of 1882 in force, we reduced the tramps to half; while the Gloucestershire people doubled theirs. No, I do not believe in their system a bit. I think it is one of the very worst systems they could possibly have.

4205. Have you anything to say as regards vagrant children?—Why not deal with them under the Education Act? There is no doubt it is a very difficult question about the children. On the other hand, I do not know why, if these children are seen wandering about the road, the school attendance officer should not go up to the parents and ask them why they do not go to school. That is one of the first things to do in every parish. If the school attendance officer finds children going along a road, and he tackles the parents, and says, "Does not your child go to school?" and they cannot reply, I think he should report them at once and apply for a summons.

4206. Take a case I came across some time ago. A man was tramping from Manchester to Hartlepool with two boys aged about ten and eleven, both healthy boys. Now, what would you do with those boys; you would not detain them anywhere under the Education Act, would you?—I think you can.

4207. Separate them from the father?—I think that if the father is brought up before the Bench, in the first case he would be fined, and if he did not pay the fine he would be imprisoned. That is a case for the police.

4208. Then the boys you would take into the workhouse?—The boys I would take into the workhouse during the imprisonment.

4209. And they would be educated in the workhouse school?—That is the only thing I can see to do.

4210. When the father comes from, say, twenty-eight days' imprisonment, what is to happen if he is going on to some other place?—Well, catch him again.

4211. Do the boys remain in the workhouse?—No, I would not keep the children. A great many of the parents would be anxious to get rid of their children; that is what I am afraid of.

4212. You would take these boys away from the parent then only when he was imprisoned?—Yes. I think the tramp would soon be tired of it. If the parent was continually pounced upon by the school attendance officer and the police called in, and the man summoned, fined, and if he did not pay the fine, sent to prison, and the children taken into the workhouse, I think the tramp would very soon get tired of it; I do not think he would like it. It is very much stricter now with fines than it was two years ago; if he does not pay the fine now you can put him in prison; we did that the other day. And I think the tramp would very soon get tired of that, and it is the only way I can see to tackle him. I would put him in prison if he did not pay the fine.

4213. For how long would you imprison him?—In the first instance, I should not give him more than eight days; the second time I would give him fourteen days.

4214. What about the children?—Detain them in the workhouse.

4215. When he comes out at the end of eight days?—Give him back his children again.

4216. Then he will go tramping on and the children will only have had seven days' education?—Yes, then he could be brought up again if the police did their duty.

4217. Supposing he walked on with those boys fourteen or fifteen miles, would you catch him there, and then put the children into another workhouse?—I should catch him in another district; the police would follow him up. If he did not pay the fine I should issue a warrant to bring him in. There is no doubt that is the most difficult point of the whole law.

4218. No doubt it is a very difficult point?—I think many of the tramps would like to get rid of their children.

4219. What is your opinion with regard to short sentences on vagrants?—When acting as occasional chairman of my Bench I invariably give eight days' hard labour instead of the ordinary seven days, so as to secure a full week. Each case that comes before the Bench has to be adjudicated upon on its merits, and there cannot be uniformity; but I think former convictions should be taken into consideration and the sentence increased when the man is re-convicted for a similar offence. The object of giving eight days instead of seven is that when you put a man in prison, the day he goes in counts for a day, and the day he comes out; but if he is in for eight days he gets his full week. For the ordinary sleeping out vagrant, I should give eight to fourteen days, according to circumstances. It is impossible to have any uniformity about that, because it depends so very much upon what the circumstances are. If the vagrant is caught in a barn smoking, and so on, I would give him as much as I possibly could, but if it is simply lying down under a hedge, and that sort of thing, I should give him eight days. I should convict them all; I should not let off anybody.

4220. Some witnesses have been in favour of not sentencing a man to imprisonment for, say, the first or the second offences, simply recording the conviction against him, and then sentencing him to a longer sentence if convicted the third time; you do not agree with that?—Oh, certainly not. I think most of the magistrates would not know anything about former convictions. Probably they would not be found out, and a man would get off, and that would be an end of it. I think it would increase vagrancy if that was done. I never let a man off if I can help it.

4221. Do you think an eight days' sentence really decreases vagrancy?—I would give eight to fourteen days for first offences, if the man is only caught begging. I want to get rid of vagrants; we do not want to keep them.

4222. Now, what is your idea of the duty of the police with regard to vagrants?—To my mind the greater part of the inquiry turns on this point, and there ought to be no half measures. The vagrant with no occupation seeking relief at night ought to be put entirely under the supervision of the police and dealt with by constables, and not by any workhouse official. If the question is raised that this would entail too great an expense in erecting new buildings where vagrant wards are now large, means could be adopted for handing over the vagrant wards to the police, or a portion of them, if there is not sufficient accommodation in the local prison or its neighbourhood. It must be remembered in considering this drastic measure that every individual has a perfect right to seek indoor admittance to the workhouse, so there can be no hardship. The bona fide traveller with a way-ticket from his union might be lodged either at the workhouse or in a lodging-house, and in either case properly fed, and on departure given a ticket for a mid-day meal. In any case the union from which the individual starts should be charged with the cost by each workhouse at which the man stays. Way-tickets in all cases should be checked by the police prior to admission to a workhouse, and at each workhouse the way-ticket should be again checked prior to departure. If vagrancy is to be stamped out I think some plan like the foregoing must be adopted. The present mode of procedure, viz., putting the tramps under the workhouse authorities, is an entire failure. Some years ago, when I was chairman, I had the management of alterations to the Bromyard workhouse. I advocated moving the tramp wards from the workhouse to the neighbourhood of the local police and the idea was favourably received by the guardians. But it was not in conformity with the Local Government Board regulations, so we let the matter drop. I think that some plan should be adopted, that when a man starts from a place, wherever it may be, his case should be examined by the local authorities beforehand, the same as we do for outdoor relief. If a man living, we will say, in York wants to go to Swansea, and he holds out to the guardians, or whatever the authority may be, that he can get work when he gets there, but that he has not got any money to pay for his expenses, and the authorities are satisfied with his story, then he ought to be furnished with a pass, a book, stating what his route is, and the way there, and the workhouses he can stop at. Then at each place he comes to, this book ought to be checked, first of all, by the police to see that he is the man; then it ought to be presented to the workhouse master, and the person ought to be dealt with liberally; he ought to be well-fed, and he ought to be well-housed; and whatever it costs for housing him there, that workhouse ought to be reimbursed by the union from which he started. It is a fact now that some of the large towns and places, instead of wishing to put a stop to vagrancy, are only too glad to encourage it in the summer months. I advocated some scheme of this kind some months ago, and the first person I talked to said, "Oh, please do not do that; if you keep tramps in Birmingham in the summer they will never be able to get away; they always return here in the winter. We should have a great deal too much of them then." If my plan could be adopted there should be a route ticket which would pass a man from one end of England to another, and the union from which he started should be charged, which I think would be perfectly fair. Supposing a man is a bona fide workman in distress, and there is no work to be got in his union, if he cannot get work he must come upon the rates. He must apply to the board of guardians, and he must be admitted to the workhouse, and so it would be very much cheaper for the union to pay the other guardians to see him through. And then it is possible he might get employment at the other end. But I think the union that starts the man ought to be responsible for the payment. I do not think it ought to come on us local ratepayers who live half way.

4223. Manifestly that system would be an assistance to the honest man in helping him to get work?—Yes. Then with regard to the vagrant, who simply tramps the country for amusement, who likes the outdoor life and that sort of thing, he ought in every case to be relieved by the police, if he is relieved at all. You may depend upon it, if a vagrant has to go to the police and ask for assistance, you will very soon have very few vagrants in England. Perhaps I may mention an incident which occurred not long ago. A mutual friend of ours was sitting near a turnpike road when an able-bodied vagrant came up and begged from him. Although very much tempted to give him something, my friend said: "We cannot give you money because we are trying to put down vagrancy. Where do you come from?" The tramp replied: "I come from Ledbury, and am going to Hereford." "What will you do when you get there?" "I shall go to the workhouse." "Supposing you had to go to the police instead of going to the workhouse?" "No police for me," replied the tramp, "I am not going near the police; I am going to the workhouse." I believe it is a fact that if the honest wayfarer had a ticket through from place to place, and all the vagrants had to be relieved by the police, and came under the superintendence of a constable instead of a workhouse porter, you would check vagrancy very considerably. It ought to be entirely put in the hands of the police.

4224. What is your view with regard to labour colonies?—I do not like them. Labour colonies may answer very well in Belgium and places where they have got no workhouses, but here in England where we have a large staff at the workhouse and every accommodation for the bona fide man and the vagabond, I think if you start labour colonies you would have a repetition of workhouses, and you would require a large new staff of officials who would all have to be paid. You would either have to rent or buy land, which is not cheap in England—it may be cheap enough abroad but it is not here—and the result would be that you would largely increase the rates. For my own part, I should be only too glad to punish the vagrant, but I think it ought to be done in the ordinary course of the law; and if a man cannot show that he can maintain himself, I think it is a proper case for the police to take up. But I do not think the ratepayers in England ought to be asked to contribute to a brand new scheme like that of the labour colony, when they have got the workhouse. We know that all the workhouses are now becoming nothing better than infirmaries; they have not got sufficient able-bodied paupers in the workhouses to do the work, and they have to pay other people to do it. Why these people who say they want work should be put in another establishment, when you have already got an establishment ready for them, I cannot understand.

4225. You do not think labour colonies would have any effect in reducing vagrancy?—I do not think so. I think that if the existing law were properly enforced, we should in effect have labour colonies; we have got workhouses and we have got the police.

4226. There is the question of labour bureaux; are you in favour of having labour bureaux?—It cuts both ways; I should want them under the police, but I do not think you ought to make the police agency-officers. I think it would give an excuse to vagrants to travel about the country saying, "We are going to the bureau to ask for work." I think there is plenty of work, if a man wants it.

4227. Would it not be an advantage to the honest man to know where work was to be had?—I do not think it is a matter that ought to be put on the rates; I think it might be dealt with by private individuals. In most cases if you offer work to vagrants they will not take it.

4228. No doubt a very large portion of them are men who will not work if they can help it; but there is a certain number of men whom you would wish to assist if you possibly can?—I think they are in a minority. I employ a good deal of labour—it is only in country life—from time to time, but I never had a tramp do anything for me, as long as he could possibly help it. At one time, during a very bad winter some years ago, I started a stone-breaking place near the railway station, and got so much stone put there and a man to look after it. There was not a single application; nobody wanted to work as long as he could go to the workhouse and do nothing.

4229. What would you say would be the percentage of idle men among the tramps?—I should say there would be more than 75 per cent. of idle men. As a rule, I do not think they want to work. I heard of a man who was very much connected with trades union clubs and so forth and last Saturday I got hold of him and said, "I wish you would write down your views and let me have them." This is a letter I got yesterday morning; it would show how to carry out what I am trying to explain. I think members of trades unions and friendly societies would be passed through by their society, and there would be no necessity for their going to the workhouse at all. This letter is from a man who is mixed up with those societies. He writes as follows:—"All trades unionists carry a certificate or document which states name, age, length of membership and benefits to which the holder is entitled. While these benefits last—a varying period in different trades—the holders have no need to claim assistance from the rates in any form. It is only a very small residue who are so dissolute or inefficient as to be out of all benefit. In my thirty years' experience I have never known a deserving printer belonging to our society who was compelled to enter a tramp ward. Friendly societies: The principal of these have a system of granting travelling cards to members seeking employment, with the essential difference to trade societies, that the relief is philanthropic, pure and simple, and depends much upon the financial position of the locality visited. Apart from trades unions and friendly societies the exigencies of labour life always compel a floating section who must travel or starve. What I feel is sadly wanted is some method of making a practical use of the statistics obtained by the 'Labour Gazette.'" That is a very practical man; he is a printer and a guardian himself.

4230. All the men belonging to a trade union, you think, are provided with a ticket of their own?—There is no doubt about it. I know a chairman of quarter sessions very strongly of opinion that tramps ought to be put under the police.

4231. He is in favour of the police dealing with the vagrants, apart from the workhouse authorities?—He says that the vagrants ought to be treated differently to the honest wayfarers.

4232. (Mr. Davy.) With reference to your hop-picking vagrants, is there any attempt made to detain them at any of the workhouses?—Well, there is a greater attempt made to get rid of them, because they come in by hundreds.

4233. But no workhouse has made an attempt at detaining them for the statutory period?—Oh, no, it is impossible.

4234. You are aware that it has been done in Kent, are you not?—I expect they have more accommodation there. Kent has quite a different system, I think, to what we have in Herefordshire, from what I have heard. I think in Kent they get them by the truck-load down from London. They do not go down till the work commences, I fancy, in Kent.

4235. But that is a result of some supervision of them in the workhouses?—I do not know anything about that; I know that to start perhaps we got 500.

4236. Is there any workhouse in the county of Hereford that carries out the regulation as to detention?—They all did.

4237. Do they all do it now?—No, I know one which has given it up.

4238. How long has it been given up?—About the last three or four years, because the vagrants have increased so.

4239. Are the vagrants all searched?—They pretend to search them, but I say it is utterly impossible for a porter and a porter's wife to be able to tackle these.

4240. Anyway, they do not do it?—No, they cannot.

4241. Have any of the casual wards separate cells?—Yes, most of them; but the vagrants are put in two together when there is not enough room.

4242. So the cells cease to be separate?—The separate cell is very much the best. I was told that Mr. Talbot, who was chairman of the Northleach union in Gloucestershire, where there is an old prison in the neighbourhood, used to put all the vagrants in separate cells. At the end of three months he had no tramps at all. That is what I heard a few days ago.

4243. Might not the increase of tramps to some extent be due to the neglect to carry out the requirements of the Order?—It is impossible to carry out the requirements of the Order unless you go to a very great expense in building new cells. If you have got a population of 10,000 and a workhouse built for 100, and you have twenty cells, that is as much as the population ought to have to provide. If it comes to 200 a night you must have 200 cells; that would cost about £5,000.

4244. Would you say that the Casual Poor Order has broken down in the county of Hereford?—Entirely.

4245. Has it broken down in the neighbouring counties?—I do not think it was ever put in force there.

4246. Or in Wales?—I do not know anything about Wales.

4247. (Mr. Simpson.) In Herefordshire are casuals never refused admission?—I see by a paper I have here, out of 6,000 last year two women were refused in Hereford workhouse.

4248. If a large number of vagrants were refused admission in one casual ward, and made to walk on to another, that would make it rather less pleasant for them?—They cannot walk, say, fifteen miles on when they only present themselves at eight o'clock at night.

4249. So that, as a matter of fact, they are usually taken in?—Yes, especially in summer.

4250. And the regulation of the Local Government Board is disregarded in order to make room for the casuals?—Absolutely, I think. I do not think the Local Government Board Orders are maintained as they ought to be, anywhere.

4251. (Sir William Chance.) You remember a deputation which waited upon Mr. Shaw-Lefevre in 1894 or 1895?—I was present at that deputation.

4252. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre laid a good deal of stress upon the evidence which was given to him as to the increase in vagrancy having been due to the guardians not carrying out the Orders of the Local Government Board?—I was quite in favour of all that he said.

4253. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre at that time quoted you in support of that opinion?—His father and my father were friends; that was the reason.

4254. I mean to say, he laid a great deal of stress on your evidence at that time?—I think he approved of my evidence.

4255. At that time you thought it was quite possible to secure uniformity among boards of guardians?—I hoped so.

4256. Now, I understand, ten years afterwards, you have come to the opposite conclusion, and you say it is impossible to secure uniformity?—I say it is impossible now because vagrancy is four times as great; there is no adequate accommodation for the vagrants, and besides, the boards of guardians will not all put the Order in force. I think it was the putting it in force in Herefordshire and just round that drove all the vagrants away, and they went into other counties; then they got slack. That is what I meant by saying just now that some guardians were so obstinate that when it had been in force a year or something like that, some guardians got up and said, "What a shame it is to keep a poor labouring man for two nights when he is a bona fide traveller." They turned to the masters of the workhouses and said, "Don't detain anybody unless you are quite sure he is a vagrant." Now, they do not detain at all.

4257. Anyhow, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre refused an inquiry at that time on the ground that the remedy was to carry out the law?—Yes, he wanted to carry out the law.

4258. In Herefordshire the mendicancy society has been carried on for about seventeen years?—Yes.

4259. That was taken, I think, from the Dorset system. It is practically the same as the Dorset system?—I cannot be certain because I have never supported it; I do not know much about it.

4260. You have not supported it?—No. The police told me that it did a great deal of mischief. If they found anybody loafing about a private house in the country, and they were suspicious of him, the police were immediately disarmed because the loafer turned round and said, "I am only going to ask for a bread ticket." I do not believe in that system.

4261. However, that system is founded on the Dorset system, and is practically similar to it?—I believe it is.

4262. You do not believe in the Gloucestershire way-ticket system?—I do not believe in it at all.

4263. You distinguish between that system and your system of passes?—Yes, they have not got any system of passes.

4264. You recommend a system of passes?—Yes. I think no pass should be given to a man unless his case was investigated by an authority.

4265. Your system that you recommend may be called the pass system; it is the German system practically?—I do not know where it comes from; it is my own idea.

4266. If labour colonies were established, I understand it is your opinion that they ought not to be under boards of guardians?—Certainly not.

4267. Then under whom ought they to be?—The police undoubtedly.

4268. And under the Home Office?—Well, I should put them under the Prime Minister, I think.

4269. At any rate you think they ought to be made a State charge and not a local charge?—Certainly not a local charge. I said the Prime Minister, because then he could appoint his own department.

4270. (Dr. Downes.) I understand the gist of your proposal to be to refer the habitual tramp to the police and the bona fide traveller to the poor law?—That is exactly what I mean.

4271. You would start your bona fide traveller with a pass granted by the poor law authority?—The guardians, district council, or some one who could investigate the case.

4272. The cost of this traveller from the point from which he started to the point to which he arrives should be charged to the initiating authority?—Yes, otherwise, if it were not so, they would be only too glad to get rid of him and put the expense on somebody else.

4273. Would it not be very difficult for the first authority to ascertain where there is work for him?—Not at all; he might state it himself.

4274. Having ascertained that, would it not be cheaper to send him by train?—No. It would be quite easy to send him by train, but if you were to give him a third-class ticket there would be heaps of them applying, whereas if he were told he would have to walk 200 miles he would hesitate about it. I have heard that before. I wrote to Sir Richard Harrington and asked him about it, and he says, "To give the relief in the shape of a railway ticket to be handed to the railway authorities and not to the vagabond himself might be allowed to the alleged place of destination. But I do not think that would answer..." In one case I believe I went entirely against the law; I paid for a ticket to get rid of a man out of Hereford. He made use of the ticket given him by the station master, but two stations from the starting point he got out of the train, and next morning he came back to Hereford. You cannot make them go if they do not want to.

TWELFTH DAY.

Wednesday, 22nd March, 1905.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair).

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary).

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN DORINGTON, Bart., M.P., called ; and Examined.

*Sir John
Dorington,
Bart., M.P.*
22 Mar. 1905.

4275. (Chairman.) Sir John Dorington, you were I think, for many years chairman of the Gloucestershire quarter sessions ?—Yes.]

4276. And you are still chairman of the county council ?—Yes, I have been chairman of the county council for about eighteen years.

4277. You are aware that Admiral Christian and Colonel Curtis-Hayward came before us and explained the Gloucestershire system of the way-ticket ?—Yes.

4278. That system has been in force for a considerable number of years, and I understand you yourself are in favour of the continuance of it ?—I think it has been highly advantageous ; it was a marked success at the beginning ; I had rather an important part in the starting of it. Colonel Curtis-Hayward was kind enough to take it up and work it as chairman of the county vagrancy committee.

4279. For some years the system was very successful in the reduction of vagrancy ?—Yes.

4280. What led, as far as your memory enables you to say, to the increase of vagrancy again ?—Oh, latterly, I think, the increasing destitution of the country, and, no doubt, partly the great works going on in Gloucestershire. Great works, I think, bring the vagrants in, partly in search of work, and partly in search of the very good begging ground which a large collection of navvies supplies.

4281. We were told that navvies coming to any large works were generally accompanied by a certain amount of tramps, who came in the hope of getting what they could out of them ?—I do not think they came with the navvies, but they came because the navvies were there.

4282. I do not say they marched with them, but they were hangers-on ?—Yes.

4283. So in that way vagrancy was increased in Gloucestershire ?—There has been a general increase throughout England, and we have had our share. I have here a report which has just been printed as to vagrancy in the county ; it was presented at our last quarter sessions (report handed in—see Appendix VIII). That gives the figures down to the end of last year.

4284. The report gives the number of vagrants dealt with, and the number of vagrants to whom a ration of bread was supplied in 1904 ?—Yes, there is one rather curious passage in the report as to the increase in good tickets : “The returns for the year show that an increasing number of tramps produce good tickets at the union workhouses. The increase in the number of good tickets is 46 per cent., while the increase in the tramps admitted is 32 per cent.” Now I think that proves that the number of persons who are honestly travelling in search of work has increased in relation to the total number of vagrants. I do not think Colonel Curtis-Hayward gave quite sufficient stress to the fact that there is an honest class, that is to say, not an habitual tramp class, travelling in search of work, and it has got to be considered as well as the other class, which consists purely of professional tramps. Now, this is very marked seeing that the increase in good tickets is 46 per cent. while the increase in the total number is 32 per cent.

4285. Would not that difference be accounted for probably by the fact that there had lately been a considerable stoppage of work and consequently that a large number of honest men who had been thrown out of employment would be searching for work ?—Yes. I do not know whether you quite realize what we mean in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire by a good ticket. A good ticket means a man who is travelling to his destination ; his destination having been fixed at his first appearance at a workhouse ; he wants to go 100 miles in that direction. That is put on his ticket. As long as he pursues that route it is a good ticket. And so long as he continues to travel steadily towards his destination you may really assume—at least I think so—that he is travelling for a particular purpose, and that not of vagrancy ; he is in search of work that he has heard of.

4286. You may reasonably assume that he is an honest man in search of work ?—Yes ; and I emphasise that it is necessary to consider that there is an honest class travelling as well as a purely vagrant class.

4287. I think we are fully aware of that. We have heard that in different parts of England the proportion of that class varies ?—You see our Gloucestershire system of tickets does enable us to make this discovery, and I do not know of any other method which would do so. You cannot possibly tell from what the man says himself whether he is honest or dishonest.

4288. If we had a general system of way-tickets in force all over England, do you not think it would be more easy to detect the dishonest wayfarer ?—I do not say the system is perfect or easy to work. I think it might be more difficult to work as a universal thing under an Order of the Local Government Board than it would be under our present arrangements, because you have to rely so very largely on the willingness of the people that you have to deal with in carrying out your system.

4289. Do you agree that the system should be worked as far as possible through the medium of the police ?—Yes.

4290. Of course, the workhouse masters and casual ward attendants would have to work with the police ?—The entrance to the casual ward should always be, I think, through the police. We had a very distinguished remarkable man in Gloucestershire, the late Mr. Barwick Baker, and he was always searching into this question, and it was due to him and his great influence that throughout our county the assistant relieving officer for vagrants is invariably a policeman. That you see was a point to start from. When the vagrant gets into the workhouse the difficulty is to induce the workhouse masters honestly to carry out our system, because we have got no control over them. The only control is through the boards of guardians. Well, the boards of guardians have worked very well with us, but sometimes there has been a master who has been very careless and indifferent, and things have not gone on as they should do. We have tried to get a little pressure applied. Supposing an Order of the Local Government Board required that they should do all this, I suppose that would be an assistance, and you would get uniformity. The way-ticket system originated in Berkshire, but it never got a footing there, because they could not get the unions to agree. Owing to the influence of the late Mr. Barwick Baker, the system extends all over our county. He did get all our unions to agree. The same thing occurred in Wiltshire. So we have two adjacent counties, covering a very large area of the country, who are willing to work the system, but if we had a union in the middle of the county who refused to do so the scheme would have been no use at all.

4291. As far as possible then you would be of opinion that the police and the workhouse masters should work thoroughly together?—Yes.

4292. Under such a system, if worked well, there would be a ready means of detection for the idle man; for instance, if you found a man frequently exhibiting a bad ticket, or continually varying his destination, that would be prima facie evidence against him if brought up before a magistrate?—It would be a great help to the magistrates in petty sessions in dealing with vagrants. They would have a man brought up who was ostensibly going north, but they would find he was going south.

4293. The bad ticket would be against him?—Yes; or he would have no ticket at all because, of course, tickets are largely destroyed.

4294. Then, if you had the way-ticket system in force all over the country, do you not agree that it would contribute very largely to the detection of the idle vagrant and also to the helping of the honest man?—A very important point is the discouragement of the vagrants by making vagrancy an unprofitable business. The profits of vagrants have been estimated at all sorts of figures. They are quite as good as those of an ordinary labouring man. If the vagrant is successful, he goes into the common lodging-house; if he is not successful that day, he goes into the casual ward. Well, if you can induce kind-hearted people to believe that nobody is in want of food, and that the pretence of being in want of food is false, they will cease to give, and that I think is the first cause of the great diminution in vagrancy in Gloucestershire. That is to say, we managed to convince the population to a very large extent—I do not mean to say thoroughly—that everybody was fed morning, noon, and night; consequently there was no necessity to give anything.

4295. Do you think that feeling continues?—It wants constantly waking up by leaflets; we have distributed leaflets by the thousand over the county.

4296. Still there is, I suppose, a considerable amount of almsgiving?—Yes, you cannot hope to produce perfection.

4297. Have you had many complaints of the poor people being bullied into giving food; for instance, a working-man's wife who is left at home?—I have heard of cases, but I have never had one brought before me as magistrate.

4298. Mr. Hutton told us that in Yorkshire he had a very great number of complaints of that kind?—I know it is the case to a certain extent from police reports.

4299. Have you considered the question of penal or labour colonies?—I cannot give any opinion upon that question; I should like to see the experiment tried.

4300. You think that the experiment is worth trying?—Yes. Take such an example as a case I knew of where a man was reported in my village as being in a state of the utmost destitution. I went over to see what was the matter; he was in a house which ought not to have been inhabited. He had two or three children. One of them was sitting upon the hob by way of getting warmth; there was not much fire. The only cooking utensil was an old battered tin. This was the first occasion that this family came under my notice. Relief was immediately given and some work was found for the man, but it was no good. The family were constantly in and out of our workhouse for some years, and on the last occasion when I saw anything of them they had just returned, having been out of the workhouse about two months. The children had gone out fat and well. It was no use asking the father and mother what they had been doing, so I asked the children. They said they had been down from Stroud to Bristol. I inquired, "Has your father ever done any work?" "No, done no work at all." I asked how had they lived. They had begged all the way. They had been out about two months, and then they came back with the children half starved and very dirty in time for Christmas; and that had been their life for about a couple of years before that time. Then they went on a journey to the north, and when they came back there was one child missing. We inquired about that child as we thought we could make out a case of cruelty. So far as we could ascertain the people had been as kind to their dying child as was consistent with their mode of life. Well, then, the parents got into prison, and we took advantage of the opportunity, under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act to get hold of the children and the parents have disappeared. I have seen no more of them. The children, I believe, are safe in Canada. That is the history of a tramp family, a miserable family, no good to anybody. Supposing that man and his wife had been planted on a labour colony they might have been made to do some work, and useful work.

4301. How would you make a man work in the labour colony when you get him there?—I think the punishment must be in the labour colony itself; shorten his diet, but give him better diet if he works; I believe that is the only satisfactory way. I do not believe in sending such men to prison at all.

4302. You do not think the threat of the cell would deter?—I think the prisons are rather an attraction than otherwise; there is no hard labour now.

4303. In the labour colony when you found that a man was determined not to work if he could help it, you would try to induce him to work by letting him know that if he did work he would have a better meal?—Yes, I think that would be about the only way.

4304. And you think probably it would be a good plan in the labour colony to have two different scales of diet, one for the real worker; and a lower one for the man who will not work?—Yes. You see one of the causes of vagrancy is, as I have already said, the profit of vagrancy. The profit of vagrancy depends on the amount of sympathy that these people can evoke. The moment you get an idea among the population that these men are very hardly treated, alms flow in in assistance, and they get on. I should like to quote some words of Mr. Baker's. In a lecture some time ago Colonel Curtis-Hayward said "The text we have worked upon for the last twelve years was given us by the late Mr. Barwick Baker: 'The feelings of the public, especially of the very poor, must be considered; once give the poor the impression that vagrants are ill-treated or starved and their fortune is made.' Severity has never had a good effect. In olden times the laws against vagrants were very severe, yet the country swarmed with sturdy beggars who thrived on the sympathy which the severity with which they were treated when caught excited for them." I think you should take that as a standing text. If you create the notion that you are treating the vagrant with severity, you will make their business profitable and they will pursue it.

4306. It has been suggested that you might have a penal labour colony, into which the man found guilty of being a persistent idle tramp might be put?—Yes.

4307. And another sort of colony where the man who would do work if he could get it, might go: do you think it would be worth while to have a colony of this sort?—No, I do not think so. It would be rather like the arrangements for employing the unemployed, which generally lead to not wholly satisfactory results, I think.

4308. I take it you would have the labour colony under the Home Office control?—Well, it is a question between the Local Government Board and the Home Office.

4309. But I mean if you had a labour colony to which men were committed by magistrates?—That ought to be under the Home Office.

4310. The men would have to be committed to the colony?—Certainly.

4311. You would have a local visiting committee of the labour colony?—Yes.

*Sir John
Dorington,
Bart., M.P.*

22 Mar. 1905.

4312. Would that be composed of magistrates only, or of magistrates and guardians?—I think I have rather a preference for the justices. You see the guardians would not contribute qua guardians; at least, I imagine not.

4314. Knowing as you do that it is a very costly thing to send a man, say, from one end of the county to the gaol, accompanied by a policeman, you do not think the game is worth the candle in such cases?—No, I do not think it is.

4315. And you do not think it would be in any way deterrent?—I was on the Prisons Committee of 1895, and with regard to the interior of the prisons I think our recommendation has been carried further than we contemplated. We said that there was a great objection to the tread-mill and the crank, but the question was what was to be substituted for them. If the crank and the tread-mill were abandoned, hard labour of the first class would usually be confined to picking oakum in a solitary cell, the cell itself being far superior in every way to a tramp cell, and still more so to an associated tramp ward. The tread-mill and the crank, having been done away with, there is, in my opinion, no adequate hard labour for persons under short sentences in prison. The prisons are very well conducted as regards the prisoner with a longish sentence, but I think for prisoners with a short sentence and the vagabond prisoner you have made your prison too comfortable. That hardly falls, perhaps, within the scope of your Inquiry.

4316. Do you think that in the majority of cases the short sentence has the effect that it is supposed to have?—No, I do not think it has at all.

4317. It is non-deterrent?—Yes; vagrants are distinctly better off in the prison than in the tramp ward.

4318. In the case of drunkenness, you know that the short sentence is probably the very worst thing you can give an habitual drunkard?—Yes, but it is very curious that since short sentences came into fashion the number of re-convictions of first offenders has not increased in proportion.

4319. But I mean that either with a view to reform or as a deterrent the short sentence is ineffectual?—You have got to look at those things in a general way to see what the general effect is, and although I agree with you that short sentences in the case of habitual drunkards are of no use, yet as a matter of fact a very small proportion of these persons who are first convicted return again, and the percentage is not increasing or materially increasing. If you look at page 10 of the Report of the Prison Commissioners you will see that of the committals for the first time, usually for short terms, only 29 per cent. are again convicted. Of those convicted a second time, 48 per cent. are convicted a third time; and when you get above that, why, they are constantly being convicted again.

4320. Now, as regards a man convicted before petty sessions for being a tramp and begging, what would you do with him?—You have nothing else to do but send him to prison.

4321. Would you advise that the convictions should be recorded against that man and his description taken and so on, with a view to his receiving a longer imprisonment after two or three convictions?—The convictions are recorded now, I think. The sentence should be lengthened in proportion to the number of convictions. I do not think I should like to keep a vagrant in prison very long, but if you have got a labour colony available he should be sent there. Under the present state of the law, you could not seriously lengthen imprisonment for vagrancy.

4322. Instead of giving short sentences of a few days, which appear to be useless, would you begin with a longer sentence, say fourteen days?—Oh, you cannot make the magistrate give it.

4323. Not unless you do away with the short sentence by statute?—That is another question altogether; then you do away with the discretion of the justices.

4324. Yes?—I do not think you should do away with the discretion of the justices. Cases arise where the discretion might be properly used; I do not mean vagrancy cases.

4325. I was referring to vagrancy cases only?—I should be very loth to introduce a new principle of leaving justices with no discretion.

4326. (Mr. Davy.) Would you have any objection to the justices in aggravated cases not sentencing, but convicting and remitting to quarter sessions for sentence, as is now done under the Vagrancy Act?—I should have no objection to that.

4327. Would not that, to a certain extent, solve the difficulty with regard to short sentences?—Yes, I think it would show we did not deal with those cases; it would add rather to the solemnity.

4328. Yes, and would avoid the necessity of allowing petty sessions to send a man for a long imprisonment?—Yes.

4329. We have evidence that in the county of Hereford very few of the regulations are carried out by the boards of guardians; do you think that has any effect on your tramps?—I think at first it induced all our tramps to go to Herefordshire. Of course, their system encourages the production of vagrants; therefore, it increases the production of the vagrants all over the country.

4330. And that would be a reason for the universal application of the way-ticket system?—Yes.

4331. Well, as I gather, in Gloucestershire the numbers on the first introduction of the system fell rapidly?—Very much.

4332. And now they have increased to something very much like their former level?—Yes.

4333. In Gloucestershire you still think the system is satisfactory?—Yes, I think so.

4334. There is no talk of giving it up?—No. I think it was clearly proved that we get great advantage from the system, and the fact that the vagrants have gone up again so much is largely due to the present condition of the employment of labour.

4335. One of the main advantages of the system is that you secure the co-operation of the police?—Yes.

4336. And you do something to stop indiscriminate almsgiving?—Yes, that is the important point.

4337. We have had a good deal of evidence to the effect that it is very necessary that the treatment in casual wards should be uniform?—Yes.

4338. Is it uniform as a matter of practice in the Gloucestershire unions?—No, some have got cells and some have not.

4339. Do they all detain two days?—No, it is very irregular; it depends partly upon their accommodation, partly upon the temper of the master of the workhouse; and that is where you want, I think, an Order of the Local Government Board.

4340. It has been suggested that a way of securing uniformity would be to put all the vagrant wards under one authority, namely, the police; to take the control away from the boards of guardians and give it to the police?—Then you would have to deal with the feeding question, which I think the police are not well suited to carry out.

4341. That would be an administrative difficulty?—Yes. I think you would do better to leave the wards under the guardians with an Order from the Local Government Board.

4342. To enforce that Order, would not a considerable amount of centralization be necessary?—The Order would make regulations for workhouse masters.

4343. It has been suggested that the only way of getting uniformity in detention would be to provide that everybody should be detained with the exception of, perhaps, persons with a good ticket?—Yes; when the Casual Poor Act was introduced, which was about the time that we were starting our system, I thought that the good ticket man would always be started on his way as early as possible in the morning, while the others would all be detained two days; but that system has never got into vogue.

4344. Because of the difficulty of detaining two days?—Partly in consequence of the difficulty of detaining two days, and partly owing to the impossibility of getting all boards of guardians and all workhouse masters to agree. We have got no power to compel them to detain.

4345. Supposing that the Local Government Board were to issue an Order that no one was to be discharged the next morning unless he had a good ticket, and that all others were to be detained two nights, and that no discretion would be left to the workhouse master; that would make uniform detention easier, would it not?—A great deal easier. The difficulty is that a great many workhouses have not got space enough to accommodate their vagrants two nights. For instance, we are suffering in well appointed workhouses in Gloucestershire from this great increase of vagrants, which has outgrown the normal provision which had been adequate.

4346. That brings me to my next point. The number of tramps is dependent rather on the situation of the vagrant wards with regard to the line of route across the country, is it not?—Yes, certain unions have a preferential treatment.

4347. So that a very poor country union might have a very large number of tramps?—Yes, it might.

4348. Do you think it would be fair to impose on the ratepayers of that union the cost of building new tramp wards for the benefit generally of a county?—No, I think you might possibly throw that upon the county rate.

4349. Some financial adjustment would be necessary, would it not?—Yes; if you were to carry out a uniform system, it would not be fair to every union.

4350. We have had evidence to show that some of the tramp wards in the country are unnecessary; they are too close to one another; I do not know whether that is the case in Gloucestershire now?—I should not have thought that; although they may be rather near, they would not provide accommodation beyond what is required, I should think.

4351. Any way it is suggested that certain tramp wards might be closed?—I doubt that.

4352. If they were closed, it would render some financial adjustment even more necessary?—Yes; I cannot quite present to myself the case that you are putting to me. Practically wherever there is a workhouse, and the workhouses are not very thick you know, you must have provision for the casual wayfarer, it seems to me.

4353. We heard that in Birmingham there were 10 casual wards within a radius of 18 miles?—Where you get a great urban population that might be the case.

4354. It has been suggested that the tramp wards should be more or less put under the control of the standing joint committee, who should have the power of inspection and possibly of the payment of a grant on certain conditions being fulfilled?—I would rather not introduce another complication of the system; I would rather leave that to the boards of guardians and not bring a third party into the matter. Although possibly you might allow a charge to be made on the county fund where the thing was in the general interest and not in the particular interest of the union, but I would not introduce a third party into the management.

4355. That is to say in your opinion the wards ought still to be under the control of the boards of guardians?—Yes.

4356. And that uniformity should be secured by more stringent Orders of the Local Government Board?—Yes. I think great practical difficulties would arise if you were to put the wards under another authority. See how frequently a person in the casual ward has to be transferred to the infirmary ward of the workhouse, or take the sudden and urgent non-settled case applying for relief.

4357. But even in the way of the more stringent Order of the Local Government Board there would be practical difficulties, would there not; recalcitrant guardians and slack masters?—Yes, but the Orders have great effect. Oh, I think you would be able to carry it out; with the help of the Inspectors, I think you would get round that corner.

4358. (Mr. Simpson.) Do you think it would be possible to get a joint committee of the guardians of a county to manage casual wards, each board of guardians dealing with their workhouse, but the joint committee of all the guardians dealing with all the casual wards together?—I think that might be practicable.

4359. A joint committee like that would tend towards uniformity of management, would it not?—Yes, I think that might be a very good idea.

4360. (Mr. Davy.) Now, as to the honest wayfarer; do you think the State or the local authority should be held responsible for helping a wayfarer towards his work?—No, I do not.

4361. But we have to deal with the wayfarer?—Yes.

4362. Because of public prejudice or public opinion in his favour?—Yes, I think we do as much under this scheme as can be done advisedly. You cannot find out the honest wayfarer except by some such method as this. You know after he has passed to his destination that he has travelled honestly and intended to travel honestly, but you cannot tell beforehand.

4363. The honest wayfarer is the excuse for a good deal of laxity in enforcing the regulations?—Oh, yes.

4364. And therefore, we must deal with him?—You must consider him. But I certainly would not be in favour of making an offer to a person who comes to me and says "I am an honest wayfarer, give me a railway ticket to Cardiff."

4365. We had better leave that to the trades unions and other organisations of that sort?—Yes. Take the case of the sailors that Admiral Christian mentioned; I have often heard of it; the sailor on being discharged on the Thames or at Cardiff has a good amount of money which he immediately gets rid of, and then he starts for a ship at Cardiff; or, if he is at Cardiff, for a ship on the Thames, and he walks from the one place to the other. To a certain extent he is an honest wayfarer. Why he travels such a distance I do not know, but he does; you cannot tell what his motives are, why he gets rid of all his means and then undertakes a laborious journey in order to get to a place where he does the same sort of work that there is plenty of where he starts from.

4366. (Chairman.) It is exactly the same thing with a navy?—Yes.

4367. A navy almost invariably gets rid of what he has earned before he goes on tramp again?—Yes.

4368. (Mr. Davy.) At all events it would be inexpedient to admit that that man had any claim on the State or anybody else?—I think it would be very inexpedient.

4369. Logic, I think, would say you ought not to help him?—But human nature would say you produce lesser evils by helping him than by leaving him alone.

4370. Now with regard to labour colonies, they would be intended partly as a deterrent to the sturdy beggar?—Yes.

4371. And partly as a relief to the destitute wanderer who had wandered to his own hurt?—Yes, it would clear the country of that particular class. I do not say it is going to answer, but I should like to see the experiment tried. I would not try it as a great State thing all over the country; I would make a small experiment. I think all useful things of that class start by an experiment. Reformatories started with a very small experiment carried out by a private person.

4372. And, as the man's liberty is taken away, the proper person to look after him is the Home Office?—Yes, I think so.

4373. The Home Office should try these experiments?—Yes.

4374. (Mr. Simpson.) But do you not think it would answer equally well if a private person, or even the local authorities tried the experiment, subject to such supervision by the Home Office as to prevent it being unduly severe on the man?—You see, you could not carry on that experiment without statutory power, because you could not get the people or control them. You must begin by an Act of Parliament. The reformatory began by the Home Office exercising its power and letting certain people out of prison to be held by somebody else instead of the prison authorities. That was how the reformatory experiment was tried. I do not know how you could try this experiment without statutory power.

4375. The reformatory school and the industrial school are both under private management, but are inspected by the Home Office?—Yes.

*Sir John
Dorington,
Bart., M.P.*

22 Mar. 1905.

4376. Do you not think the same sort of system would be applicable to a labour colony?—Yes, I think it might be.

4377. Experiments by the State are apt to be very expensive?—I think if you got statutory power you would probably get some volunteers who would undertake to try the experiment.

4378. Do you not think that it is quite possible that some local authorities might have among their members energetic and practical men who would be ready to try the experiment, so that power might be given to a local authority to try it under inspection by the Government?—I think you would be almost sure to find some people of that class.

4379. Because you see if the duty of trying the experiment were thrown on the Home Office or any of the Government Departments they would feel bound to do it, though they might not have any man who was of sufficient experience to do it well?—I do not think the Home Office is particularly well qualified to undertake the experiment.

4380. Have you any opinion upon the question of the relation between vagrancy and crime; do you get many vagrants at quarter sessions for crime?—No, not serious crime.

4381. Not serious crime?—No; of course, there is occasionally a criminal who is considered a vagrant, but he is more criminal than vagrant. The ordinary vagrant class is not very criminal, I think.

4382. Well, the Home Office have made inquiry as to the matter of bail and find that the magistrates all over the country are anxious to take advantage of the Bail Act, and let a man off on his own recognizance pending trial, but they rarely get an opportunity of doing so. So far as we can make out, a very large number of people have no settled homes. That rather points to a considerable number of people committed to quarter sessions being really vagrants. Have you had any experience on that point?—I think that is so; you cannot get any adequate bail. I do not know that they are so much vagrants as they are persons whom no one would trust under any circumstances although well known. I do not think you must assume they are vagrants. It would not be very difficult for the governor of a prison to look that matter up and see what proportion it was, but my impression is that the people are well known but that no one will trust them.

4383. (Sir William Chance.) It seems to me from your evidence that a weak point of the Gloucestershire way-ticket system is that the masters of workhouses and boards of guardians do not always carry out the rule as to detention in the case of bad tickets?—Yes, it simply depends upon their good will.

4384. The idea, I suppose, of your committee would be that if a man loses his ticket, then the punishment for so doing, before he gets another ticket, would be the two nights' detention and a day's work?—Yes.

4385. That is the system which is carried out?—That is the theory.

4386. That would be the penalty?—Yes.

4387. And you consider that would be a deterrent; that the man would possibly be more careful of his new ticket when he received it, after his two nights' detention?—They do not lose their tickets; it is that they have not got their tickets.

4388. Your idea is that he is to be punished for not having his ticket?—I say the ordinary vagrant is to be detained two nights. That was the original idea of the Casual Poor Act. You might trust him for the first day, and you might say "You are bound fifteen or sixteen miles in a certain direction; if you turn up with this ticket, you will be detained only one night; if you do not turn up, you will get two nights at the next place."

4389. I just wanted to get that out?—It is a system which you must exercise with a good deal of common-sense; it wants a little common-sense added to the rules, you may say.

4390. But common-sense varies, does it not?—Oh, very much.

4391. You apparently would recommend that some system of way-ticket should be employed universally in this country?—Yes; I think this system is the nearest approach that has ever been made to a workable and useful system.

4392. Well, supposing it is made universal for the whole of England instead of the whole of Gloucestershire. A man wants to start from one place; from whom is he to get his ticket in the first instance?—I should not let him start from anywhere except the casual ward.

4393. You would not recommend yourself that the man should have to go to a police station; that is done in Gloucestershire, you know?—But then it is always in order to get into the casual ward.

4394. You think a fresh ticket should always be issued at each casual ward?—I should issue the ticket from the casual ward; I think that is a better way than issuing it from the police station. When we first started, the tickets were issued from the workhouse, but probably it was found too troublesome for the workhouse masters, so the police do it.

4395. You would prefer that the police should have little to do with vagrants except as assistant relieving officers?—Yes, but I think they should be brought into contact with the police, inasmuch as if they want assistance they should go to the police and be sent to the casual ward. That enables the police to know who are tramping; it brings them into touch, and they are much more accessible than the relieving officer.

4396. I do not quite see why you object to the police giving the way-ticket or pass ticket in the first instance; however, that is your view?—Yes.

4397. (Mr. Simpson.) Is not your view that the vagrants go to the police in their capacity of assistant relieving officers and not as police?—Yes.

4398. You think it is a good system that the assistant relieving officers should be policemen as they are in Gloucestershire?—I think it is very desirable.

4399. (Sir William Chance.) You do not deal in any way with the wayfarers at common lodging-houses?—No, we cannot touch them.

4400. Do you think it desirable to extend the ticket system generally to all wayfarers whether they go to common lodging-houses or casual wards?—No, I think not.

4401. You do not think they should have a bed in the common lodging-house if they choose, in preference to the casual ward?—No. If the casual wards are full the police send them now to the common lodging-houses; they would come under the benefit of the system, but only in that case.

4402. (Chairman.) They would get their bread tickets, I take it?—They would in that case get their bread tickets.

4403. (Sir William Chance.) But you would not treat common lodging-houses the same as casual wards?—No.

4404. Nor give the man the option of going to a common lodging-house?—No. We recognise the common lodging-houses now by inspecting them, but I would not recognise them as licenced for wayfarers.

4405. The mid-day meal would not apply to people using the common lodging-houses, except in case where the casual ward was too full and the man was sent to the common lodging-house?—The inference is that the man who comes to the common lodging-house has means.

4406. We have had evidence that it is not always the case?—I do not suppose that it is always the case.

4407. Many people who go to the casual ward have means?—Well, they are not supposed to have means.

4408. No, but we know they have?—Yes.

4409. Do you think the allowance for the mid-day meal is sufficient. We have had evidence that the amount given is not put on the ticket because otherwise charitable people would think it too little, and it would not stop the giving. Do you think the mid-day meal should be made a little better?—No; I attach myself to Colonel Curtis-Hayward who thinks it sufficient. You see we diminished the allowance of bread in Gloucestershire, because it was found we were giving too much, more than was practically necessary.

4410. What is your opinion on the question of child vagrancy?—Well, I would not allow tramps to carry families of children about with them. I would separate these children as soon as I possibly could.

4411. How would you do that?—The only way would be to add to the existing law, that where a vagrant has travelled with his family and has been found in the course of six months a certain number of times in vagrant wards, it should be legal to separate the children.

4412. Where you can prove the man to be an habitual vagrant then you might have the power to take the children away?—To take the children away, yes; I think it would be a very humane line of legislation.

4413. That would work in with the labour colony you spoke of: you would put the parent in a labour colony?—Yes; but even if you do not have a labour colony, I would not allow families to be dragged about with habitual vagrants.

4414. What would you do with the children when you have taken them away; would you put them into an industrial school?—First of all, they would enter the workhouse, where they would be sent to the ordinary elementary school; they would be treated as orphans, which should legally be the case. Arrangements would be made for their emigration or for boarding them out. In our country unions there is no difficulty in finding suitable homes for the children who are cut off from their parents.

4415. These children, you see, belong to no union at all; how about defraying the cost. Do you not think boards of guardians would kick very much at having to pay for children who do not belong to their union?—Yes, it is a question of rates.

4416. Do you not think it would be better to deal with them if necessary, under an amendment of the Industrial Schools Act than under the Poor Law?—Under the Industrial Schools Act, you get contributions from boards of guardians as well as from parents.

4417. But you have to prove that the child belongs to the union?—That is so.

4418. Does it not come to this, that you would have to make the education of these children in some way a national charge?—Yes, probably that would be the best way, though if you make it a national charge you get rid of the enormous amount of human sympathy which is always capable of being evolved. In every district good ladies take up these cases; and they know far better than officials how to do it, and they have more avenues to get the children out.

4419. Do you think that the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children would take charge of the children?—Well, to a considerable extent they would. They would be applied to, and they would do it through their agencies.

4420. You recognise that the question is a very difficult one?—I recognise it is a difficult question, but I should avoid official management as much as I could for that purpose. I mean to say, I would not make it the duty of the Home Office to put out all these children.

4421. (Dr. Downes.) It has been suggested elsewhere that the way-ticket might be used as an excuse for begging?—The Gloucestershire one cannot be; you see that is the advantage it has over the one that there was in Dorsetshire, which did entitle a man to travel. Ours only allows a man to travel along one road; he is not to be put off that road.

4422. If the way-ticket were made like a testimonial of character, that danger might arise?—Oh, undoubtedly it is very dangerous.

4423. And there might also be the danger of the bartering or the sale of the tickets from one tramp to another?—Well, you see, that is to some extent guarded against by description, but of course any approximation to what you are suggesting would be a serious abuse and a danger.

4424. It is a danger that you have guarded against?—It is a danger we have guarded against; I do not think we have had it in our country.

4425. It was suggested by one witness that a bona fide wayfarer wishing to go from, say, Sheffield to Swansea, where work was known to be waiting for him, should be started by the guardians at Sheffield, and that the cost of his maintenance, as he passed from stage to stage of his way, should be paid by them as the initiating authority. I merely mention that to you to ask you whether you think it would be practicable?—It would involve an immense amount of accounting and would be very difficult to work.

4426. It would mean the recovery of a great number of small sums from a great number of unions?—Yes. We have raised all our money by voluntary subscriptions. It does not come to very much; about £70 a year in our county.

4427. I understood you to say just now that you thought it would be desirable that the cost of providing tramp wards should be a county charge; would you extend that to maintenance of the tramp?—I should not like to answer that question off-hand; it wants a good deal of consideration. Of course, it looks at first sight as if it should be a common charge on the county; these vagrants do not belong to any particular union, and you may get hard cases. On the other hand, when you make a general charge you are apt to get extravagance, and you have got to trace your line between these two points. I am not prepared to answer that question decidedly.

4428. With regard to the mode of compelling a man to work in a labour colony, do you think it would help if a very plain diet were provided as the diet of the colony, with power to earn additions or improvements to it?—I think anything of that kind would be good.

4429. It might possibly need close supervision to prevent bullying?—The diet required for a man at hard work must be a better diet than for a man who is not doing much work. A case came under my notice the other day in visiting the prison. A number of convicts had lately been transferred from Dartmoor to our prison; of course, at Dartmoor this particular man was doing very hard work quarrying, and he had a very generous diet. When he came to our prison he was not doing any hard work at all, and he complained bitterly that towards the end of his sentence—he was drawing near the end of his sentence—with a decent character, he was deprived of these little comforts he had had at Dartmoor in the shape of superior diet; he had come down to the inferior scale. I give you that as an illustration of what happens about diets.

4430. You gave an example of a family who were at one time vagrants and at other times squatting in the union?—Yes.

4431. They almost belong to the in-and-out class of the workhouse. Would you extend whatever remedy is provided for vagrancy to the in-and-out class?—Well, you see in this particular case the man was really a vagrant; although he was settled in our union his vagrancy extended into Shropshire and down to Bristol.

4432. A sort of circuit?—He was on his travels always; but there is the in-and-out class which belong to the union itself. No, I do not think you must mix them up with that class.

4433. As regards the suggestion that the local authority might try the experiment of the labour colony, if the local authority means guardians, do you not think it would be objectionable to give powers of deprivation of liberty, or supervision of people who are deprived of their liberty, to any authority which was not under the Home Office?—I was referring just now to the way in which the reformatory movement was originated, which was done by an experiment authorised by and under the inspection of the Home Office, which did not require statutory power because they had the people in prison to begin with; but here you have to begin by getting statutory power to put the people into this condition of confinement. You have to begin in that way; and then try if you can get anybody, either local authority or anybody else, to carry out the experiment for you.

4434. But it should be under the control of the Home Office?—It must be under the control of the Home Office, certainly.

4435. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) You compared the casual ward and the prison; the prison, you said, was more attractive than the casual ward?—Yes, I think it is.

4436. How would you redress the balance; would you bring the prison down to the level of the casual ward?—

*Sir John
Dorington,
Bart., M.P.*

22 Mar. 1905.

Sir John Dorington, Bart., M.P. No. Well, I do not know that I am entitled to say so, but I think the prison authorities made a great mistake in abolishing all forms of hard labour in prison.

22 Mar. 1905. 4437. It is only on the point of labour?—It is only on the point of labour; there is no labour for short-sentence prisoners which is at all serious. They are put into a comfortable warm cell and they pick a certain quantity of oakum.

4438. There are other industries of first class hard labour, stone breaking and wood sawing, which are done in prisons in the first stages?—It is not done in my prison; the wood sawing is all done in association, I think; but it is all done in the second period.

4439. It is a fact that the stone breaking and wood sawing are done in separation as first-class hard labour?—It may be.

4440. Mr. Gladstone's Committee was strongly against the tread mill as undesirable and mischievous?—They said it should be removed when any substitute could be found.

4441. "Wherever possible," was the phrase that was used?—I have the exact phrase here.

4442. It is extended over two or three paragraphs—"It should be removed wherever possible," it rather hedges, I must confess?—It was intended to hedge.

4443. The question is, what should be substituted for it. It is only the question of labour, you think?—It is only the question of labour; I think the prisons are admirably managed.

4444. And the only point you disagree with is the matter of labour?—Yes, they carry it too far.

4445. The question of the substitutes which have been introduced is only a matter of opinion?—Well, I take the opinion of the tramps, which is that it is a holiday.

4446. You agree with me that vagrancy is a disease like drunkenness that wants special treatment?—I agree entirely.

4447. (Mr. Davy.) With regard to the way-ticket system, would you search a man in the casual ward who has a good ticket?—No, I think not. It is quite certain that if he has travelled his allotted journey, he has not had much time to beg, or to rob, or to do anything else; you may assume that if he travels on his correct line of route he is a well-doing wayfarer; I would not say "well-doing," but an honest wayfarer.

4448. He might have had time to contract smallpox?—That is another thing.

4449. The search and the bath?—I think he ought to be bathed and looked after just the same as the others. I would not offensively search a man who has got a good ticket.

4450. In the admirable statistics issued by the chief constable of Gloucestershire it is shown that about 25 per cent. only of the tramps frequent workhouses?—Yes.

4451. So that about 75 per cent. of the tramps are lodging-house tramps?—Yes.

4452. They are excluded from the benefit of the mid-day meal?—Yes.

MR. J. G. LEGGE, called; and Examined.

Mr. J. G. Legge. 4465. (Chairman.) Mr. Legge, you are the Inspector of the reformatory and industrial schools?—Yes.

22 Mar. 1905. 4466. How long have you held that post?—Ten years now.

4467. You have kindly come to-day to give evidence from your experience with regard to the children of vagrants. We have heard from a good many of the witnesses that the proportion of children to adult vagrants is very small; what is your opinion on that point?—On that I can hardly give an opinion. I should be surprised prima facie to learn that it was very small, though I should be quite prepared to hear that it is not so much as is imagined by some people, but still the fact would rather agree with the small number of such children that there are in industrial schools.

4468. The number of vagrant children in industrial schools is small?—Yes, only a small percentage of the 4453. Do they, as a matter of fact, make that a pretext for begging?—They may do so; but presumably the man who goes to the common lodging-house has got some means somehow or other by begging. Well, we want to stop the begging, and the magistrates can enforce the vagrancy laws. They know that if he is really very hard up he has gone to the workhouse, got a good ticket and he is on his journey; but the pure vagrant you want to stop.

4454. Anyway, you have not found that a flaw in the system practically?—No, I think the chief constable said one or two lodging-houses had been shut up.

4455. If a man is committed to prison for seven days, that means five days, does it not?—Yes.

4456. And supposing he refuses to work during those five days, is there any means of punishing him?—He gets less diet.

4457. It has been suggested as a means of securing uniformity that vagrant wards that carry out all the regulations should be entitled to a grant say of 5d. a day for each vagrant, payable by the county on the certificate of either the standing joint committee or the Local Government Board. Do you think there is any possibility of working that out?—It might induce them to carry out the regulations more strictly by giving the county the oversight. It really would not affect the rate very much; it is very curious how very uniform is the charge for vagrants all over the country.

4458. It would simply mean a transfer of the charge from one to another?—Yes.

4459. And it would be an inducement to the guardians to observe the regulations?—Yes, and it would penalise any boards of guardians that did not, for the cost would then fall on the local rates.

4460. And it is suggested that the standing joint committee, say, should be able to address a complaint to the Local Government Board that such a union is not carrying out certain of the regulations, such as the two days' detention?—The standing joint committee is not a rating authority; it must either be the quarter sessions or the county council.

4461. No, but it is the authority that has to do with the criminal class and the police?—Yes. It is a new question to me; I do not want to give an absolute answer.

4462. I wished to put it to you because it is a matter for consideration?—Well, I think it would be advantageous if a central controlling authority was in existence which had power to contribute out of the common fund, and to stop the common fund if they did not get obedience.

4463. The difficulties of securing uniformity are very great?—Oh, yes.

4464. (Chairman.) I think that both in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire there is a county vagrancy committee. Do you find that this committee is very advantageous in connection with the working of the way-ticket system?—Well, practically, I think, the vagrancy committee is one gentleman in each county who works the system with the aid of a sympathetic chief constable.

various classes of committed children who are admitted as inmates.

4469. As to the vagrant children who are admitted to industrial and reformatory schools, how does their mental condition compare with that of the other children?—I raised that question and asked it of thirty-two schools in the country likely to have experience of such cases—I mean schools to which children committed in the rural districts would be sent, and I got replies from thirty on the point; and of those thirty replies, eighteen were distinctly of opinion that the tramp children were below the average in mental capacity; seven described them as up to the average; and only five out of the thirty thought they were brighter than the average children.

4470. Well, naturally, children who have lived a tramp life would have had very little education?—Yes, but the point was not their scholastic attainments, but the natural qualities of sharpness and so on.

4471. Were they healthy children?—I did not ask that definite question, but I am pretty confident from what I have seen of such cases in the schools that they would prove to be undersized.

4472. They would be undersized probably because underfed?—Underfed, and too much subjected to exposure and so on. I might add to what I said just now that, as regards their capacity for training in work, the proportions came out rather better than as regards their mental capacity in the school.

4473. You mean they turn out better in the end?—No, they found that once they had got the children in the school they took to the training in the shops and on the land better than they did to the training in the school-room, though even there the majority of schools did not think them up to the average of children.

4474. But I gather from what you say that they are, as a rule, children willing to work?—No, they were more willing to work on the land and in the shops than they were in the school-room.

4475. That would be probably in consequence of their outdoor life?—Yes, no doubt.

4476. Now, so far as your experience goes, how do these children turn out; do they turn out better or worse than the majority of the inmates of the schools?—They do not turn out quite as well as the average child committed to the industrial school or reformatory; but they do turn out surprisingly well.

4477. Do they seem to have less inclination than other children to take to indoor labour?—Yes, but I shall go further than saying indoor labour; they seem less inclined to take to any settled occupation, indoor or outdoor.

4478. To learn any trade?—To learn any trade; I do not find that they are more backward than others in coming under discipline. That is to say, they seem to be quite as ready to enter the Navy or the Army; and the proportion of them who take to music is not small.

4479. Do you find that the case in some parts of England more than others?—No, I have not been able to draw any distinction in that regard.

4480. The children that you have to do with are all committed to the schools by magistrates?—Yes, though some of the schools do receive voluntary cases as well, but practically you may take it that all that I have spoken of are committed cases.

4481. Is there at present any spare accommodation in the reformatory and industrial schools?—The reformatories are pretty full, though there is always some room in them, but there is at this moment a great deal of room in the industrial schools.

4482. To what do you attribute that?—I attribute that to the passing of the recent Education Act which has changed the machinery of local administration in regard to the Industrial Schools Acts. The new education authorities have taken the place of the school boards. They have not found their feet yet, and so there has been a lull in working the Industrial Schools Acts.

4483. Do you think that there is a certain number of children who ought to have been committed, but owing to the change of authority they have not yet been sent to those schools?—I do. I am confident that there is a number of children who slip through the meshes of the law, who would have been caught had the old order not been disturbed. It will work round to the same state in a few years.

4484. We have been told that in many cases the male vagrants go into the casual wards while the wives and children use the common lodging-houses; has your experience borne that out?—I have no knowledge of that.

4485. With regard to tramp children in industrial schools, do you think that a good proportion have turned out well?—I think the general results are very satisfactory. I got definite information on the point with regard to children more or less recently discharged from twenty-three schools, and in the case of sixteen (most of which were extremely good schools and whose figures I should be quite prepared to accept) it was claimed that two-thirds of the children who had been sent out had been kept separated from their old associations on discharge, and were really settling down to fixed occupations. I have here a return from one particular school showing the thing more in detail. (Return handed in—see Appendix XXXVI).

4486. (Mr. Simpson.) I suppose we may take it that, if these children had not been sent to the schools, practically all of them would have led an unsatisfactory life?—You might take it that every single one would have led a life-long existence between the casual ward and the prison.

4487. (Chairman.) I suppose all the boys in an industrial school are boys who you may say are taken out of the atmosphere of temptation, and at any rate have the chance given them of earning an honest livelihood?—Yes; the difficulty of course is to keep them away from their old associations when the time comes for their going out again.

4488. Do many of the parents or the people with whom they have been living seem to wish to get hold of them when they come out of the schools?—All of them.

4489. They do?—Practically all clamour to get them.

4490. And then do the boys want to go back, or do they prefer to lead a more decent life?—Well, it is extraordinary what success the school authorities have in keeping them from their parents.

4491. In keeping them away?—Of course they have the advantage of having supervision over them till they are eighteen, so that from the period from sixteen till eighteen, if the managers have backbone enough to fight the parents, and possibly public opinion, which very foolishly often supports the parents, well then they can win in the end; and in my experience of late years, it is remarkable that the more that is done for a boy, the better he is turned out as regards his education, his industrial training and so on, the more likely he is himself to be rather shocked by his parents' manner of life.

4492. A decent life in an industrial school makes the other life distasteful to him?—Yes; in fact he has got an ambition which enables him to rise above his old life.

4493. No doubt he has heard of the good things that have been done by other boys who have left that industrial school?—Precisely so.

4494. That has set him a good example?—Yes, he is anxious to improve his position in the world.

4495. With regard to the children of that special class of vagrants, viz. tinkers, gipsies, and that sort of people, who are received into the industrial schools, how do they turn out?—The number of those, so far as I have been able to ascertain, is very small indeed, almost infinitesimal. I have learned a few words of Romany myself, and have amused myself by trying them with cases that I think may be possibly Romany, and I can only swear, in the last four years, to having run across three, and they were in Scotland; at least they were the only three who seemed to understand my remarks in the lingo. But everyone practically with whom I have discussed them, says that with them you cannot hope to do anything.

4496. No?—Because in their case it is change of nature which is required, whereas in the case of the vagrant it is merely a change of habit.

4497. It is much more difficult to deal with the child who has been brought up in that absolutely wild life, living in tents, and so on?—But I mean by Romany the real race with the eastern strain in them, and three of them undoubtedly I ran across, two in Perth and one in Dundee.

4498. Not in the Cumberland district?—No, but I am not surprised that the Cumberland schools seem to have had rather more of the vagrant children than most; they admit to having twelve tramp children at this moment. On the other hand Durham has very few; at the Durham school they have only two tramp children in their numbers as against twelve at Cockermouth.

4499. Then I take it that you are of opinion that a vagrant child has a better chance of growing up an honest man by being sent to an industrial school, than by any other means of treatment that you are aware of?—Yes. It seems to me the most practicable way of dealing with him. Adoption in a good household is all very well, but then there are the mechanical difficulties of keeping hold of the child in a private family, and of finding the foster parent.

4500. The boy has a very regular life, wholesome food, and he is taught a trade?—Yes; and generally his all round education for his class will stand comparison with any given in the country.

4501. So that the vagrant child who gets into an industrial school has the best chance he can have?—The training they get in the best class of institution is undoubtedly good for so undisciplined a class.

4502. What is the total number of vagrant children in industrial schools?—I confined my inquiries to the thirty-two schools in England and Scotland, likely to have such children, as distinguished, I may say, from the street arab of the town, and the population at this moment of the thirty-two schools amounts to 3,000 boys and 600 girls. Of these, 139 boys and 52 girls are known to be the children of persons who may be described as tinkers, gipsies, tramps, or habitual vagrants.

4503. A very small proportion out of the total?—Quite a small proportion.

4504. (Mr. Simpson.) You are speaking of industrial schools, not reformatories, I understand?—Yes.

4505. (Chairman.) Have you similar figures for reformatories?—In the case of reformatories, of course, one is dealing with children who are committed under the Vagrancy Act for either begging or sleeping out—not for being found wandering merely—and I find that the total number that have been turned out of the schools during the past five years in such cases comes to 343.

4506. Out of how many?—Out of about 4,000; there were 308 boys and 35 girls.

4507. There again it is a very small proportion?—Quite small. The immense majority of boys and girls sent to reformatories are sent for larceny.

4508. Do you think one might conclude from that that the children of the vagrants are, as a rule, not criminal?—I do not think you can draw that conclusion, because amongst those who are sent for larceny, there may be a number of vagrants.

4509. You can argue better from the industrial schools than from the reformatories?—Yes, in the case of the reformatories, I have no doubt, many a boy is sent for stealing chickens and that sort of thing, who might have been otherwise committed for sleeping out.

4510. Have you formed any opinion with regard to labour colonies?—I have a very strong opinion about labour colonies. I am bound to say that as regards the labour colonies, properly so called, it is simply derived from the reading of articles and papers and so on. I have been struck by the analogy between the colonies, which claim to be successful, and the schools under my own inspection, many of which might be described as labour colonies; and I have been astonished at the success with which they carry on their work—I mean to say, from the financial point of view.

4511. Would your idea of a labour colony be something very much like an industrial school, only for adults instead of for boys?—Rather something like a reformatory school. I believe such a reformatory school as you are manager of in the north of England, a school planted out in rather a desolate piece of country, bringing a large tract of it under cultivation, and serving all the farmers round, not only with labour but also with appliances for the repair of their farm machinery, would be a good model.

4512. Do you think, then, that in the case of a labour colony, if you buy or hire a sufficient amount of land in a thoroughly agricultural district, and cultivate that by spade or other labour, the colony might be made self-supporting to a considerable extent?—Well, hardly self-supporting, but still I am not at all surprised by the figures given of the Belgian colony at Merxplas. I think they claim to do it for less than £10 per head. They can make their money at a school or colony by acting as a reservoir for labour for all the farmers round;

by carrying on a wheelwright's and blacksmith's business for a radius, I suppose, of three miles round the place. Any farmer could wheel his gear that is out of order up to the colony, and get it done for him. They should charge trade prices, and it would be a great blow to the district if the colony once started were shut up.

4513. Would there be any complaint, that the school or colony is taking away labour from other hands?—No; I think some of the farmers round would be very frank in their expressions of opinion, that they simply could not do without that help, that the tenure of their farms would be materially affected.

4514. Your idea is that you might have an adult labour colony which might be made useful in other ways besides cultivation of ground?—Yes. They must have shops, I would say; because I think one important thing is to use up as much of your own labour as you can, and not interfere with the outside more than you can help; not try and force more of your own products on the public than the public will assimilate readily. Of course, a great deal of the labour at some reformatories is used for their own purposes; in fact, they use the wool from their own sheep for the clothing of the boys, make their own boots, grow their own food, &c.

4515. On the whole you are inclined to think that the experiment of the labour colony would be well worth trying?—Yes.

4516. That you might deal in that way with some of the vagrants whom it would be very difficult to deal with otherwise?—I think it would be a very much easier job than is popularly supposed, if you get the right man; it all depends on getting the right man as manager.

4517. A good working staff, I suppose, is most important?—You want a good man at the top; and I might add that a man not too high up in the social scale is what is wanted, a practical man.

4518. (Mr. Davy.) You give returns of vagrant children in those schools; is it possible to draw a sharp line between the vagrant children and the other children there?—Yes; when they come in.

4519. It would be as to the mode of their coming in, would it not?—No; the appearance of them; one can tell at a glance the boy who is sent for sneaking a watch and so on, in a town, and a boy who is simply sent in because he is tramping the country side without any visible means of subsistence and sleeping in a ditch. In fact that class do not know how to lie in a bed; that is one of the first things to be taught them; they are afraid of falling off.

4520. If they had been in the vagrant ward they would have slept in hammocks?—Well, but there is a great difference between a hammock and a bed. I have myself, on paying a surprise visit to a reformatory school at night, found a boy who was a new admission lying on the floor beside his bed because he would not sleep in a bed.

4521. Could you tell us the total number of children in reformatory schools in England?—It is about 4,000.

4522. And in the industrial schools?—It is between 15,000 and 16,000; I am talking of Great Britain; the law is exactly the same in the two countries.

4523. That would be about 20,000 children altogether?—Yes.

4524. What is the youngest age at which children are admitted into industrial schools?—There is no limit set by law, but administratively we have made a limit of six by not paying any grant for a child below six, and the youngest children would probably be about eight, though I think there are between fifty and sixty infants dealt with, specially of course.

4525. There is no legal objection to infants being admitted?—None whatever; it is simply that they require such special treatment that the ordinary institution is not good for them; we have one or two places which make a speciality of such children, and therefore we have some fifty or sixty of them.

4526. Do you recover the cost from the parents in a considerable number of cases?—Well, last year we collected from the parents of children in reformatory and industrial schools £30,000. That is not a small sum in itself. Of course the total cost of the schools was something like a quarter of a million, but still that £30,000 represented something like thirty shillings a head per annum.

4527. What is the cost per head?—It runs from £20 to £25 a head, if you exclude institutions under the management of the London authorities, which are much more expensive.

4528. Would they be double the cost?—Perhaps so. I think, however, that the London county council are alive to the matter, and that under their administration we shall see a reduction.

4529. Are the London county council schools under your inspection?—Their industrial schools are.

4530. Are they considered as superior to the others?—Oh, no, but certainly as regards industrial training the council have taken a very enlightened interest in their schools.

4531. Does that cost include the capital cost of the buildings?—No.

4532. So that that would have to be added to the cost of the children?—Yes; though of course, after a certain time it must be considered to have been paid off. I have no doubt that at their big school at Feltham, for instance, the capital charges have been worked off by this time. That was established by the Middlesex magistrates about 1860.

4533. But still to the £20 or £25 a year you would have to add for the first thirty years or so the cost of the surplus land?—But in many of the voluntary schools there was no loan at all; the money was got by private subscription.

4534. If we were starting industrial colonies we should have to consider, in estimating the cost, that the capital charges were not included in the £20 to £25 a year?—Yes, you would; but the cost of the industrial colony, I think, ought not to be as high as an industrial school.

4535. I gather that the Government grant is about half the cost of the maintenance of the child?—That is so in industrial schools in England, but the grant includes an amount equivalent to what any child attending a certified efficient school earns from the Board of Education.

4536. How is the balance found?—Mainly from the rates.

4537. What is the largest school you have under your inspection?—Feltham; that is certified for 600. Then we have the training ships, the largest of which is certified for 400, but the immense majority of the schools range, in the case of boys, from 100 to 200 in the number of inmates.

4538. Are you in favour of large schools for boys?—No, I should make an absolute maximum of 200. I believe that any school though can be kept efficient for 150, that is as regards junior boys. As regards senior boys, I think you can run a school economically and efficiently for from 100 to 140.

4539. But not under?—I have often illustrated the point in this way, and I think there is a very great deal in it, that you must have enough boys in an English school to keep first of all two schoolmasters going, and then two elevens. If you cannot get two good elevens out of a school, well then you cannot keep that school healthy; you cannot get two serviceable elevens with less than a hundred boys.

4540. You do not agree with all the strictures that have been made about big schools?—No, though I can see the great difficulties they labour under at Feltham in having their immense buildings and their 600 boys; I find that the cost seems to mount after you reach a certain number of inmates.

4541. You require more?—Yes, you require an additional sort of staff, I mean; you require a sort of general supervising staff. In addition to the men who are doing the job, you have to introduce almost a staff of inspectors to see that the people are at their job.

4542. But any of these schools would be suitable for the tramp class of child?—Yes.

4543. You do not want anything new?—You do not want anything better.

4544. And there would be an advantage in treating that class of child with other children?—Oh, I think so.

4545. It would not do to have them all put together?—No; I think to keep a school of that sort healthy you must have children of most varied character, and coming from the most varied surroundings.

4546. The same just as we hope to get in a large public school?—Precisely.

4547. Then your idea, I take it, would be to send the tramp children to industrial schools and the adult tramps to labour colonies?—Yes.

4548. (Mr. Simpson.) You said just now that you thought the cost in a labour colony per head ought not to be so high as in a reformatory or industrial school; would you explain your grounds for that?—Well, you see, in a reformatory and industrial school a good deal of the cost is unproductive in the material sense. You have to keep a schoolroom going and an efficient staff of qualified schoolmasters. In the case of the adult colony you could not hope to do more than make arrangements for something in the nature of an evening continuation class.

4549. In the one case you are educating them, in the other case you would be keeping them at work?—Precisely. You see, you only get about two-thirds, at the outside, of a boy's effectiveness for his work, either on the land or in the shops; at least one-third of the energy and time is given up to the schoolroom.

4550. On the other hand, in a labour colony you would have very much more untractable material; you would not have the growing lad who has not got ingrained bad habits, but the veteran of the road, whom it would be very much more difficult to make work?—It would be much more difficult no doubt, but still I cannot help thinking that if you got the right man for the job and a right inducement held out, a good deal more might be done with the vagrant than is imagined.

4551. Taking the reformatory schools and the older class of lads there, is there much difficulty in preventing escapes?—No; but there has been a very marked and astonishing change in that regard since I have known the schools, and it is largely owing to the introduction of physical drill and the great attention paid to athletics. It is quite a passion with them, and the result is that they do not want to run away. It is quite remarkable how the trait of absconding from schools has disappeared. These elder boys realise, in a way the boys in industrial schools do not, the fact that something is being done for them, and the better the qualifications of the schoolmaster teaching them, the quicker the reformatory boy realises it. I might mention that about eighteen months ago it was insisted by the Home Office that no boy in any reformatory school dormitory should be so shut up that he could not get out by his own unaided exertions, if need be; that is to say, that every dormitory must have a door or a window out of which he could get without anyone coming from the outside to unlock it. That has been generally arranged by having the emergency exit fitted with a lock, and a key in a glass fronted box, so one has only got to break the box and take the key. That arrangement has not been abused in a single instance in a reformatory school, though it has once or twice in the junior schools.

4552. You attribute the ease in keeping them at the school to making them interested; they are quite ready to stay there because they feel they are being well treated?—That is precisely the position.

4553. You could not expect that at the labour colony. If you took your tramp fifty years old from the road, you could not put him in the cricket field or make him keen about games?—No, but I should be hopeful of them getting at the fellows under thirty; lots of tramps are between twenty and thirty.

4554. When they are first going on the road?—Yes, or when they have not turned thirty. And then, as regards the older men, I am not sure that they might not like employment. Some of these schools now are introducing a good class of machinery, and so on, in their shops. It is extraordinary the fascination that has for boys—quite as much as physical drill; and your old tramp might be got at in some way like this I think. There is the solace of tobacco. What will not some men do for a pipe, and women for a cup of tea?

Mr. J. G.
Legge.
22 Mar. 1904.

4555. The difficulty would be that men who are sent to a labour colony would not be likely to be sent until after they had had a good number of convictions. Have you ever known in reformatory schools of anything like a system of warders to keep the inmates from running away?—Oh, no.

4556. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) Have they high walls?—Most of them have no walls at all; when a boy goes out to work, if he wants to bolt he can.

4557. (Mr. Simpson.) The staff employed is really analogous to the staff of a public school rather than to the staff of a prison?—Yes. If fellows are working in an eight acre field there will be perhaps fifty boys, and one man in charge.

4558. That would make it quite impossible to prevent a boy running away?—Yes.

4559. The reformatory and industrial school system is by far the most extensive system of institutions for the detention of people under local control subject to Government management; some of the schools are under local authorities?—Yes, under county councils and one town council.

4560. There are none under boards of guardians, are there?—No.

4561. And the rest of them are due to voluntary effort, and are still under voluntary committees?—The immense majority of the industrial schools, and every one of the reformatories in England.

4562. With regard to the industrial schools, could you draw any distinction as to the management or cost or efficiency of those under local authorities, and of those under private management?—Well, as regards cost, those under the direct management of the local authorities are more expensive than those under voluntary management.

4563. You are clear as to that?—Absolutely clear as to that, but the disparity is not unreasonable, I think, until you come to study the case of London. For instance, in the industrial schools managed by the county council of Kent, the county council of Durham, the county council of Cumberland, and the county council of Staffordshire, their average will work out at perhaps a couple of pounds more per annum than the ordinary voluntary school, and I do not think it is unnatural or unreasonable that it should be so; but when you come to London, one is staggered by the figures.

4564. That was under the late school board?—And also the county council; they ran two industrial schools, and have always done so—Feltham and Mayfield. But at the same time, it is a very remarkable fact that one of the most efficient of the London school board schools, really as efficient a school as exists in the country, is the well known Highbury truant school, and that, oddly enough, has been run at a figure for maintenance approximating to the provincial figure.

4565. Are you in favour generally of a system by which institutions of that kind are carried on locally under Government inspection, as opposed to institutions run by Government?—Very strongly indeed, provided the Government is allowed a strong hand. And I should prefer the voluntary body to the local authority, provided the local authority were allowed a hand in the affair also. Most of the industrial schools which are run by voluntary committees, supported by subsidies from the Government and the local authorities, have representatives of the local authority on their managing committee.

4566. And the local authority would not continue to subscribe if they found that the school was not well managed?—No. But some of our schools are suffering very severely from over inspection. I was examining a school near Manchester myself not long ago, and the schoolmaster complained bitterly to me that the week before they had had the London man, and the week after me they expected the Manchester man, and the week after him they expected the Salford man.

4567. That inspection is not statutory, of course?—No, but these authorities have a formal agreement in many cases with the school; they make a regular formal contract as to the terms on which this institution will receive children from the local authority, and they insist that they shall be allowed to visit at all times and inspect and examine, and all the rest of it.

4568. If these informal inspectors object to anything, their only control is that the local authority withdraws its subscription, I suppose, in the long run?—Well, but as it turns out that is as effective a control as the Government has got. The Government, you see, is so largely confined to threats. It is a very serious step to withdraw the certificate from a going institution. It may be a long time before the Government can get its wishes attended to; whereas a local authority simply says nothing, but no more children arrive at that school.

4569. Are these inspectors members of the local authority?—Sometimes they are. The London county council has been very active in that way, members of the council travelling about the country, looking at schools with which they have contracts; in many cases they are their own inspectors.

4570. Do you think the control would be more effective if, instead of having as their only resource the withdrawal of the certificate of the school altogether, which as I understand means that no children at all can be committed to the school, the Government had some power of stopping their contribution to the cost of children committed there?—It has the power, I think, and it might have been more freely exercised.

4571. Do you think that would be effective in the case of a labour colony established something on the lines of an industrial school?—Yes, some system of that sort.

4572. Sir John Gorst's Vagrancy Bill of last session for establishing labour colonies is drawn almost entirely on the lines of the Inebriate Acts; and it establishes a system very analogous to reformatory and industrial schools?—Yes.

4573. It might possibly be useful to the Committee if you could say in what respect you think local management of an institution of that kind is superior to management by the Government, say by the Home Office?—Well, my point is this: I believe that what is wanted is personal interest in an institution if it is to be of any use at all, and I do not see how you are to get that personal interest out of a Government system. It is difficult to say too much for the value on the one hand of the energising and at the same time regularising influence introduced into voluntary work by the co-operation and supervision of a keen official, whether attached to the local or the central government; and on the other of the stirring by a breath of human, personal, voluntary interest of the dry bones of an official system. The problem is, how to bring the official into the right relationship with the enthusiastic voluntary worker. A voluntary worker is often a most futile person, but there are elements in the most futile of them which are most useful if properly directed.

4574. But, on the whole, you think the system of which you have personal experience has solved the problem fairly satisfactorily?—Yes.

4575. (Sir William Chance.) You have given us a very interesting and useful statement of the legislation which led up to the Industrial Schools Act of 1866 (see Appendix XXXVI.). You consider that that Act can be applied to the children of vagrants?—Yes.

4576. Well, of course, there may be a difference of opinion as to that?—There is, undoubtedly.

4577. Do not the magistrates take different views on that point?—They do as to the construction of section 14.

4578. Do you not think there is very strong ground for a difference of view on that point. Perhaps I may take Sir John Bridge's decision; he says practically that you can apply the Act to a tramp who was a professional beggar?—Yes, he does.

4579. And then Sheriff Dove Wilson says: "I have heard it suggested that if the wandering child had any kind of parents, it could not be said to be without 'proper guardianship,' but I do not think it can be so interpreted, and I have always held that if the parents were drunken, or ill-treated their children, those children, if found wandering through the country, whether with or without the parents, came under the Act." Now, again, I think some people might say that is limited. These vagrants that we have to deal with are not always drunk and they certainly do not ill-treat their children. Therefore, according to Sheriff Dove Wilson's definition of that section the Act would not necessarily cover all vagrants?—The vagrant, according to Sir John Bridge, comes within the terms of the Act, and according to Professor Dove Wilson, but he must be an habitual vagrant, and possibly a person of undesirable character in himself.

4580. But Professor Dove Wilson does not say that?—I think that is what he means.

4581. As a matter of fact, are you not aware that the difficulty of dealing with these children on the roads under the present law is, that they are not as a rule ill-treated; they are well-fed; they are generally fairly well-clothed, in fact, there are ordinary children in towns, who may be considered in a much worse state?—But the real question, it seems to me, with them is, are they getting the benefits of the Education Acts.

4582. Yes, but the Act says nothing about education. I am talking now of the Act of 1866, under which you say these vagrant children can be dealt with?—Oh, but I think that section of the Act is practically incorporated in the Elementary Education Acts, in fact it is re-enacted in the Education Act of 1876.

4583. Yes?—And it is the duty of any local education authority in the country, if they become aware of a child wandering, to seize that child.

4584. The section runs as follows: "Any person may bring before two justices or a magistrate any child apparently under the age of fourteen years . . . that is found wandering, and not having any home or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence." Now, it is contended that this provision only touches children who are found wandering about?—Yes.

4585. Well, as there is a good deal of uncertainty on the subject, would it not be your opinion that it might be better to make that Act perfectly clear that it did apply to the habitual vagrant?—As there is the element of doubt, I think it would be a good thing to have it made perfectly clear by a definite enactment.

4586. On account of the magistrates taking different views on the subject?—Yes; they must always retain their discretion as to whether circumstances call for putting such an enactment into operation, but the interpretation of the enactment ought not to be open to doubt.

4587. But it is open to doubt?—It is open to doubt, though I do not think it is as much open to doubt as people suppose. I think the number of magistrates who hold the view that not under "proper guardianship" means not under any guardianship at all is very small.

4588. I quite understand. Is there not another point, that magistrates are very loth to send any children to industrial schools?—Yes.

4589. And they are still more loth to make use of their powers to send these vagrant children to industrial schools?—Well, unless there was a general feeling that it was worth while making a crusade for a period; I think if they could be induced to take the view that it is worth while trying as a social experiment to convict as many as possible for three or five years and see the result, a good many might be induced to fall in with the suggestion.

4590. Is it not rather remarkable that in this section no mention is made of the person who is with the child—the parent or professing parent, or guardian. The Act says the child has to be brought before two justices; but does not mention the parent?—Yes, but I think you will find subsequent sections dealing with the order on the parent to contribute.

4591. Of course, afterwards you try to find out the parent and make him responsible?—Yes.

4592. But the Act says nothing about the case that you have on the country roads, the child travelling about either with a man, or a man and a woman?—That has been remedied to a certain extent by the Youthful Offenders Act which contains special provision to secure the attendance of the parent at the same time as the child is brought before the court, and to secure that an order may be made on the parent at the same sitting of the court as the child is committed.

4593. Does that not rather prove what I am contending, that this Act itself is not quite adequate?—Yes, it does.

4594. We know there have been other Acts of Parliament such as the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act?—Yes.

4595. The children of vagrants are dealt with under that Act very largely?—Yes.

4596. Then there is the Poor Law Act, 1899?—Yes.

4597. If the guardians find the child of a vagrant has been cruelly or badly treated, they can take it away?—Yes.

4598. What I mean is that this Act of 1866 is not complete in itself?—No.

4599. Do you not think it would be very desirable that in some kind of way this Act should be amended, so that it would practically include these children wandering about the roads with the adult vagrants?—Yes, I agree.

4600. You would limit it to the children of habitual vagrants, would you not?—Yes.

4601. (Mr. Davy.) Some people seem to think that you ought to take the children of anyone found begging?—Well, so you can; I think there is no doubt about that under the Industrial Schools Acts.

4602. Anyone found begging?—Any child found begging.

4603. Yes, but not the child; I am talking of the parent?—The child with a parent who is begging.

4604. The parent begging?—We have a good many children, I fancy, committed to industrial schools precisely in such circumstances as you mention: the father or the mother, who was begging in the street and exposing the child whilst begging, being held not to be a proper guardian.

4605. Without going into the question of whether the begging was habitual?—Yes.

4606. (Sir William Chance.) You are of opinion that this power of dealing with tramp children should be limited to the children of habitual vagrants?—You must avoid interfering with the man who is moving about from place to place in search of work.

4607. You would approve of the habitual vagrant being punished in some way for his vagrancy?—Yes; I do not much like the word "punished," say dealt with.

4608. Well, dealt with; but being committed to a labour colony for two years would be somewhat severe punishment, would it not?—I do not think it need be.

4609. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) It would be a privilege?—I think in course of time as you say, he would regard it as a privilege.

4610. (Sir William Chance.) Anyhow, he would have to suffer in some way; would you approve of the principle that whoever was in charge of these children, wandering about so that they have no chance of getting any education, should be made in some way to feel his responsibility?—He should be made to feel, not only his responsibility towards his own child, but also his responsibility to the State.

4611. Now, do you think that taking away a child from such a man without dealing with the man in any way, would be a deterrent?—I think it would, very distinctly so.

4612. Do you think that that arises from the liking for the children, or from the feeling that they may be useful to the tramps in their profession?—They are useful, and they like them just as much as they like a dog or any other animal.

4613. Supposing that you did take these children away, do you not think it might possibly be a temptation to other people who wanted to get rid of their children to take to the road?—No, I do not. I think the fear that parents would be anxious to get rid of their children is enormously exaggerated; I am sure of it.

4614. You do not think there is such a risk yourself?—I am sure there is not; there is not as regards industrial school children.

Mr. J. G.
Legge.

22 Mar. 1905.

4615. Have you any instances you could give in proof of your opinion?—Well, here is a very remarkable fact, that though the population has gone up, and the schools have been enormously improved in the last ten years in every respect, structurally, and so on, education better, trade instruction better, the number of children in the schools at this moment is considerably lower than it was ten years ago; and it is very odd that the more efficient the schools the greater their deterrence seems to be. As an illustration, I might give a case of a personal experience. I was walking up Loch Earn one Saturday evening in the autumn, and met a characteristic Scotch tramp woman. She had an infant on her back in a shawl. I got into conversation with her and asked her if she had any other children; any boys; and she said, "yes." I said to her, "Are any of them in industrial schools?" She replied "Yes, there are two at Oakbank in Aberdeen. If you are going there you will see them." I said, "Any girls?" She said, "Yes." "Where are the girls?" "They are with their grandmother at Inverness." I said to her, "Where are you going now?" "Oh, I am going to Inverness." "Are you going to stay there the winter?" "Yes." "Then," I said, "what will you do?" "Then," she said, "I will go down to Glasgow." "And then," I said, "you will come back from Glasgow, through Perth and Dundee, I suppose, and back to Inverness, this road?" and she said, "Yes." Well, I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind that the girls would have been with her instead of with their grandmother, if it had not been the fact that she was caught with the two boys in her train, and the two boys were taken from her and put into an industrial school.

4616. Then do you suggest that she went back to Inverness to stay for a time in order to see her children?—To lie up for the winter and to get back to her children. I might tell you as a sequel to the story, I saw the two boys, and a particularly bright little pair they were; but the following year when I went back I asked for those two boys and they had been spirited away.

4617. (Mr. Simpson.) Joined their mother?—Yes, I heard the mother called at the school and saw them, and then in the course of the evening they disappeared out of the dormitory, and they have never been seen since.

4618. (Sir William Chance.) So they may have taken to a vagrant life?—Oh, no doubt they have; but what is certain in the case is that the mother was not rejoicing in the fact that her two boys were being housed at the Oakbank Industrial School at the public expense.

4619. The Vagrant Children Protection Bill of last session contemplates the control of wayfarers, both professional and bona fide, remaining under boards of guardians as at present; it deals with vagrancy as a poor law question; that is one of the principles of the Bill?—Yes, I noticed that, though there is special provision enabling the Industrial Schools Acts to be invoked if a magistrate prefers that course, in his discretion.

4620. That the bad or unruly cases shall be handed over to the industrial schools?—Not only that; clause 8, I think, enables a magistrate, if he prefers to proceed under the Industrial Schools Acts, to do so.

4621. Yes, that is so. I do not know whether you have any remarks to make on that Bill?—On principle I think it better that these children should not be dealt with under the Poor Law but by the Industrial Schools Acts; and I will tell you why: I think that action of this sort should be regarded as exceptional. Now, it seems to me that if they are dealt with under the Poor Law, you are taking the line that you are making a sort of natural provision just as for failing health and poverty; whereas you are making provision for a state of things which is not brought about by anything but circumstances which come either actually or very nearly within the criminal law.

4622. You know that there are different classes of vagrants. We have had it in evidence that a certain proportion of these vagrants are really on the road for honest purposes?—Still I do not think it should be regarded simply as natural provision that would be made for sickness or accident.

4623. Then I gather that you rather think that the charge of vagrants should be transferred to some other authority than the guardians?—Yes. I think it should be either the education authority or the police authority; and now both of these are combined practically under the same head.

4624. Do you think that if that was done it would facilitate the satisfactory dealing with these children?—I think it would deal with the problem more effectively. I doubt whether the dealing with them under the Poor Law would have the same effect in reducing the numbers as if they were dealt with under the Industrial Schools Acts, just as I do not believe that if, when a disorderly house were raided, the children were sent off to the workhouse, it would have had anything like the same effect as the packing of them off to an industrial school has had. I am told now that in Birmingham and Liverpool they comparatively seldom find a child in a disorderly house when it is raided.

4625. (Mr. Davy.) Is it an offence to aid and abet the escape from an industrial school?—Yes.

4626. Whereas escape of a child from a workhouse is not a matter which concerns the criminal law at all?—Well, except that they can be prosecuted for running away in the clothes in which they stand up; is that the only way?

4627. That is the only way?—But I know it does happen.

4628. The parents could interfere with a child in the workhouse much more than with a child in an industrial school?—Yes.

4629. (Dr. Downes.) In speaking of the school in the north I understood you to say that they did a good deal of work for the neighbouring farmers?—It is remarkable what they do, though no one objects there.

4631. They pay the current rate of wages?—They pay the current rate of wages to the school.

4632. Has there been any complaint of labour being displaced by the school?—None whatever, nor has there, I think, anywhere in the country. The system is going on, though not to the same extent; practically throughout the country, though the total volume is but a drop in the ocean of labour.

4633. With regard to the cost in London, are there figures available showing the analysis of the expenditure under different headings?—I think some of the appendices to our Annual Report will give the figures.

4634. Is it possible to lay one's finger upon any particular items that are the cause of the greater expenditure in London?—Yes, I think it ought to be possible; but I think it would be found that it ranged over the whole gamut; of course, the cost of building is notoriously higher.

4635. I understand you to say that you thought that the younger the man the better you could deal with him in the labour colony?—I do think so.

4636. Would that not point to our not waiting for too many convictions before the man goes there?—Yes, and I might say that I am sorry we do not get the boy into a reformatory school until he has been up several times and until people are sick of the sight of him.

4637. You would rather get him sooner?—Yes, it would make the work very much easier, and, though in principle the First Offenders' Act is an admirable measure, yet, because we have not got any proper system of probation officers, the Act seems to me of very doubtful expediency. It simply means that we practically never get a first offender now. It is true he may enter the school on what is technically his first conviction, but he must have been up before for a certainty; he has been let off under the First Offenders' Act on bound over, or his parents told to give him a flogging at home, or something of that sort.

4638. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot.) In these reformatory schools have you any productive industries, or manufactories of things you sell in the market?—Yes, but they do not make any profit out of them.

4639. Is the output large?—Very small; of course the hours of work are very short.

4640. And the boys are very numerous?—And the boys are young. But a school of 200—any school from 80 to 200—will keep itself entirely in clothes and boots.

4641. But would not make anything for sale?—Yes, and make a certain amount for sale.

4642. Has any objection been raised to that by outside people?—Yes. Mr. J. G. Legge.

4643. With what result?—When the question has been threshed out, the output has been found to be so very small, that I think people have made up their minds that it is not worth fussing about. And I might call your attention to some remarks by one of the leading working men, Mr. John Burns, on the subject of these schools. At a Trades Union Congress some years ago he expressed himself most emphatically against the policy of interfering with work in reformatory and industrial schools, and I dare say he would possibly take the same line about the labour colonies. 22 Mar. 1905

THIRTEENTH DAY.

Tuesday, 11th April, 1905.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair).

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.
Captain SHOWERS.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary).

Major A. F. POULTON, Chief Constable of Berkshire, called; and Examined.

4644. (Chairman.) Major Poulton, you are the chief constable of Berkshire?—I am.

4645. How many years have you been in that position?—About three years now.

4646. You have sent to us copies of a most excellent report made by you on vagrancy (see Appendix XII.). I gather from that report that up to the year 1900 there was a gradual decrease of tramps in Berkshire?—That was so.

4647. And that after 1900 there was a considerable increase?—There was.

4648. And you attribute that to the war?—Partly so; partly to bad trade, I think, of late years.

4649. Men were thrown out of employment through no fault of their own?—Quite so. You see during the war there were a great many militia regiments embodied; that took a good many men; and any man out of employment joined the militia or the yeomanry, and a large number of men were taken away, no doubt.

4650. A large number of reserve men were taken out?—Yes.

4651. And no doubt many of them had difficulty in getting employment when they came back and so became vagrants for a time?—That is so.

4652. Now do you think there has been any increase of crime among vagrants of late years in proportion to the number of men on tramp?—There has been, certainly in my county.

4653. Berkshire, I believe, is on one of the main routes for tramps?—Yes, it is a great highway between London and the west.

4654. Which way do they go as a rule?—Well, they either work from the Midlands through Oxford down to Reading, or by the western route from Bath and Devizes through Newbury into Reading, and then they split again and go either by the Maidenhead and London route, or the Windsor, Staines and Egham route.

4655. Do you think many Metropolitan tramps come your way?—Oh, yes; a great number.

4656. Now, what class are they as a rule?—Well it is difficult to say; they are really vagrants who work their way to London and back; they have got no permanent employment.

4657. Are they men who are really looking for work?—Oh, there is a certain proportion of men who are bona fide out of work, tailors and builders and such like. Major A. F. Poulton.

4658. And what percentage would you say there is of these men?—Well, I am afraid I can hardly give you the figures in that way. 11 April 1905.

4659. Our information is that the London vagrant as a rule is, I think, a more idle man than the country vagrant; I mean the percentage of the honest tramp is less in London than in the country; it has been put at 1 per cent. ?—Well, it is difficult for me to get the figures of the unemployed; we only get a certain proportion that come under our notice as criminals.

4660. I was not speaking so much of the criminals, but men coming from London through Berkshire and going west; would you say those, as a rule, were very largely composed of men who had no intention of working?—A considerable proportion of them are men who will not work.

4661. You adjoin, I think, the counties who have a way-ticket system?—Yes, Wiltshire; and we just touch Gloucester on the north-west side.

4662. I think you had a way-ticket in Berkshire at one time?—We did.

4663. But that was before you were there?—It was tried in 1871 and 1872 and then it was dropped owing to the want of co-operation of the guardians; then it was brought up again in 1879, and it went on for some four or five years with very great success.

4664. Then what caused it to drop again?—I think the failure was due to the lack of co-operation of the adjoining counties.

4665. I see. And were the guardians themselves at all keen?—The guardians themselves fairly supported the system then.

4666. They did the second time?—They did not at first, but the second time they did.

4667. If a way-ticket were made general, do you think it would be a good thing for the suppression of vagrancy?—Yes, I think so. I think there are questions on both sides, if I may say so; I dare say you will not mind my expressing my own individual opinion.

Major A. F.
Poulton.

11 April 1905.

4668. We want you to give your opinion?—My opinion with regard to it is this, that of course there is a feeling against any kind of passport system in our free country; I think that is one of the things against the system. On the other hand we do want for all these people identity. I think that is the secret of the whole system—certainly looking at it from a police point of view. And, therefore, I do think that the advantages are considerably on the side of a pass or a way-ticket system.

4669. That would be a way-ticket system which would materially assist in the identification of the men?—That is what we want.

4670. Which would enable you to identify the idle vagrant who has no intention of working?—I think that is what we want.

4671. That would be a very considerable advantage?—I think so; I think we want to separate the good from the bad.

4672. We were told by Admiral Christian that the way-ticket system materially assisted to put a stop to begging?—No doubt of it.

4673. By providing the holder with the opportunity of getting a mid-day meal of bread, the way-ticket system not only materially assisted to put a stop to begging, but helped the honest man on his way?—That would be so to a certain extent; but, of course, for the tramps who are in the casual wards, there are twice as many in common lodging-houses who are really supported by this misplaced charity of the public.

4674. But as far as the casual ward men were concerned?—As far as they were concerned, it would do good, no doubt.

4675. Well, I gather that on the whole you would be in favour of a way-ticket system, if it were carefully worked?—Yes, of a general uniform system of way-tickets. I have taken a great interest in this question, and I have gone through all the records of my predecessor in office, who was there for nearly forty years, and read all the reports and all the papers connected with it, and I am satisfied from reading these that the failure of the system was the want of uniformity; in fact, in all the reports that is the one thing that they cry out for; a uniform system of dealing with these men throughout the country.

4676. The contiguous counties did not give the way-ticket; consequently, the system failed immediately you got to the border of your county?—Quite so.

4677. In your report you allude to the preference of the tramp for prison to the workhouse?—That is so.

4678. You attribute that largely, as other witnesses have done, to the fact that the prison diet is better than the workhouse diet?—Oh, it is a long way better.

4679. And that the man knows he is well looked after?—They tell us so.

4680. And has a warm cell although he gets a plank bed?—They tell us that every day.

4681. I suppose you would suggest that the matter requires looking into?—I think that the food in the workhouse is quite inadequate to ask a man to do a fair day's work on. May I say that since I wrote this report I have had several letters on the subject from chairmen of boards of guardians and others. Here is a letter from a master of a workhouse, in which he says of stone-pounding that it is not an unreasonable task but decidedly a hard one; a man has to be very fit physically or must have acquired a special knowledge by long practice to get it done in the time allowed.

4682. Is that pounding the stone with a sort of pestle and mortar?—Yes; they do about two bushels. He goes on to say that the diet is very inadequate and very insufficient to do the work on. A breakfast of half a pound of dry bread is very meagre to do a day's journey on; it is almost an incentive to begging or worse. Well, I find these tramps coming to the police with what they have stolen and saying "Lock me up." We have had that repeatedly during the last winter.

4683. Well, now, do you think it would be a fair thing to assimilate the casual ward breakfast to that for the seven-day prisoner; that is, give bread and gruel instead of bread and water?—I certainly think they ought to have bread and gruel or bread and soup given to them. If you ask them to do a day's work, I think the men ought to be sufficiently fed, and the next thing is to satisfy the public that these men are sufficiently fed; if the public once get the idea that the men are not sufficiently fed, they will give in charity.

4684. If you give a man a somewhat better breakfast, you could reasonably expect him to do something more in the way of a task?—That is exactly my argument. When any of these men go before the magistrates, I tell the police that I think it is fair for them to state exactly what the man gets and what is expected of him; and I think that if you give him a better diet there is more reason for punishing him for not doing the workhouse tasks. I do not sympathise with these men in the least, but I am only looking at it from a just point of view, if I may say so.

4685. I see you also suggest the identification of professional tramps by means of finger prints; where would you have the finger prints made?—My idea is to work it as we do now; we only finger-print the man who comes under the special notice of the police for an offence; I do not mean it to apply to all these men throughout the country. I think the idea is not to bring the man under the notice of the police, unless he is a criminal.

4686. Suppose a man was convicted say, three or five times, you would take that man as an habitual tramp, and have an identification preserved of him by means of finger prints?—Yes.

4687. In whose custody would the prints be; would the superintendent of police in the district in which they were taken keep them?—They now identify 70,000 criminals at Scotland Yard, by means of a central authority of this kind, which is of the very greatest assistance in the world to us police officers; the finger prints of these men down in the country are sent up to Scotland Yard one day and the whole history of the man comes down next morning.

4688. Supposing it is a man at Newcastle-on-Tyne, what would you do in such a case?—If there is any doubt about the case, we remand the man, if he has committed a crime. We should take his finger prints locally, but you must have a central authority to preserve the records.

4689. You have considered the question of labour colonies?—Well, I have read reports on what has been done in Belgium and other places, and certainly it seems—I can only speak from having read reports—a very good means of dealing with the habitual tramp; it is the same way as you deal with an habitual drunkard.

4690. I suppose if you committed a man to a labour colony it would be for some considerable period?—A short sentence is absolutely no good for such a man.

4691. Would you have these establishments under the control of the Home Office or the Prison Commissioners?—Yes, I think that would be by far the best arrangement.

4692. Have you anything to say with regard to common lodging-houses?—I think we want very much better supervision of them; we want more inspection.

4693. Do you think the present registration of lodging-houses sufficient?—No; it is not sufficiently carried out.

4694. Then you would have a larger amount of registration, and you would have better supervision; by whom should the supervision be?—Well, I do not know that you can do better than appoint a police officer the inspector of the common lodging-houses in the town; there is no difficulty; I think they do in many places appoint police officers.

4695. They have now the right of free entry into all the common lodging-houses?—Oh, yes; we visit them pretty nearly every day, but not being inspectors the police have no power to enforce the rules.

4696. They have no power of enforcing cleanliness?—No, it rests with the local authorities themselves in the town.

4697. With regard to the children of tramps, I think you have something to say to us?—Well, I think it is very important that there should be some means of taking care of these children. I am a good deal on the roads.

and I do see, day after day, these wretched children hawked about the roads, wet through, and looking in a frightful state; so much so, that this winter I have given all my police officers and superintendents some money out of our charity fund to enable them to supply a meal where they find a really hard case of these children, not to give them money, but to give them the actual food.

4698. Do you give anything in the way of clothing to the children?—No. It is only a small amount I distribute—£15. We have a sports fund in the county, and we make a little money every year, and we try to give it to a good object.

4699. I have been rather astonished at the very small proportion of children to adults in the tramp population?—I do not think there are many in proportion to the tramps.

4700. I thought that Berkshire being on the main road you might see more there than elsewhere?—We do see a great many, but not in proportion to the number of tramps, but still I do think it is important that as far as possible children should be kept from a tramp life.

4701. Quite so. What alteration would you suggest in the law to meet the case?—It is a difficult question, but I cannot help thinking that if we had this way-ticket system a man honestly seeking for work might leave his children in the union from which he departs, and the children might then be taken care of and educated.

4702. The man through his way-ticket could be traced?—Yes.

4703. Reports could be made to him about his children?—I do not think that an honest man would mind that really; I think he would be rather glad to know that his children were being taken care of, and I think generally it is in the case of the man who will not work, and lives on public charity, that the children are dragged about, and consequently grow up in the life which one wants them to avoid.

4704. Now as regards labour bureaux, in what way would you establish them; would you have the information at the casual ward or the police station, or at both?—I think myself that the system could be better worked by the town authorities, as in Reading, where they give notice at the different places, the workhouse and the police stations.

4705. Could you kindly tell us what the system is at Reading?—Well, it is more or less a charitable system really. People subscribed, and the town authorities have given a certain amount of employment in clearing vacant spaces; at other times they have co-operated with the local charities, who have established soup kitchens and things of that kind, and given grants to them. They have not established a regular system of finding out who want labour and who are in want of it.

4706. Have you considered whether information could be derived, say, from the Labour Department of the Board of Trade, and communicated to the various centres in the counties for the information of the honest tramp who is seeking work?—Well, I think it would be a very good thing. I have asked these tramps myself, in the casual wards, to what place they are working their way. A lot of them tell me they are working their way to Salisbury; there are new works there; new barracks and one or two things. Lots of them told me they were working their way down to Bristol in search of work. Others told me they were going elsewhere in search of employment.

4707. You think it would be a good thing if information could be imparted in this way?—I think it would be, and it would help the honest man and separate him from the bad one.

4708. Have you at all considered in what way you could compel a man to work in a labour colony?—I think you could do very much what is done in prisons; they get these men to work in prisons. I heard that a man said in court—"Work! I hate the name of it; it gives me a headache to hear people talk of work; I never have done a day's work and I never will do a day's work." I thought to myself this is a funny case; and I went down to the prison to see what happened there. The man was working as well as any of them. I asked the governor about it; he said his idea was—and I dare say there is a good deal of truth in it—that a great many of these tramps go into the workhouse, and when they see their task if they think it is rather much, they will chuck it. "Now," he said, "in the prison we never give them a definite task; we do not expect them to do the maximum task." It is the same point as I think I put in my report, viz.:—that if a man picks two pounds of oakum, he will get the maximum marks for good conduct, and that is what these fellows very often do. In the workhouse they cast their eye over the eleven cwt. or thirteen cwt. of stone, and they say, "Oh, no, I will chuck it; take me away; I will go to prison."

4709. We have had the suggestion that you might persuade men to work in the labour colony by means of their food; that is, that the man that did a good day's work should get a good meal?—That is my point. Treat the man as they do in prison; if the man refuses to work, he is put on bread and water; when he is put on bread and water he does no work; but with the case of a tramp, when you put him on bread and water you put him to work. In prison when they put him on bread and water he is not allowed to do any work.

4710. You agree that the best method of inducing a man to work would be by letting him know that by doing a good day's work he would have a good meal at the end of it?—Yes, quite so; I think that is the point.

4711. (Mr. Davy.) Apart from the question of food in casual wards and prisons, there are other reasons which make the prison more comfortable, are there not. For instance, the cells are larger?—Yes, and better warmed in every way.

4712. And the food is better cooked as a rule?—Well, of course, there is no cooking in the casual wards, it is only dry bread.

4713. You do not give porridge in Berkshire?—No.

4714. Again, the prison bath is at a fixed temperature, comfortably hot, is it not?—Yes, and as far as I have seen in the casual wards—I must give the masters their due—they take care to give tepid baths; at least, that is what I have seen.

4715. The regulation as to the heat of the bath would be much more easily enforced in a prison than in an isolated workhouse, would it not?—Yes, but if you laid down certain rules, I do not see why workhouse officials should not carry them out as well as prison officials.

4716. Workhouses vary very much in size?—They do.

4717. And they are very scattered?—Yes; sometimes there are too many.

4718. In some there is only one male officer?—Yes.

4719. Would you suggest that in all these matters the workhouse should be brought up to the prison standard?—Well, I should think that the prison scale is on the lowest standard, certainly as far as food is concerned.

4720. I am not talking of food for the moment?—No, but speaking generally, here is a man who has committed an offence against his country; he is put into prison, and I should think the prison authorities have regulated his treatment on the lowest course that they could, seeing that he is a man who is undergoing punishment.

4721. But would it not, as a matter of fact, be quite impracticable to get the cells, the bathing, the cooking, etc., for casuals in workhouses, up to the present prison standard?—I do not quite see where the difficulty comes in; the cells are warmed by hot water.

4722. Have you cells in all the workhouses in Berkshire?—No, not in all of them.

4723. Have you been to all the workhouses?—I have been to five out of twelve.

4724. Would you suggest any harder work in prisons so as to make them more deterrent?—No; from the little I have seen of prisons, I think the men do work and work well, and they do work which, of course, the men perhaps like; I mean they make these mail bags and different things.

4725. Would you call making a coal sack hard labour?—A man has to be kept pretty hard at it; but I think it is not so hard as stone breaking.

Major A. F. 4726. There is no physical exertion about it ?—No.

L'oulton.

11 April 1905.

4727. Might you not say the same of wood chopping ?
—Yes, they have tried wood chopping in some of the workhouses, but they tell me they get it much better done by the regular inmates. In one workhouse I was in the other day, they said they had been obliged to give up wood chopping, because the outside people complained.

4728. Now, with reference to the way-ticket system would not one great advantage of it be that the tramps would be under the surveillance of the police all the time ?—I do not think that the police should issue every way-ticket.

4729. What system would you suggest ?—I do not see why masters of workhouses should not issue way-tickets.

4730. Would you have good tickets and bad tickets ?—No, I think I would issue a ticket in the ordinary way till you found out what a man was.

4731. What would that ticket do for a man ?—If he wanted to go to a certain place, it would start him on his way with his identity certificate.

4732. Would it give him a mid-day meal ?—Yes ; I do not see why he should not have a mid-day meal.

4733. Where would he have his mid-day meal ?—Well, you might let a police officer have the authority to grant a mid-day meal to any man ; he would apply either at a workhouse, or, if he was going on to another workhouse, at a police station, and let it be a charge on the board of guardians of the particular union.

4734. What sort of mid-day meal would you suggest ?—I think a bit of bread and cheese is quite good enough for any man to take on his journey, and I do not see why the workhouse authorities should not give it to him when he starts in the morning.

4735. Would you give that to every man ?—Yes, who keeps to his line of route. I think you want to impose certain conditions on tramps if you give them this food and treat them as I think they should be treated ; and if they follow those conditions, and confine themselves to certain routes, I would give it to all of them until I found out that they were not genuine wayfarers.

4736. Supposing a man does not stick to his route, what would you do ?—I think in that case the man ought to be taken up under the Vagrancy Act for obtaining relief under false pretences.

4737. Do you think that any change of the law would be necessary ?—I think there would probably have to be a change in the Vagrancy Act in these respects.

4738. You would not make any distinction between the man who was supposed to be in search of work and the ordinary tramp then, so long as they kept to their route ?—I think you would find out the good and the bad by the way-ticket system.

4739. A good man would stick to his route and the bad would not ?—That would be so.

4740. Supposing a man was going from one workhouse to another and he heard of work at some place to the right or the left of his road ; how would you deal with that case ?—I think if he gave a good reason, I would not put any compulsion on him.

4741. You would leave that to the discretion of the workhouse master ?—Yes, there must be mistakes in all these things, but you want to work for the majority. No doubt in many cases a man might not be found out, but still you would lessen the cases instead of increasing them ; and you would show them that you were trying to do something for their good.

4742. With regard to identification, would you take the thumb-marks of every tramp ?—No, only those who came under the police for an offence.

4743. One offence you suggest being, not keeping to the route ?—Yes, certainly ; I think you want to class such a man as a vagrant, not as a man honestly seeking work.

4744. The system requires uniformity in the various workhouses, and the masters would have to conform to the same rules ?—Oh, certainly there would have to be a uniform system throughout the country.

4745. That is, in the workhouses as well ?—Yes.

4746. Do you think there would be any difficulty in enforcing uniformity ?—I do not think so. I cannot see why.

4747. With the existing system ?—Of course, the present system is to drive the vagrants from one place to another in order to lessen the rates ; there is no doubt about that ; guardians admit it. The consequence is some places are hard on the tramps, and some are not.

4748. The cost of a tramp is only about 4d. a day. Do you not think there may be some other motive than the saving of the rates ; may they not wish to get rid of the vagrants from their district ?—Oh, yes ; I think people wish to get rid of vagrants out of their own district ; but still, what you do is, you only drive them into another part.

4749. Is not the vagrant a police nuisance rather than a poor law nuisance ?—Not entirely, I think ; considering the number of tramps, very few come under the police.

4750. Do the police always enforce the law as to begging in your county ?—Yes, as a rule. Of course, we discriminate between cases.

4751. Who discriminates ; the local constable ?—Yes, or the divisional superintendent. We get that more in the towns where there are inspectors and chief officers.

4752. Is it not less trouble to a police officer to let a tramp go on rather than to charge him ?—I do not think so.

4753. The supposition is that a workhouse master would be hard on tramps in order to get rid of them ?—I do not say that. I must honestly say that the workhouse masters I have seen in Berkshire are extremely good men who have taken a great deal of interest in the work. No, I must honestly say, so far as they are concerned, they do their very best ; but they do say their orders are so and so, and they have to give this. I have been to five of them, and I have said, "Is the food sufficient for the man." And they say it is not.

4754. On which day is it not sufficient ?—On any day ; the bread and water.

4755. The tramp is only in the workhouse, we will say, three days a week ?—Yes, but it is not sufficient even if he is in only one day.

4756. It is not sufficient for the one day ?—Certainly not, if you are to make him do a task of work.

4757. Not even if he got a good meal on the other days ?—No, I do not think so at all. I think if you are going to ask a man to do a good day's work, you ought to give him a fair meal.

4758. Without reference to how he is living during the rest of the week ?—That is difficult to know. You take the man into the casual wards and say you will provide for him, and you expect him to do a certain amount of work ; I think you ought to give him food which is equivalent to the work which you ask him to do.

4759. For that day ?—Yes, you do it in prison, even when a man has committed a crime ; all the more, therefore, when he has not committed a crime.

4760. The conditions in prison are not quite analogous ; you have got a man in prison for four or five days ?—Yes.

4761. You know what he is going to have for food the next day and the following days ?—Yes.

4762. Not so in the case of a tramp ?—If a tramp has any money at all he will not go into the casual ward ; he will go to a lodging-house. A man will go to cottages and say, "I was in the workhouse last night," and they give him food and money ; that is what makes all these people go about the country.

4763. Do you think tramps, as a rule, have an underfed appearance ?—Yes, in many cases.

4764. Did you ever hear of tramps being searched and bringing food, say meat, into the workhouses ?—Yes, I have heard of it.

4765. Do you think that that ought to be considered in framing the dietary ?—Well, I think the whole reason why they get this at all is because you do not satisfy the public that these men are taken care of in the workhouse.

4766. And the difficulty is that the public will not stop their almsgiving unless they are so satisfied?—Yes, I think you must satisfy the public that there is no reason for them to give. I think it would do a good deal. When they had this system in Berkshire they reduced vagrancy, because they issued notices to the public saying that there was no necessity to give to a man as he could get food between the workhouses; and it did to a certain extent stop it; there is no doubt about it. I have a paper here which shows that in 1871 when the ticket system was introduced the number of tramps in Berkshire was 23,000; in 1872, the number fell to 14,900; and in 1873, when the system was discontinued, the numbers were 15,264. The system was in force in 1873 only for six months. In 1874 the numbers again rose to 19,000, and they gradually increased till 1879 when they got up to 28,000.

4767. (Chairman.) There being no ticket system then?—No, the ticket system was again tried in 1879 and there was a reduction, showing, I think, that the public, when they had some assurance that the man could get food, did not give.

4768. (Mr. Davy.) Can you say what the reduction was in 1879?—Well, I have not those figures with me, but I have seen the report of the chief constable in which he said that the number had been considerably reduced.

4769. There are other causes to consider; for instance, the Casual Poor Act was passed in 1882 enforcing two nights' detention?—Yes.

4770. Do you think there would be any advantage in having one body to deal with vagrancy in each county?—What do you mean by one body?

4771. Say the standing joint committee?—Well, I think it might have considerable disadvantages. You mean that you would put the casual wards under the standing joint committee?

4772. I do not say I would. I am asking you what you think of the proposal?—Well, I do not think I would be prepared to recommend it.

4773. On what ground?—Well, on several grounds, if I may mention them. First of all, because you would be mixing up two authorities—district authorities and county authorities. You have all the material at the workhouses now for dealing with casual tramps. You have great big kitchens, you have the regular inmates who are employed in the workhouse to cook the food, and, as far as the extra food that these men get is concerned, a few shillings a week would meet the cost. And the second cause is, if you put it on to the police you are putting it on to a very much over-loaded body; it would increase your police force very much; it would increase your police expenses. Another thing is that I do not think that a man, because he is poor, should come under the police at all unless he has committed a crime against the law of the land.

4774. Then you have administrative objections?—Yes.

4775. And you have the objection that you think that the vagrant is a man who ought not to be brought into touch with the police until he has committed a crime?—Yes.

4776. Would you say until he was an habitual?—Until he has committed a crime.

4777. You think then an habitual vagrant ought not to be under the police?—I think if a man commits the offence of vagrancy he has committed, I will not say a crime, but an offence against the laws and the regulations of the country, the same as a man that has committed an offence against the workhouse rules, and is brought before the magistrates for not doing his task.

4778. Do you think all habitual vagrants have been charged?—No, I wish we could get them all.

4779. Would not this be a way of getting them?—Yes, but I think it would be the wrong way of getting them all, if I may say so. If you ask my honest opinion—I must say my experience is limited, but I have taken a great deal of interest in the subject—I do not think the Act of 1882 has had a fair trial.

4780. You mean to say workhouse masters do not all enforce it?—I think you want a uniform system of dealing with vagrants throughout the country. I believe that under the Act of 1882 it is optional to give men gruel and soup. Well, I can only say it is not done in Berkshire, Major A. F. Poulton. and I do not think it is done in a good many workhouses, and the extra cost is very little.

11 April 1905.

4781. You know what happens if one union gives gruel and the other does not?—The tramps know which is the one that gives it. That is my point; make it uniform throughout the country; do not leave it voluntary, but make it compulsory.

4782. In all the 638 casual wards?—Quite so.

4783. Which vary in size and in their staff?—Yes, we do it in police work.

4784. There you have a county authority, have you not?—Yes, but we all work on a uniform system; we have a great number of different authorities.

4785. Would you advocate separate cells?—Yes, certainly.

4786. They are rather expensive to build, are they not?—Yes, but there is no doubt they are a great advantage.

4787. You know some unions are very poor; I do not know whether you have any in Berkshire, but some unions have only a rateable value of a few thousand pounds. Would you make them erect separate cells?—Well, I have no doubt there is a very great advantage in the separate cell system. I think you can classify these people so much better. I would be more inclined to put the bona fide working man, the really good man, in with the regular inmates, than with the regular casual ward inmates, so that he should not be contaminated by the professional tramp.

4788. (Mr. Simpson.) Is it possible, do you think, that uniformity throughout the workhouses of a county could be secured except by the action of one county authority?—I cannot see why a Local Government Board regulation should not be obeyed by every board of guardians in the country.

4789. You think it could be done by the Central Government?—I do not see why it should not be done so at all. As I say, I think the weakness is making it voluntary instead of compulsory. I mean what you want is that the tramp should know that wherever he goes he is treated in the same way.

4790. You sometimes have prisoners in custody in your police stations, do you not?—Yes.

4791. Have you any regulations as to the meals allowed them then?—Yes.

4792. What may a policeman charge for feeding a prisoner?—4d. a meal.

4793. 4d. for each meal?—For each meal: breakfast, dinner and supper.

4794. I suppose he will very often give a prisoner what he happens to have in the house?—Yes.

4795. Possibly, sometimes even meat—costing more than 4d.?—I should allow them 4d. Before I went to Berkshire they used to allow a halfpenny an hour for a prisoner's food; when I looked into it I found that a man came in late at night perhaps, and then did not get anything till the next morning, so I used to say, "I do not care when a man comes in, give him a meal if you think he wants a meal, and the county authority will allow you 4d. a meal."

4796. Has it occurred to you that the way-ticket system may tend to produce a class of tramp who would live by following the route set out in their ticket; they would get lodging and meals in the casual ward, in addition to a mid-day meal when tramping, and then have everything that they can raise by begging, or possibly by stealing, for luxuries, beer, tobacco, and so on; do you think there is danger of such a class being constituted?—I have no doubt you will get a regular class of these fellows, but the idea in my mind is that we ought to try to reduce them as much as possible. It is a necessary evil which we want to reduce. I think so long as you find the public will give to these people so long you will find these people about.

4797. But if the tramp kept to his route and received his mid-day meal, then every penny he got from the public would be so much to the good; he would be able to spend it on beer and tobacco?—Yes.

Major A. F. Poulton. 4798. Whereas at the present time he may have to spend some of it on his mid-day meal, for instance. Do you not think that in that way the way-ticket system might possibly increase the number of the regular tramps?—I do not think so myself; I think the more conditions you can put on a tramp and make him obey, the more likely you are to reduce the number of tramps; that is, as long as you treat him justly.

4799. Have you any sort of rules as to whom you prosecute for sleeping out; I suppose your men will not prosecute every one who is found sleeping in the open?—Yes; every one that we find sleeping out with no visible means of subsistence we bring up as a rule.

4800. Would he be prosecuted if he was not near any buildings or ricks where he might do harm, say if found out in the open downs?—Yes, we very often bring them before the magistrates. The magistrates very often let them off if they promise to leave the town. We get incalculable mischief done by these fellows sleeping in a hay stack.

4801. Heath fires, etc., are very often caused by these people?—Yes, very often, but, of course, they are also caused by mischievous boys playing with matches.

4802. You have not so many commons as some other counties?—We have a certain number; for instance, Mortimer common, Cookham common and Greenham common.

4803. Your constables are not appointed inspectors of common lodging-houses, I think?—No.

4804. The inspection is done by people appointed by the local authority expressly for that purpose?—Sometimes, and sometimes it is not done at all.

4806. But to inspect a common lodging-house does not require very high technical qualifications?—Oh, no.

4807. You want to see that it is clean and not overcrowded?—That is all you want to see really; the sanitary officer could do it, and does do it, I believe, in several places.

4808. Is there any reason why the police officer in the ordinary course of his duties could not do all the inspection that was necessary?—I do not think there is any reason except that there seems too much tendency now whenever there is doubt about any work to let the police do it. Take the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act; they thought it was a little matter, and they put into the Act that the police shall enforce the Act. There is a great deal of duty cast on the police by that Act, and you are taking the police away from the work that they were originally appointed for. Take a London constable; what does he do outside his ordinary duty?

4809. But a London constable has to regulate the traffic, say in Piccadilly, which is rather different from anything that your men may have to do?—You have got a great many more men. The London policeman does legitimate police duties. In the country, on the policeman you put every conceivable thing.

4810. Of course, the further you go back the more you find the constable had to do all sorts of duties, besides arresting criminals?—I think you should not put too much on him, otherwise you break the camel's back.

4811. At the present time, do you not think when a policeman is going his round in his district, he can do his work really better if he has a good many things to give his attention to?—Yes, but do not take him too much away from his work. Remember, these men are three or four miles apart in the country; it is not like in a town, where the constable can look round the corner and see another policeman.

4812. What other extra duties have your men to do besides those under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act?—They perform duties under the Explosives Act.

4813. Are any of them relieving officers?—Yes, assistant relieving officers; I attribute great value to that.

4814. Of course, that does not take them off their beats?—That is in towns chiefly, close to the workhouses; they have got a printed book and they give a ticket to the vagrants and send them up to the workhouse. When robberies have been committed, or anything of that kind, and there comes into the police office a description of a man, very often a police officer is able to say, "I have just relieved that man and sent him to the workhouse."

4815. Are your men inspectors under the Petroleum Act?—No, the Petroleum Act is relegated to the local authorities.

4816. And they do not appoint police officers for the purpose?—No; the work used to be done by the police, but the local authorities do it now.

4817. And you think that at the present time your men have as much of these extra duties as they can reasonably perform?—I think so, certainly.

4818. You have a good number of gipsies in Berkshire, have you not?—Well, we are running them out very fast by means of the sanitary conditions which are being imposed upon them.

4819. (Mr. Davy.) You have bye-laws dealing with them?—Yes, in different places. That is doing more good than anything.

4820. The gipsies are a distinct nuisance?—Certainly.

4821. (Mr. Simpson.) You will be glad to be rid of them?—Yes, I think so on the whole. The chief trouble about a gipsy is that he breaks down people's fences and cuts the trees; at Ascot we have nearly run them out altogether.

4822. They form quite a distinct class?—Yes; but I think they are dying out a good deal.

4823. (Sir William Chance.) You referred to there being certain main lines of route through Berkshire to different parts of the country. Now take first the main road to Bath through Swindon; could you tell me the unions on that road?—Starting from Reading, the first union is Bradfield.

4824. Now, is the Bradfield workhouse on the main road?—No, it is off it. The next union is Newbury.

4825. Is the workhouse there on the main road?—It is close to the town, which is really on the main road. The next union is Hungerford; that is actually on the main road.

4826. On the main road to Oxford you go through Wallingford?—Yes; that is a very important place, because you get men there coming not only from Reading and from Oxford, but also from the different roads in Oxfordshire. Wallingford is on the border of Berkshire and Oxfordshire.

4827. Is the workhouse on the main road?—No, it is a little off the main road. Then you come to Abingdon, where the workhouse is a good way from the main route. But the chances are that a man going to Oxford would not touch Abingdon; he would go right on to Oxford; it is only twelve or fourteen miles from Wallingford.

4828. Now, going towards London from Reading, one route lies through the Wokingham, Easthampstead, and Windsor unions?—Yes, the Easthampstead workhouse is a little off the road, but it is so close to Wokingham that it is not very much used. Windsor is off the route.

4829. (Mr. Davy.) Is not your county peculiar in that the river is the county boundary, and many of the unions are partly in two counties?—Yes, some of the parishes are on the other side of the river.

4830. (Sir William Chance.) There are two other unions, Wantage and Faringdon. Are they on the main road?—Wantage is on the main road, but Faringdon is right away. Some of the tramps, however, branch off from Swindon to Faringdon, and from Faringdon across to Abingdon and get across to Oxford in that way.

4831. With regard to the table of vagrancy in your report, I want to compare the figures for 1898 with last year, 1904. I take 1898, because it is the year previous to the war, when there was a great decrease. In all the unions, except three, there has been a considerable increase in the number of vagrants?—Yes.

4832. The three unions are Wokingham (where the numbers are very small), Wantage and Old Windsor. In Wantage there was a very large decrease, 4,755 to 2,376, and in Old Windsor there was an equally remarkable decrease, 6,286 to 3,792?—Yes.

4834. As regards Wantage and Old Windsor, can you say when the separate cell system was established?—The separate cells were, I understand, adopted in those places in 1898 or 1899.

4835. In both of these unions there has been a great decrease of vagrancy since 1898. That seems to show clearly the effect of the separate cell system?—Yes. Perhaps I may add that these tramps are funny fellows in the way they take different routes. There is tremendous freemasonry between them, and they follow each other like sheep on lines. Sometimes they take one route, and sometimes another; it just depends on which route they get most charity, or so-called charity, from the public.

4836. Another point I wished to draw attention to was that the workhouses which lie off the main road, are not much frequented by vagrants. An instance of that is Bradfield?—That is so. Another case is Abingdon, where you have a town of over 6,000 people, with only 664 tramps relieved during the year, showing that they are off the road.

4837. As regards the question of uniformity, you think that it is as possible to secure uniformity in the treatment of the casual poor as in the treatment of criminals?—I do not see any reason myself why it should not be.

4838. Is it not the fact that the prison system is entirely worked by officials, while the poor law is worked by popularly elected authorities?—Yes.

4839. Do you think that if you had crime dealt with by a popularly elected body you would be able to get uniformity?—No, but I cannot see why the officials should not lay down regulations which the elected bodies must conform to.

4840. And how are you going to force a popularly elected authority to carry out what the Local Government Board say; it has been tried you know in the case of vaccination?—Yes, I know.

4841. It would be a very difficult matter for the Local Government Board?—But you give a loophole now; you say they may or may not have certain food; if you say they must have certain things, it would be easy.

4842. Supposing the guardians refused, what are you to do?—Well, grants are made to poor law authorities by the county. I cannot see why the guardians should not be made to conform to certain things as a condition of receiving the grant; we have to conform to certain things.

4843. You must admit there is a difference between a system worked by officials and a system worked by popularly elected authorities?—Yes.

4844. Do you think that it might be possible to work that part of the poor law relating to vagrancy under a system of officials; to take it out of the hands of the guardians altogether and put it under officials who would have to carry out the law or be dismissed; do you think uniformity could be secured in that way?—I am hardly entitled to express an opinion on that point, but I think you would have constant friction between these two different authorities.

4845. Do the police in your county take action under the Industrial Schools Act, 1863, in regard to vagrant children?—Yes, where it is likely that the magistrates will send them to the schools. We do not bring them up unless there has been some offence.

4846. You do not take the children simply because they are with vagrants on the road?—No.

4847. What system was formerly adopted in your county as regards giving food to vagrants?—I must say I am not altogether in favour of the system. There was a charity fund in the county, and out of it the police were empowered to give a mid-day meal of eight ounces of bread to men with a ticket. Well, to a certain extent I quite agree with that in regard to men who were passing through towns, but in the villages it is rather different. and I understand that in many cases the police officer was rather disinclined to be away from his home and leave his wife to deal with the hungry tramp who called; they did not like to see these fellows about, and that is exactly what the cottage people near the road now feel. They give to these fellows from fear more than anything else; and my idea is that we should, by way-tickets, confine the tramps to the main roads as far as possible. That is what I meant when I said that I did not altogether agree. I do agree with these fellows getting the food, but I say, if possible, we should confine them to the main roads and not allow them to go into the lonely country roads where they are more likely to commit crime. They are not so likely to commit crime in towns and places where they are spotted and seen, as they are in lonely country routes where they break into a house when, say, the people are out at work in the fields. We get a great deal of larceny from these fellows in connection with cottages which are left for the time being.

4848. (Dr. Downes.) You spoke of the supervision of common lodging-houses as being a desirable thing; do you mean by the police or by the sanitary authority?—I mean by both.

4849. Do your officers visit the common lodging-houses?—Yes.

4850. Do they make reports to you?—Yes, they report to me if they see anything particularly wrong, and if they do, I try to bring it to the notice of the authorities.

4851. You are speaking of the sanitary side. But do you visit them with the view to finding men who are wanted?—Oh, yes, every day.

4852. And do you visit the casual wards also?—Yes, if there is any reason to go there, but we do not make a regular habit of visiting the wards.

4853. You attach importance, I think, to the police being in touch with the vagrant population?—Yes.

4854. You think the police should be acquainted with their movements?—Yes, certainly.

4855. Both in the casual ward and in the common lodging-house there may be men who are wanted by the police?—Quite so.

4856. And I think you said there was a good deal of mischief done by the people who slept out and the vagrant population generally?—Yes, certainly.

4858. How then would you deal with the existing state of affairs?—I believe with a very little improvement in the treatment of the vagrant and the establishment of labour colonies for the habitual with some system of identification, you would not go very far wrong, as long as you level the diet up to that of the prison. If the Act had a fair trial and there was a uniform system throughout the country, I cannot help thinking that a great deal of good might be done with the present officials without taking the work away from them.

4859. With the exception of the suggestion as to grants, I do not think you have given us any idea as to how this object is to be obtained?—Well, my system is to have a way-ticket; to give the same food throughout the different unions, so that a man should not have a preference for one union in place of another as now; to have the work, so far as possible, on similar lines, and to have similar detention. Now, I will take an instance: at Reading, which is a big town with nearly 80,000 inhabitants, I understand that the guardians will not let the casuals do any work. Well, what is the result? They used to have 300 tramps a week there, and now they have 400.

4860. I quite agree as to the desirability of uniformity, but what I want to know is how are the Local Government Board under the existing condition of things to enforce it?—Well, I am afraid I am not the legislature;

Poulton. do.

11 April 1905. 4861. (Captain Showers.) I see by your returns that the number of tramps apprehended for misconduct in workhouses has increased enormously; they go up from 84 in 1899 to 186 in 1904?—I will give you also the figures for 1897 and 1898 to agree with my tramp return. In 1897 when the number of tramps was 37,000 there were 75 cases of misconduct in workhouses and 83 cases of drunkenness; and in 1898 there were 77 cases of misconduct in workhouses and 62 cases of drunkenness; so that comparing 1897 with 1904, you see there is a very great increase in cases of misconduct in workhouses, although the number of tramps was about the same.

4862. Do you know of any special reason for that increase?—The reason I think is this: there is a tremendous freemasonry between these people, and they are beginning to find out that they are better cared for in the prison than in the workhouse. If that once gets known amongst these fellows your prisons will be filled by them. I will tell you a case we had the other day. Three men came to the police and said, "Lock us up; we have just taken this out of a shop." They went before the magistrates, and the magistrates said, "Do you wish us to deal with you?" "No, we want to go to prison; quarter sessions are in three weeks." They knew when quarter sessions were coming on, and they knew that quarter sessions would not give them very much. These fellows are as clever as monkeys.

4863. As regards the finger print system, you would have the marks taken in the country sent up to London; you would not have a separate system for counties?—No, you must have a system for the whole country, and it should be under a regular expert in London; Scotland Yard now issue an illustrated circular showing all the different criminals with their photographs and their histories. It is of very great assistance to us. Why could we not have that done in the case of incorrigible rogues, that is to say, men who have been three times committed under the Vagrancy Act. If we had that we should know an incorrigible rogue when he came into the county. It might give a great deal of trouble at first.

MR. BALDWIN FLEMING, General Inspector of the Local Government Board, called; and Examined

Mr. Baldwin Fleming. 4872. (Chairman.) You are a General Inspector of the Local Government Board?—Yes.

11 April 1905. 4873. Your district, I think, comprises Hampshire, Dorsetshire, and Wiltshire?—I have not got the whole of Wiltshire; there are two unions not in my district; I have fifteen out of the seventeen unions in Wiltshire; Swindon and Cricklade are not in my district; with these exceptions I have the whole of the county. I have the whole of Dorsetshire, the whole of Hampshire, and the one corner of Surrey which includes the Farnham union.

4874. You have no part of Gloucestershire?—No.

4875. You have had considerable experience, no doubt, in regard to casual paupers?—I think so; during a great number of years.

4876. We have had a good deal of evidence with regard to the existing way-ticket system in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire, and many witnesses have been in favour of some sort of way-ticket system being made general all over England; now what is your view?—It is a point upon which I hesitate to express a confident opinion because I am extremely doubtful whether you can get it generally used, and I do not see what is to happen if you attempt to enforce it, and it is not used. In my three counties there are three different systems at work, or rather in two there are systems while in one there is no system. In Dorset the mendicity society arranges for bread tickets. In Hampshire at the present time we have no system of either way or bread tickets. In Wiltshire they have way-tickets, which include bread tickets. So that in Dorsetshire there is bread only, in Wiltshire there is way-ticket and bread, and in Hampshire there is neither. But I think it may interest the Committee to know that Hampshire was probably, so 4864. It would make the system very much larger than at present?—These fellows will not face the finger prints now. In Berkshire there is more racing than anywhere in England, and they are going to start another racecourse at Newbury. We want to establish the identity of these fellows. Two men came to Ascot last year; they will never come again; their finger prints were taken; they said they had never been up before, but next morning their histories came down. "Six months" is what the magistrates said.

4865. With regard to the question of the police taking over the casual wards, would there not be difficulty as to the female tramps; you could hardly require that the policeman's wife should look after these women?—No, I do not think you could do that at all.

4866. You think that the handing over of the wards to the police would give them too much work?—I will not say that I would have any objection to an old police officer being appointed superintendent of a casual ward, after he has finished his police duties. Lots of police officers leave the force now in the prime of life and take their pension. He would probably be a very valuable man; but I would not appoint as superintendent the active police officer who has quite enough to do now.

4867. (Chairman.) You mentioned that tramps go to cottages and frighten people into giving?—Yes, they exercise a sort of terror. They will not go until they get something. They say they are starving.

4868. We were told that in the north there have been a great number of these cases lately; have you had many cases of men using threats in demanding food?—Yes, we have had a great many complaints from cottage people.

4869. Is that sort of thing on the increase?—I think with vagrancy it is on the increase.

4870. Well now, if a man were compelled to take out a way-ticket that manifestly might be a check on offences of that sort?—Yes.

4871. The way-ticket would contain his description, and in any case of complaint of begging might be a very good means of identification?—It would be a most valuable thing for us.

far as I can find, the first county that did start both a way-ticket system and a bread system. In 1870 a committee was appointed for the county; they presented their first report to quarter sessions in 1871. It was signed, and, I believe, drawn up by the late Lord Carnarvon, who took a very great interest in the question.

4877. That was a committee to consider the question of vagrancy in Hampshire?—Yes, it was a strong committee; Lord Carnarvon was chairman, and it included Lord Eversley, The Right Hon. Wm. Francis Cowper Temple, M.P., Sir Henry Percy Gordon, Sir H. St. John Mildmay, Sir Nelson Rycroft, George Solater Booth, Esq., M.P. (afterwards Lord Basing), and various other leading men in the county.

4878. It was a committee of quarter sessions?—Yes. They recommended practically that the way-ticket system and the bread ticket system should be introduced.

4879. Was the system the same as that now in force in Gloucestershire; there, as no doubt you are aware, the way-ticket contains a provision for the mid-day meal of bread?—Yes, that was the Hampshire system. The system was that when a man applied at the workhouse, in the morning after he had done his task the master should issue to him a way-ticket in the form which they prescribed, and on the presentation of this pass at the next workhouse, and it being made clear that the prescribed journey had been performed, the master of the next workhouse should give the applicant the same privileges—that is, only a short labour task—as in the previous union. The committee proposed the provision of the wayfarer's mid-day meal, and stated that they were aware that in this they were "recommending a new, and it may be thought by some an over indulgent mode of treatment"; but they proposed that such provision should apply only to the wayfarer, that it should be granted only in consideration of a full day's journey; and they thought that it was important, if not actually necessary, in order to maintain the distinction between him and the criminal tramp, and that if only it could be made generally known, it ought to put a stop to the "unfortunate practice of indiscriminate almsgiving in the county." Well, they worked the system, and in 1872, they report that out of 415 passes which had been issued, only 120 had been given up leaving 295 unaccounted for. And that is my difficulty.

4880. Well, that would imply that the men who had received those passes did not complete the journey?—Quite so; possibly that they threw them over the hedge directly they got outside the workhouse. The committee state that they would "not undertake to assign with certainty the causes of this. That there have been special difficulties incident to the commencement of a new system is probable; that errors have likewise been made in some unions in the issue, the filling up, and the recall of the passes is certain, and that there has been fraud on the part of the vagrant is equally clear." In 1868 the late Sir John Lambert, when he was one of the Poor Law Inspectors, delivered a lecture on "Vagrancy Laws and Vagrants" at Salisbury, and he referred there to a suggested ticket system and he expressed himself in somewhat strong terms against the introduction of such a system, and I must say that I think his arguments are very weighty. For instance, he says "Let us suppose, however, that vagrants who can give no account of themselves, or who make false statements as to their antecedents, are committed wholesale to gaol. We have next to consider how they are to be dealt with when their term of imprisonment is over. Are we to give them passes, as if they were honest labourers in search of work; or are we to turn them adrift to continue their career of vagrancy, and when they reach the next police station to be sent to prison again?" Unless the way-ticket system, if it be not enforced, have some penalty attaching to the failure to comply with its requirements, one does not quite see how it is to cover the ground that it is desired to cover. That is my great difficulty. It is said that there are some 30,000 vagrants; I do not know whether any correct estimate of the number of vagrants in England is to be obtained. Those that come under the Poor Law, I believe, do not exceed between 6,000 and 7,000 individuals so far as we know, but it is estimated that besides these there is a very large number roaming about the country, and that probably there may be somewhere between 20,000 and 30,000. Well, would it be possible to apply any way-ticket system to all of them, or would the system be merely confined to those who come within the purview of the Poor Law?

4881. The Gloucestershire system is limited to persons who use the casual wards. It has been suggested to us that the ticket should be issued to show the place to which the man is going, the route he will follow, and where he may get a mid-day meal. If the man does not arrive at his stated destination, that would be prima facie evidence against him that he is not bona fide in search of work?—Well now, what would be the practical result of that? The man gets his ticket at "A;" if he does not turn up at "B" (the place to which he says he is going) nobody will know what has happened; unless he goes back to "A," there will be no means of identifying him.

4882. Unless you have at the various casual wards descriptions of these men?—They change their names very constantly; you cannot identify by name; it is extremely difficult to identify a casual. Whether you could do it by a thumb print or not, I cannot say.

4883. Finger prints have been suggested to us as a means of identification?—Yes, but I doubt the expediency of the way-ticket from another point of view. Suppose an honest man enters the county, say Wiltshire. When he gets to his first workhouse in that county he is to say where he is to go in Wiltshire or beyond Wiltshire, and if he is going to a town in Wiltshire they give him his route to that town; if he is going beyond Wiltshire, they give him his route through to the point nearest to the county into which he wishes to go. But supposing that he be an artifice of any kind who is looking for work, how does he know when he gets to the first workhouse in Wiltshire where he is going to find the work that he wants? It is only by enquiring about him in the county, that he can find out where there is a market for his labour.

4884. It has been suggested to us that there should be some system by which, at the various casual wards or the police stations, information should be furnished as to where work was available. If you could combine this with the way-ticket system, the man would have some good chance of getting to the work he wanted?—I think it is probable that the way-ticket system would have a certain amount of beneficial result; it might help those who really wanted to be helped.

4885. You think it would be some advantage?—But my own experience is that they are so very few that it is hardly worth while trying to institute a system for their benefit only. I think they get what they want as a rule by other means altogether than any county way-ticket system. To begin with, any man who belongs to a trade union or a trade society does not go on the road at all. In the enormous majority of cases he does not work until the very day when his work is exhausted, without knowing that his work is going to cease, and that he must look for it elsewhere, and through his trade society or union he generally is able to command sufficient funds to get from place to place. It pays him very much better to buy a third class ticket on the railway than it does to waste a week in tramping. The class that you have to deal with qua vagrant, who really are looking for work and who wish to get it, are, I believe, extremely few. I should be only too delighted to help them in any way one could.

4886. There is another aspect of the question. At present, a man is turned out of the workhouse to walk, we will say, twelve or fifteen miles; he has no visible means of subsistence, he has no food given him when he leaves the workhouse and he has no money in his pocket to buy food. If he begs anywhere he commits a criminal offence. What is that man to do; surely it is contrary to human nature that a man should not ask for food from somebody on the way, whereas if you give him a way-ticket which provides for a meal of bread you prevent the necessity of his begging?—Of course, I thoroughly agree with every word you have said, but I doubt whether the way-ticket would help very much to provide any sort of remedy. The bread ticket I thoroughly agree with. I do not at all agree with giving him bread or a meal before he leaves the workhouse to carry with him, because I do not think you have any guarantee that he will use it for the purpose for which it is intended. But I think, quite apart from the interest of the individual himself, that it is extremely good that he should have the means of obtaining what may be described as the mid-day meal, because it will take away the excuse of starvation as the plea for begging. I think I am not far wrong in saying that a great many of those who apply for the bread meal in Wiltshire do not use the bread. Many police constables could tell you that they have found the bread chucked over the hedge after it has been taken by the vagrant; but it would be a very great thing to do anything which could induce the public not to give the indiscriminate alms upon which the vagrants are now able to live. And you know it is a curious thing that if you want the origin of a way-ticket system you must go very far back. In the Statute of Labourers in the 14th century, there was practically the beginning of the way-ticket system, and in Richard II.'s time there was a definite way-ticket system. In the lecture I referred to, Sir John Lambert said: "One of the obvious defects in the Statute of Labourers is that if a man went to a distance, and was employed there, his master had no means of knowing whether he was a fugitive or not; and accordingly the Statute of the 12th of Richard II. enacted that no labourer should depart from the hundred where he was living without taking with him a license under the King's seal, which for this intent was to be assigned and kept by some good man of the hundred; and all persons were prohibited from hiring a labourer who had no such license. Moreover, able-bodied beggars were absolutely forbidden to beg; and beggars 'impotent to serve' were required to abide in the town where they were then dwelling. But if the people of such towns would not or could not support them, then they were to draw themselves to other towns within the hundred, or to the places where they were born, and there to abide for the rest of their lives." There you have the first introduction that I know of a way-ticket system. That goes back to the 14th century. Well, I do not think it did much good in those days and so far as my knowledge of the way-ticket system goes it has never been satisfactory in its working hitherto. It is perfectly true that it has never been generally tried throughout the country.

4887. It would be more likely to succeed if it were universal?—Yes, its general application might make it much more effective than it has hitherto been. It has never been carried out systematically and applied over large areas or under a uniform authority, and it is very difficult to argue from what has been done what might be, if the system were introduced under more favourable circumstances. But the great difficulty undoubtedly is the indiscriminate alms which are given by the public, and some of you may remember a poem, which in its day attracted some attention, by the late Lord Houghton, when he was Mr. Monckton Milnes, a poem entitled "Almsgiving," which you will find in the collection of his poems, and in which he puts in a most moving manner how one is inclined, notwithstanding all the political economy to the contrary, to give when one is asked to give. There is a great deal of more or less influential literature in the same direction, and there is no doubt when we are appealed to by wretched, miserable-looking objects we are very much inclined to think that we would avoid inflicting cruelty upon them and risk giving to worthless individuals; and I think there is no doubt that our forefathers felt the same thing. I believe in that Statute of Labourers, or in one of the statutes about the same time, it was actually made penal to give to beggars; the offence was put upon the giver and not upon the receiver.

4888. If you had a way-ticket of general application, I suppose you would have it worked mainly through the medium of the police?—I think that must be so; in fact, to a very great extent that is so now; in practically the whole of my district, police have been appointed for the relief of vagrants.

4889. A policeman is appointed assistant relieving officer?—Yes, or is the officer to whom a vagrant is to apply for a ticket. Of course, that does not relieve the relieving officer himself, if application is made to him, but the police are appointed assistant relieving officers for vagrants.

4890. You are strongly in favour of the police being appointed assistant relieving officers?—Oh, certainly.

4891. That has been recommended generally?—I do not see who else is to do it. It is not that I want the police brought into contact with destitution as apart from crime at all; and I do not know that the police care very much to have the work put upon them, but at the same time I do not see who else is to do it.

4892. Of course, the police have to watch the roads, and these men being almost always on the road, naturally come into contact with the police?—But a way-ticket system, if I may summarise what I have been saying, only appears to me likely to produce a certain amount of good. I do not think for a moment that it will solve the problem as to the treatment of vagrancy, and I think that probably it will be found in working to affect only a very small proportion of the vagrants.

4893. There is a very large number of vagrants who do not come into the casual wards, and who consequently would not have the way-ticket?—Yes, and many of those who do come into the casual wards will not bother to get the way-tickets, and if they have them will not stick to them, if they find it inconvenient to follow the route mentioned on the ticket.

4894. Supposing it were made compulsory that every man who leaves the casual ward in the morning should have a way-ticket supplied to him, and if he did not show that way-ticket it should be an offence?—I do not think you could make it an offence for which you could prosecute him; if you did, you would in a very short time have the gaols full.

4895. I do not say I should put the man in prison; but suppose the conviction was registered against him, and he was punished after two or three convictions?—But there would be a difficulty in ascertaining the previous convictions.

4896. The books of the casual ward could contain some record of the man?—It would be on the books of "A" that a ticket was given to him, but they would know nothing further, and "B" would not know anything about the man unless he turned up there.

4897. But his description could be registered both at "A" and "B"?—Yes, you would have to communicate to "B" a list of those who had been sent on to "B," and then if they did not turn up a note would be made to that effect. That might have a certain amount of value; but it would be extremely difficult to make use of it as attaching to the individual.

4898. The scheme requires a good deal of consideration?—What I am looking at is this, supposing the system were introduced, and it was very largely disregarded, there would be considerable difficulty. You see, you are dependent upon so many people and there may be attempts by boards of guardians to make the thing a dead letter; and in fact they have done so to a very great extent in Wiltshire.

4899. Of course, that is a point against the scheme?—There are not only the guardians, but their officers. Now, for instance, there are over seventy workhouses in England where there is only one male officer. Well, supposing seven or eight sturdy vagabonds turned up there; it stands to reason that they would do as they liked; and I have known a case in one of my unions where the vagrants always got on swimmingly with the master; that master went away, and he was succeeded by another master, and the moment the second master came there were endless difficulties with the vagrants. The guardians said, "How is this? We never had any bother with vagrants under the old master. Why should we have all this trouble with vagrants under the new master?" It was simply because the old master let the vagrants do as they liked, and the other tried to enforce the law. But what are you to do when you have one male officer only and a considerable number of men turn up; is it to be supposed that they can be bathed; is it to be supposed that he can make them work as he wants them to work; where you have got separate cells you have got a better chance of doing something, but where you have an associated ward they are practically masters of the situation. Of course, the masters will not own that they are beaten; but, as a matter of fact, when there is one master against a dozen sturdy vagrants, one knows who is master of the situation. Well then, again, where there are no lodging-houses, what is to happen? There are a great many places where there are no lodging-houses at all. There are a number of such places in my own district: for instance, in Dorset there are no lodging-houses in the following towns: Beaminster, Bridport, Cerne, Dorchester, Sherborne, and Sturminster; in Hants there are no lodging-houses in Alresford, Catherington, Droxford, Fordingbridge, Hursley, Kingsclere, New Forest, Petersfield, Ringwood, South Stoneham, and Stockbridge; in Wiltshire there are no lodging-houses in Amesbury, Marlboro', Mere, Pewsey, Tisbury, Westbury, and Wilton. Well, if a man who has money to pay for his lodging goes to one of those places and cannot get lodgings, he is obliged to go to the workhouse. It is no fault of his.

4900. Well, then, at any rate, he comes under the control of the guardians?—Yes; but I mean he may be a perfectly honest and good workman, and a man whom one wants to encourage from every point of view and help on his way.

4901. But surely the way-ticket does that?—He would not have a way-ticket; he would apply for relief without his way-ticket in the middle of a county, and then he would be penalised.

4902. But if you had a general way-ticket system, would he not have a way-ticket before starting?—No, because he would not have been at any workhouse, as he was able to pay his way as he went along; it is only when he finds himself at a place where there is no lodging-house that he has to go to the workhouse. I have no doubt there are other counties in the same position; I only mention it as a difficulty which appears to me to deserve consideration.

4903. You have already told us that there is a very great lack of uniformity in casual wards?—Yes.

4904. There are a great number of casual wards where there are no separate cells?—Yes.

4905. I suppose you would agree that it is very desirable that there should be separate cells in all?—I think that is one point upon which one is really very clear because that has a two-fold benefit; it is extremely distasteful to the professional tramp, and it does offer a respectable lodging to the decent wayfarer, so that in the interests of both classes it is a thing to be encouraged. The difficulty about that is with regard to Sundays, and with regard to working; unless you have separate working cells as well as separate sleeping cells, you do not keep the men entirely separate. I believe that some justices have held that it is not fair to keep a man in solitary confinement if he happens to be detained for four days. If he is there on Sunday, at some places it is possible that he might be kept even for five days. Where a man has refused to work under those conditions, justices have refused to convict. They say it is not fair; nobody has any right to keep a man in solitary confinement for four or five days when he merely goes to ask for the relief of destitution; therefore, the separate system is not so easy to work in practice as it is beneficial in theory.

4906. Another reason, I suppose, why there are so many places where there is a deficiency in cells is because the guardians do not like to incur the heavy expense of providing this accommodation?—No doubt that is so. You have, I know, obtained a very careful return, showing what number of unions have separate cells. Some of the cells are very good and some are very imperfect, but still they do give separate accommodation and decent accommodation, which is the point of view from which I should chiefly recommend them.

4907. Of course, if it were thought to be necessary and desirable that there should be separate cell accommodation everywhere, it might easily be worked by a grant from public funds or from the county to the poorer boards of guardians, who in fairness ought not to be called upon to pay the cost themselves?—I have no doubt whatever in my own mind as to the advisability of the separate cells; I am perfectly clear about that; and, further, I think they ought to be put up at a very much cheaper rate than that at which they have hitherto been constructed. I think the requirements of the Local Government Board, guided chiefly by their Architectural Department—I do not say that it is so now, but certainly it has been in the past; I say it with all respect to the Board—have been very very far in excess of what I should have considered the necessary expenditure for the desired accommodation.

4908. Then, you are strongly in favour of the system obtaining generally?—Oh, certainly; and, what is more, I do not myself see the hardship of making the cell system complete separation whilst the vagrant remains in the workhouse; I think it is very much better that it should be so, even if the period of detention is shortened for the purpose, than that they should be allowed to get together while they are in the workhouse. With regard to Sunday I do see some difficulty, but I do not think it is an insuperable difficulty. There are several unions where the guardians have arranged either that there shall be special services for the vagrants, or that the vagrants shall be admitted into the service in the workhouse chapel, a special portion of the chapel being reserved for them. I think any vagrant who wants to attend service on Sunday should be given the opportunity of doing so; I think if that were done, it would probably remove a great deal of public prejudice against the complete separation whilst the vagrants are in the workhouse.

4909. With regard to sentences by the magistrates for poor law offences, for sleeping out, etc., do you see any practical utility in sentences of three, or five days?—No, sir, they are absolutely ridiculous. Within the last three or four months I have cut out paragraphs that have come under my observation in the newspapers as to sentences which have been inflicted. I find that it is by no means uncommon—I have got a list of instances here—for men charged with begging to be discharged on promising to leave the town. “Discharged the prisoner on his promising to leave the town at once.” Here is another, “Discharged her on condition that she quitted the city within an hour, failing which the police were again to arrest her and she would be severely dealt with.” Well, those are discharges on promising to leave the town. Then there is a series of one day imprisonments.

4910. Probably the first sentence was the more sensible of the two?—Yes; and here is a case where the one day imprisonment is actually complicated by a 2s. 6d. fine or one day; and the newspaper report says “the alternative was accepted and the prisoner was therefore discharged on the rising of the court.” There appears to be no sort of system; you get from the “discharged on condition of leaving the town immediately,” to the “2s. 6d. or the one day,” or “the one day” without the 2s. 6d.; then you get a three days’ imprisonment or 16s. 6d. That was 2s. 6d. fine and 14s. costs.

4911. In that case no doubt the man had been brought a considerable distance by a policeman. That would account for the 14s. costs?—Yes, very possibly.

4912. And if he were sent to prison, that would probably cost the county at least £1?—That is the point I was going to put to you.

4913. (Mr. Davy.) And would probably bring the vagrant nearer to where he wanted to go?—Yes. Then there was another case of a man sentenced to four days’ hard labour. Mind, these are only from newspaper reports; I only give them for what they are worth. Another, where the man was fined 9s. 6d. including costs or five days’ hard labour, and then you get to the very ordinary penalty of seven days’ hard labour. Well, when Lord Carnarvon started in 1871 the committee to which I have already referred, one of the conditions that they tried to obtain was that all the magistrates should agree to fourteen days as a minimum sentence, and they failed. They produced a very considerable amount of success, but by no means uniform success, even with the influence that that committee was able to bring to bear. At the recent Hampshire assizes Admiral Field, speaking with regard to vagrancy in the county, is reported to have strongly advocated uniformity of sentence, and that not less than fourteen days should be given. He pointed out that seven days only meant four days work: the day of admission, the day of discharge, and the Sunday not counting. The one day sentence does not really do much harm because the man is kept in the court and is discharged when the court rises. But a three days’ man is actually sent to prison for one day; whether he does any work there or not, I do not know, and he is discharged on the next day. That means that a constable must actually be taken off duty to accompany him to the prison, and must return to his station after having delivered the man at the prison.

4914. Yes; it frequently costs £1 at least?—There is not only the loss to the county of the money that is spent, but the constable is withdrawn from his duty for certainly a considerable part of one day and possibly for more. I speak with all respect and deference as regards the magistrates in the different parts of the country, but I think that the cases that I have mentioned, assuming them to be correctly reported, do show a most unfortunate lack of uniformity, and that the present practice amounts to something very nearly approaching to the ridiculous in the discharge of the law in that particular direction.

4916. Do you mean cases of sleeping out?—No, I mean cases in which from physical incapacity or other causes it is evident that the man cannot work, will not work, and never will be able to work.

4917. He ought rather to be dealt with in an infirmary?—He ought to be sent to some other institution than the prison and detained there. But if you will permit me, I will refer to that later on. Of course, uniformity of treatment in the casual wards as they exist to-day, you will never obtain under the present régime; the thing is absolutely impracticable even if it were desirable, but looking to the enormous variation of the situation and the character of the individuals who apply for relief, you cannot apply any uniform treatment. The proportion of vagrants who are over sixty is very large. I got out a return in which I endeavoured to trace the ages of vagrants twenty years ago and now. That was in 1884 and 1904. I am sorry to say that the records for 1884 were very imperfect, and in a great many unions I could not get them, so that I had to get the nearest year I could to 1884. Some of them were as late as 1898, 1894 and 1890. But taking them for what they are worth, spread over the nearest years that they could get to 1884, they show that the numbers of vagrants have increased largely, but that the numbers of those of considerable age have increased very much more. For instance, in the earlier years during the whole month of October there were 47 men and 8 women who were over seventy in the vagrant wards in my district. Now, in October of last year, there were 147 men and 25 women who were over seventy. Well, then, if you take them between sixty and seventy—twenty years ago or thereabouts there were 530 men and 53 women. Last year there were 1,764 men and 131 women. That seems to show that a considerable number more of elderly people are roaming about the country and using the vagrant wards, than used to be the case.

Mr. Baldwin

4918. Would not that also rather suggest that these people are better looked after now, and so their lives are prolonged?—I think that to a very great extent it is probably owing to the influence of the Employers' Liability Act and to the indirect effects of the trades unions, that no man who is past middle age now stands much chance of getting permanent employment. That is a very serious fact, and one which has to be dealt with. Where employers of labour have to pay the full wages for all the labour that they employ, they will only employ perfectly capable men; where they could pay below the average rate of wage they did not mind employing a less capable man, because they paid him less; but there seems to be a requirement—I am speaking without perfect knowledge now—that everybody belonging to a trade union who is employed shall receive the standard rate of wage, whether he is worth it or whether he is not; he is not allowed to work for less than the standard rate, and the master is not allowed to pay less than the standard rate. I understand that is so; I am speaking subject to correction. That being so, it stands to reason that the employer will not take an incompetent man; he cannot pay him only for what he is worth even if he is not quite up to his best labour; he must pay him according to the standard rate; the result is that every man who is a little past his best gets elbowed out. Then in the same way with regard to the Employers' Liability Act; the middle-aged man now stands a poor chance of getting into a permanent new situation, unless he happens to be an exceptionally strong man.

4919. Your conclusion is that the effect of the present system is to create more pauperism in the latter days of people's lives?—I think it certainly has an influence in driving a good many people past the prime of life into the ranks of the destitute, and I think that the figures which I have given you to some extent bear that out.

4920. (Mr. Simpson) Could you say how far these numbers have increased proportionately to the total number of vagrants?—I have not worked out the proportion, but I can give you the details. The total number twenty years ago was 5,685; the total number now is 14,301; whether the proportion would work out higher I do not know, but I apprehend that it would. Of course, this must not be assumed to be the number of vagrants actually relieved; many of these have been counted over and over again. These are cases relieved during the whole course of that month. They would be counted as they passed from union to union, so one individual might be counted many times.

4921. (Mr. Davy.) The Hampshire experiment was a long time before the Casual Poor Act was passed?—The Hampshire experiment was just about the time that the Pauper Inmates Discharge and Regulation Act, 1871, was passed.

4922. It was before the detention for two nights was authorized?—Oh, yes.

4923. Do you not think that detention would have an influence in getting way-tickets used; you see the way-ticket would let a man off the two nights' detention?—Yes, he would only be detained for one night, and he would do his task of work in the morning; if the way-ticket system could be enforced at all, I think that the morning task is a mistake; I think it is better to let a man go directly he is up, so that he may get his day's work outside. Even if he did a task and you let him off by nine o'clock, it would practically prevent him getting his work for that day.

4924. The detention for the two nights gives the administration a hold over the man which it had not before?—Yes, only they do not exercise it.

4925. But that is its effect?—If it were done.

4926. They do not detain for two nights?—No, I am sorry to say they do not, only a few of them do.

4927. You are in favour of the bread ticket system?—Oh, certainly, because it takes away the plea of starvation.

4928. How would you give the bread ticket?—Well, that is an open question. In Dorsetshire it is done entirely by private subscription, and bread tickets are available at all the police stations; they may be obtained at many of the gentlemen's houses; all the subscribers have them, and I rather think they are given to clergymen; I am not quite sure about that.

4929. Anybody may get a bread ticket?—Yes, and I do not see why he should not. In Dorsetshire it is not confined to the vagrants who go to the workhouse.

4930. It is more a mendicity society matter than under the Poor Law?—The Dorsetshire system is worked by the mendicity society; it is not under the Poor Law.

4931. If this Committee recommended that system, it could not be enforced on private charity?—No, but I should not at all object to that being a public charity; I think it is a very reasonable public charity, if kept within proper limits.

4932. If it were a public charity, would you pay for it out of the rates?—Personally, I should not object to pay for it out of the rates. My own idea would be to pay for the whole of vagrancy out of the national funds; it is a national charge; not a local charge; I would much rather vagrancy were not a local charge.

4933. Would you give the bread tickets through the police?—I would give the bread tickets through the police, the magistrates, and the clergy. I would afford every facility for giving the bread tickets, but then I would undoubtedly prosecute for a misuse of the bread ticket.

4934. Would you improve the diet in the casual wards?—Oh, certainly.

4935. What would you give?—Well, that is a difficult question to answer, but I cannot see myself why a vagrant should not have the same diet as an able-bodied inmate; I should think that that would probably be the best rule.

4936. The vagrant is only in for two nights and one day; he may get a good meal when he is out?—Yes, but during the day he is there he is put to work. As a matter of fact, some of them are in the most miserable condition. It is perfectly true some of them are well fed, but I have seen a number who are most miserable.

4937. Would there not be a difficulty in giving the ordinary workhouse diet, because this varies from day to day?—I would let them have what the able-bodied man has on the particular day, merely for convenience of administration.

4938. On some of the days the able-bodied have a worse dinner than on others?—Never so bad as the vagrants; nothing so bad as six ounces of bread and one and a half ounces of cheese.

4939. Would you give the vagrant a meal when he leaves the ward?—Not to take with him; I would give him nothing to take with him because you do not know how he would use it. What I should like to see would be that the vagrant should be properly fed whilst he is in the workhouse, which I do not think he is now, and that after he leaves the workhouse he should have the means of obtaining food in the middle of the day, so that he may keep going until he arrives at the next workhouse.

4940. Would you undertake his whole feeding so as to do away with the necessity of his begging or stealing?—Quite so.

4941. It would do away with the excuse for begging?—Yes.

4942. Would you have absolute uniformity in the way of food for the vagrant?—I do not see how you could possibly get absolute uniformity; I do not see myself why it should not follow the diet, whatever the diet may be, in force in the workhouse in which the vagrant finds himself.

4943. Do you think uniformity is desirable under poor law administration?—It is a difficult question to answer; no doubt if you could get uniformity which could be judicially and evenly applied everywhere you would do good, but it appears to me to be quite impracticable to achieve it.

4944. Do you think you would get uniformity in the task of work, in any way?—No, I do not think you could.

4945. Stones vary in hardness, do they not?—They vary very much in hardness.

4946. It is practically impossible to regulate a task in one union which shall be as hard as a task in another union?—I do not think you can possibly do it; I have thought out and seen, and to some extent tried, a good many different tasks, and the most even task, to my mind, is corn grinding, with a crank wheel of a fair size, not too large and not too small; but even that you cannot say is an even task, because if a man has a weak heart it will catch him, you see; but given an ordinary average man of average strength, corn grinding, to my mind, is the most even task that I know.

4947. Because it is quite unskilled?—It is absolutely unskilled, except in so far as physical strength is affected. No doubt a strong man will do it more easily than a weak man. I would not make that task a task of quantity, although I know what may be said to the contrary; I would make it a task of time, because directly you get quantity—

4948. You get an element of want of uniformity?—Yes, unevenness again.

4949. Well, now, what means have the Local Government Board of enforcing uniformity?—None; no practical means.

4950. Practically the guardians and their officers can do as they like?—Yes.

4951. Within certain limits?—Yes, because there are no means of coercing them. If an officer frequently does what he ought not to do, of course the Board would step in. With regard to the guardians, the Board have practically no power. It would be extremely difficult for the Board to interfere with officers who are acting in accordance with the wishes of their guardians.

4952. It would be impossible to expect a uniform administration from a great number of elected local bodies?—I think so; but then I guard myself further: I think, when you consider the classes of people that you have to deal with, that uniformity is not desirable; I do not think that there are two decent men who come to the vagrant wards who are fit to be put to the same task.

4953. But uniformity of detention you could get?—Yes.

4954. And uniformity of comfort?—Certainly.

4955. Can you expect uniformity of detention and comfort from unions of varying circumstances?—I think it would be very difficult to obtain it, unless there were much stronger power given to some authority to enforce uniformity than at present exists.

4956. Would you see any advantage in having a county authority instead of the guardians—say quarter sessions, standing joint committee, or county council?—You would not get uniformity there, unless you got all the counties to agree to what they would do.

4957. Would you get it within the county?—Yes, you would get it within the county.

4958. And if the system were administered by the police, it would be by paid officials?—Yes.

4959. There you would have an element of uniformity?—Yes.

4960. Do you think that that would be a desirable thing?—Certainly.

4961. By way of bringing the whole vagrant class under one administration?—Yes; I think that the advantages of that more than counterbalance the disadvantages of bringing the question of destitution under the police. Mr. Baldwin Fleming.

11 April 1905.

4962. The tramp is only accidentally a concern of the guardians, I understand?—That is so.

4963. I mean he came because he was an able-bodied man applying for temporary relief in case of urgent necessity at the door of the workhouse?—Yes; it does not follow that he was able-bodied, because many of them are not able-bodied.

4964. He was a non-settled man?—Yes; he was a man in urgent necessity requiring relief of a purely temporary character.

4965. Before that he was purely the concern of the police?—If he was a criminal, not otherwise.

4966. I meant vagrants?—Well, in so far as public order was concerned.

4967. There is a class of vagrant to which you referred, the persons who are wandering about to their own hurt; how would you deal with them?—If I had carte blanche to create my own scheme I would do this: I would divide all vagrants into three classes; first of all, those who are apparently incapacitated from earning their own livelihood; those I would take charge of and send them each to their own unions and keep them there with a power of permanent detention, unless there was sufficient reason for letting them out afterwards. There are many old and apparently helpless creatures wandering about the road to their own great discomfort, to the great annoyance and nuisance of other people, who can never by any possibility earn their own livelihood, and it would be very much better that they should be permanently detained in some institution where they could be carefully looked after and properly provided for. That would dispose of that section. Then there would remain those who can work. Those I should divide into those who will work and those who will not work; those who will work, I should endeavour to provide for by means of labour bureaux and agencies for placing them where work could be found for them; something might be done in that direction anyhow. Then that would leave you with those who can work and will not work; for those I can see nothing but compulsory detention in a labour colony.

4968. Which would practically be a prison?—A prison but very unlike a penal prison. It would be a place of detention where they would be made to work, and where, after a time they might be let out.

4969. Where at all events they would be kept off the road?—Yes.

4970. (Chairman.) A prison much in the same way as is a reformatory school?—Yes.

4971. (Mr. Davy.) Do you ever get complaints from the weakly tramps that they have tried to get into a workhouse and failed?—No, I never remember a complaint that they could not get in. I have very often thought they were not looked after with the sympathy and the consideration which they deserved, when I have seen them in the workhouse; that is, that they have been treated on a uniform system just as if they were not weaklings and incompetents.

4972. You quite think that if they came to a decent master of a workhouse and asked for admission they would get it in most cases?—Yes, certainly.

4973. But I suppose if they never came before the master at all, but some subordinate officer, then they might have a difficulty?—The thing might occur; I have never known it to occur; it has never been brought to my knowledge. Personally, I dislike the idea that a vagrant must walk so many miles in order to earn his right to anything that he may wish for. I have known cases of hardship of that kind, and I must say chiefly in the hands of the police. A man will apply in one place and the police officer will say: "Where have you come from?" He will name the place he came from. The policeman will say:—"That is only four or five miles off; that is not enough; you must walk on five or six miles" to some other place which he will name. It appears to me that is a very great hardship to which a man ought not to be subjected.

Mr. Baldwin Fleming. 4974. You say you would compulsorily detain these weaklings?—Yes.

11 April 1905. 4975. Would you do that in an ordinary workhouse?—Yes, I would send them to the workhouse of their place of settlement.

4976. Would you approve of the principle which is in force in some countries that no one is allowed to discharge himself from a public institution without the consent of the governing body?—No, not for ordinary inmates; I would give special powers with regard to the weakly vagrant.

4977. How would you distinguish a weakly vagrant?—Assume that you go round the vagrant ward and want to carry out my suggestion, and you find two or three of those cases; you should have power to keep those cases whilst the enquiries were being made. When the enquiries were terminated, you would find out to which union the individual belonged and he would be removed to that union and kept there. I would give power to guardians to apply to justices for an order of that description, and, when justices had given the order, the guardians to whom that vagrant was committed should be bound to detain him as an ordinary pauper chargeable to the union.

4978. But the compulsory detention should be preceded by some judicial process?—Certainly. I think you must have that for the protection of the individual. And further, no doubt, the individual, under certain circumstances at all events, ought to have a power of appeal so that he might be able to obtain his discharge on sufficient cause shown. It is quite possible a man might come into money; it is quite possible that relatives who are not able to look after him to-day may be able to do so at some future time; there may be conditions in which it is legitimate to let him out again, but unless he can show that there are means of maintenance apart from his former mode of life he ought to be detained.

4979. In whose hands would you put the power of discharge?—In the hands of the guardians.

4980. Who would discharge him soon enough if he had means?—Yes.

4981. You do not apprehend there would be any undue desire to keep him locked up?—No; the only hesitation I have about putting him in the hands of the guardians is whether they would keep him at all. I am not quite sure that I would not safeguard that by providing that guardians should apply to the justices for an order of discharge in cases where the committal was by order of the justices. You might commit him to a union, and the guardians might say we do not want the bother of these old folks; we will turn them out again.

4982. You would object to interference generally with the purely voluntary nature of the English workhouse?—Certainly I would.

4983. You would merely give the power of detention for this class?—Yes, because there are special conditions attaching to this class.

4984. The justices, of course, would be able to have a medical certificate before they made compulsory orders for detention?—All the necessary details would have to be worked out so as to prevent hardship.

4985. I gather that you consider very strongly that the wandering about of these poor people is a public scandal?—I think so, certainly.

4986. A cause of offence?—It is a miserable life to them and a nuisance to everybody who comes across them.

4987. Do you think that the present system is a satisfactory one?—No, I think it is most unsatisfactory, and I am confident of this that nowadays, at all events, you will never get rid of vagrancy by mere repression; you want much more than repression. There are a great many of these people who ought to be helped and there ought to be the means of helping them.

4988. Repression has been tried in the past?—Always; it has always been repression; there was nothing but repression, and repression has always failed. Repression is very good as applied to a certain section of the vagrants, but taking the whole class we want much more than that.

4989. (Mr. Simpson.) You mentioned corn grinding as a uniform kind of labour; is it not rather expensive to put up machines for corn grinding?—I do not know what a corn mill costs, but I should not think it is much more expensive than providing other means of enforcing a labour task.

4990. I suppose you look upon it simply as a means of putting paupers to hard work?—You do get a certain amount of good from it because you can adjust these mills to whatever you may want them for. You can either grind corn or barley, or you may bruise with it; it might be adapted so that you could cut chaff. I do not see myself why a good deal of useful work should not be got out of the grinding machines.

4991. Would you say in that way it was a more economical form of labour than wood cutting or stone breaking?—I would not say more; I think it would be quite as much so.

4992. A certain amount of capital expenditure is necessary in fitting up your mills; it is not like stone-breaking for which you do not need any plant?—That depends on how you do the stone breaking. If you do stone pounding, which is very frequently done, you require a certain amount of plant.

4993. Stone pounding with a mortar and pestle; are you in favour of that as a form of labour?—No, I should consider stone pounding a very uneven task; the skilled man will do it without the least difficulty, and the man who is not skilled will find it difficult. At Andover they had a stone pounding task, and "Truth" took up the extreme hardship to which the vagrants were said to be exposed. On one particular day when I visited the ward, I think there were eight men pounding stone, and six out of the eight had got more or less troublesome blisters. At any rate they had blisters and they were all stopping work, and they were allowed to stop work because they had blisters. And there were two had not got any blisters. I said to them "How is it you are not blistered?" "We could get blisters fast enough if we wanted them; we do not want them; we want to get on; anyone can blister their hands stone pounding if they want to." But I should like to add that I do think stone pounding is skilled work. The man who knows how to do it will do it with very little effort.

4994. (Captain Eardley-Wilmot) But stone breaking requires much more skill?—Yes. It all depends on the trick of getting the vein of the stone. That is just the trick in stone pounding as well as stone breaking.

4995. (Mr. Simpson.) In stone pounding you have got your stone in a mortar with the pounder coming down upon it; you cannot guide that as well as you can a hammer?—Indeed, you can guide it; the rammer always has a good deal of play. There are several ways of doing that task; there are some mortars where you pound with a rounded rammer; others are square boxes in which the base of your rammer is also square. Then there are very different classes of stone; you might get black flints which are quite hard; you might get red flints which are comparatively soft. The man who knows how to do it will pound with very little difficulty; the man who does not will find it hard work.

4996. When people speak of vagrancy being a serious question they may mean one of four things; they may mean that the vagrant increases the criminal classes, or that the vagrant is a nuisance to poor people about the country, or that he is an expense to the ratepayer, or lastly that vagrants are a perfectly worthless class and for philanthropic reasons we ought to try and reform them. For which of these reasons should you think vagrancy was important as a social question?—I should think in all four ways; they are perfectly true.

4997. And all equally do you think, or would you attach more importance to one view than another; I want your personal opinion?—It is four different ways of looking at the same object, and I think to get at the true consideration of vagrancy and to get to its true position you must take into account all four considerations.

4998. You think vagrants are really a serious burden on the rates?—Well, they cost extremely little to the rates so far as the actual cost of the relief of the vagrant is concerned; I suppose the average cost of a vagrant is not much more than 2½d. a day; a pound and a half of bread and two ounces of cheese.

4999. To put him into a labour colony and provide him with work, would be a much more costly process?—I do not agree with you; in the long run it would be less costly. In regard to the particular individual it would no doubt be more expensive, but one would be quite prepared at all events as regards that section to which I have referred, to try it; it is a means to an end.

5000. You would look on a labour colony as a means to deter people from a life of vagrancy?—I think more to find other provision for them than to deter.

5001. And in that way to relieve the rates in the long run?—I think so.

5002. (Sir William Chance.) What class of vagrant would you recommend for the labour colony?—Those who can work and will not work.

5003. And under what authority do you think the labour colony should be?—I should be perfectly willing to use any labour colonies that are in existence, given the power to detain. I do not think that you will ever succeed in doing what you wish with that class of vagrant without the power of compulsory detention. Whether you will reclaim is quite another question. The history of labour colonies does not show that they have been successful, so far as my information goes, anyhow.

5004. Would you approve of a voluntary labour colony to which vagrants could be committed by the magistrates?—I should not object.

5005. You see no objection to that?—I do not see the evil of it.

5006. Like the Salvation Army colony for instance?—If they have the means of keeping the men, and if they have the means of enforcing the detention; it would be rather a farce to commit a man there if they have no power to enforce the committal.

5007. You spoke of remedial influences being brought to bear upon the vagrants; it could possibly only be done in such a colony?—I think so.

5008. Not in an official colony of a penal nature, such as Mersxplas in Belgium?—I would rather have as little penal nature attached to it as possible.

5009. You have paid a good deal of attention to the question of child vagrancy?—Yes.

5010. Do you think the law wants strengthening or altering in any way?—I think the law wants strengthening very much, but the question bristles with difficulties and I have never solved them in my own mind. To begin with, one has an initial objection to do anything which will really take the parental responsibility off the parent, and if on any large scale any system of adopting the children of vagrants were instituted, anybody who wanted to get rid of a child would simply have to become a vagrant pro tem in order to place the burden of the maintenance of his children upon the public. It is extremely difficult to enforce repayment; one knows how difficult boards of guardians find it to get repayment from relatives, and I do not think that it would be possible always to make the parents pay for the children, if they were taken from them. I do not think any general rule can be laid down; I think it must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. If there is any hope of the parents ever doing their duty to the children, that hope ought to be encouraged as far as possible. If the case is absolutely hopeless, and it is quite evident in the interests of the child that the only thing to do is to take it away from the parent, then I should be willing to take it away from the parent and as far as possible make the parent pay.

5012. Does the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children act in your district at all with this class of children?—I do not know sufficient to offer anything like a reliable opinion about that. I have no doubt it does deal with them to a certain extent.

5013. Have you noticed whether child vagrancy has been diminishing in your district?—Well, it is diminishing, but last year it went up again. The number of child vagrants is very small; taking the whole of my district, I do not think I have ever had more than a very small number on any one night.

*Mr. Baldwin
Fleming.*

11 April 1905.

5014. The numbers are not large compared with the total number of vagrants?—Oh, no. Now, on the last Wednesday in December of 1903, which is the last figure I have here, in the whole of my district, that is Dorset, Hampshire, the Isle of Wight, Farnham, and nearly all Wiltshire, there were only 8 children.

5015. That is in the whole of your district?—Yes, on the 30th December, 1903; while on the 29th June, 1904, there were only 10 children in the whole district.

5016. I suppose it is very rare that they go about with a male vagrant; they are generally with a woman?—Generally a woman, but you do sometimes see a child with a man.

5017. Where there are common lodging-houses in existence, is it at all a practice for the vagrant to resort to the casual ward for his night's lodging, and to send the woman with the child to the common lodging-house?—I should think it is not uncommon, but I cannot answer that with any precise knowledge. I think it is a common thing when a gang of vagrants are going about that one of them goes to the common lodging-house and takes the money belonging to the gang and the rest go to the casual ward in order to save the cost of going to the common lodging-house. As to the women and children, I cannot answer your question.

5018. If the children went to the common lodging-house that would tend to reduce the numbers in your return?—No doubt.

5019. One of your objections to the way-ticket system is on account of the common lodging-houses?—That is an incidental objection; my chief objection to the way-ticket system is that I think it would be found in practice to apply to so very small a number of vagrants.

5020. Would it not be of advantage to establish some system forcing the tramp to make use of the casual ward instead of the common lodging-house?—I do not think it would have that effect.

5021. You do not think it would have any effect on the bona fide wayfarer, if he had a way-ticket and wanted to get on from one place to another?—He would rather go to the common lodging-house, pay his threepence or fourpence, and go away when he liked in the morning.

5022. (Mr. Davy.) Although he gets no food?—Although he gets no food; but your honest wayfarer, of course, would not have any difficulty about food, because he would be able to pay for it.

5023. (Sir William Chance.) But your point was that he does get into the casual ward in places where there is no common lodging-house for him to go to; you think that is a hardship upon him when he has not a way-ticket?—I think it is.

5024. Are you acquainted with the pass system in Germany; it differs from the way-ticket system?—In Germany, I believe, no one can move out of his town or village, or whatever the area is—I do not know how it is defined—without practically his passport with all particulars.

5025. Would you approve of the introduction of that system?—Oh, no; I think it is very un-English. That is one of my objections to the way-ticket system; I think it is very hard that an Englishman may not wander where he likes in search of his work.

5026. (Chairman.) The Englishman, who it is suggested should have the way-ticket, is a man who is being maintained out of public funds, whereas in Germany he is not?—I do not say for a moment the advantages of the way-ticket system may not outweigh the disadvantages, but one would not like it unless it were necessary.

5027. The difference between the German system and that is very great?—Oh, yes, of course it is.

5028. (Dr. Downes.) Have you any suggestion to make with regard to the supervision or management of common lodging-houses?—I should be very glad if they were better supervised and better managed than they are now, but I do not know, except as a matter of police and sanitary requirements, that there is any power now to do anything.

Mr. Baldwin Fleming. 5029. We have had evidence to show that some of them seemed to need more supervision than they get?—Oh, I have no doubt that is so.

11 April 1905. 5030. I do not know whether you could give us any suggestion?—They all have to be registered now, and that places them under sanitary supervision, and to a certain extent under police supervision. That might, no doubt, be increased with advantage so as to make it efficient where it is inefficient.

5031. You want rather more efficiency on the part of the local authorities?—I think so; I do not know whether further powers are required.

FOURTEENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 12th April, 1905.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair).

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain EARDLEY-WILMOT.
Captain SHOWERS.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary).

The Rev. J. L. BROOKS and the Rev. J. B. PATON, D.D., called; Mr. BROOKS Examined.

Rev. J. L. Brooks and the Rev. J. B. Paton, D.D. 5032. (Chairman.) Mr. Brooks, you are, I believe, the director of the training colonies at Lingfield, Surrey, and at Starnthwaite, Westmorland?—(Mr. Brooks.) Yes; the colonies are conducted under the Christian Social Service Union, of which the Earl of Meath is president; the Bishop of Hereford is chairman of the council.

5033. Where do you reside?—I reside at Lingfield, and have had the management of the colony on the spot from the first.

5034. You are then the principal of the colony at Lingfield?—Yes.

5035. Who is the resident head of the colony at Starnthwaite?—There is no resident head there; I have the direction from Lingfield of the Starnthwaite colony.

5036. I suppose you have a local manager?—Yes, a manager of the farm and a superintendent of the children's homes; I go there monthly to meet the committee and to direct through the committee.

5037. What are the numbers of the inmates of the two colonies?—We have at Lingfield at the present time sixty-two, and at Starnthwaite seventeen only; it is a small colony at Starnthwaite.

5038. At Lingfield and Starnthwaite you receive only men?—Yes. We have epileptic homes at Lingfield alongside the colony, but they do not concern the present question.

5039. The colonies, I believe, were established by the Christian Social Service Union?—Yes, sir.

5040. When were they established?—Lingfield ten years ago, and Starnthwaite five years ago.

5041. What number of inmates did you begin with?—We began with one man, and our limit is reached at sixty. Indeed, we have been making a little special effort because of the unemployed this year; otherwise we have only had about fifty before this year.

5042. What is the class of men that you receive?—They are largely from the workhouse, with a number of private cases; the workhouse cases are largely youths from sixteen to twenty-five years of age, who have probably been born and brought up in the workhouse.

5043. They are not casual paupers but actual residents in the workhouse?—Yes.

5044. They are sent by the guardians to your colonies?—Yes.

5045. What are your limits of age?—We do not take them into the colony under sixteen, and then we are supposed to have a limit of forty-five. As a matter of fact we have had a few over forty-five come to us.

5046. I suppose there is a difficulty in getting rid of a man; you do not like to turn him out if he is a decent man?—Yes, if he is a decent man and cannot get any work elsewhere.

5047. What happens if you do get rid of a man on the ground of age?—We have never had that difficulty before us. We have two or three really very decent men who have come on to the staff; two or three others have got work in the same neighbourhood, and we have never had to turn an old man away yet.

5048. Would you kindly tell me what is the kind of life in the colony?—The order of the day is, we keep to farming habits; you see, as I have said, it is a training colony, not merely a labour colony, which is a great distinction. So we keep to farming habits for farming training. Our idea is chiefly to train for farming, so the men start early in the morning, as farm labourers would, and they keep the hours of farmers right through. We have a market garden too; we grow a good bit of fruit, and this is one of our elements of cost that people complain of; we send these colonists out on the farm as ordinary farm labourers to the market garden and to the fields. We also give them work in connection with horses and cows. We send them into the cow stable and into the horse stable, and let them work the horses, and milk the cows. This is one of our chief elements of cost, because if men are to be trained, then this has to be done; but if you are to have a mere labour colony, then the horses and cows need not be there; the men might simply dig and plant.

5049. Yes, but in a grazing country, it is a very good thing to teach men the other work. A man is valuable if he can milk well?—Yes.

5050. And you improve the status of the man as a wage earner by teaching him to milk?—Yes; our work would not have been of much value but for the element of training in it.

5051. Do you teach the men farriery or shoeing?—No, we have very little workshop work of any kind.

5052. You have not thought it desirable to introduce such work?—Well, if the colony were on a larger scale we could do it, but with our present methods and with our limited number of men, it would not pay. And then many of the men are of such poor physique and such poor intelligence; we find it is better to get to know what stamina and what intellectual powers they have, and then put them to the work that they can best serve in, in order to select those who are likely to make permanent farmers or carters, or men for Canada.

5053. Have you got a practical farmer as a head man to look after the work?—Yes, a farm superintendent, who is a trained farmer.

5054. What is the size of your colony at Lingfield?—250 acres.

5055. And you have sixty-two colonists?—Yes. (Dr. Paton.) But I may just say that a part is being appropriated for the establishment of a small co-operative colony of holders. We have already settled one, and there will be, I hope, six or eight. I only say that to show that practically we have only about 200 acres set apart for the colony just now.

5056. Part of the land is used, I understand, for general farming, and part for market gardening work; what is the acreage of that part?—(Mr. Brooks). We have eighteen acres in fruit and market gardening.

5057. You have a good deal of that work?—For a certain number of men that kind of life is much better than the ordinary farming. We get quite a number of inebriates, educated men; that is the other element of men that we have; and these inebriates with considerable intelligence can work better, and with more pleasure, among fruit and market gardening, than in the more monotonous work of farming.

5058. Do these inebriates come voluntarily to the colony?—Yes.

5059. Is your institution a certified inebriate home under Home Office inspection?—No. In our colony these men unhappily have to mix with the pauper element which is an undesirable thing.

5060. Have you any difficulty with the inebriates?—Considerable difficulty in getting them amenable at first to such an ordered life as we live.

5061. But do they leave you, do they get the craving for drink upon them and run away?—Yes, sometimes that happens, and would happen much more but for the element of Christian purpose and service that runs all through our work; the religious inspiration of it is one of its considerable values.

5062. Have you had cases of men bringing liquor into the establishment?—Yes.

5063. Do you continue to keep such cases?—We do for a time, because to dismiss them would be exactly to do what they have suffered from in their other work.

5064. I was thinking of the others; it might be difficult and dangerous for the other men, I mean?—It is difficult, and, therefore, they ought to be classified. This I have said again and again, but in such limited conditions as ours, classification of building and so on has not been possible as yet; we would like to have it, but we have not attained it yet. (Dr. Paton) I may say we are proposing as soon as possible, and we have already received one or two promises of money, to erect an inebriate home so that those inebriates shall be dealt with apart. It would be under the inspection of Dr. Branthwaite.

5065. Now, will you give us some information with regard to the financial position of Lingfield?—(Mr. Brooks.) The work is nil and worse than valueless because it is harmful sometimes. The reason for that is, first of all, the type of man, who is not only unskilled, but unwilling oftentimes; he is weak and dull. Sometimes the guardians have sent us some imbeciles, but these we have had to weed out. Then these men take more teaching than their work is worth, and even when they are willing to learn they do not know the difference between plants and weeds, and it is astonishing how long it takes to teach men this. People think apparently that farm work is easy, whereas it is a skilled industry of a very high type, and it takes a good bit of learning. Then there is the waste, and the malingering, some of which necessitates the doctor's intervention sometimes, so that the work is really valueless; and sometimes they do harm, wilful harm as well as wilful waste, chopping up things that they have no business to, and so on.

5066. I suppose you have overlookers to see how they do their work?—Yes, we have overlookers, and they have to be numerous in order to avoid those things, and get the work well conducted so as to be of real service.

5067. Have you a good deal of spade labour?—Yes, a good deal; spade, and hoe, and fork, and so on.

5068. You would naturally put the less skilled men on the simplest forms of labour?—Of course, as you know, this work is often pressing; to-day now is the spring; everything must be in and you concentrate all effort upon it and get all that is possible done. We have learned, therefore, to distinguish between the institution as an institution, and the farm; and we separate now farm losses or gains from the institution as an institution; and as an institution it costs us, as near as we could get it, 9s. 6d. per man per week. Then the cost per bed, has worked out to about £66, independently of farm and stock implements. Farm and stock would add another £94 per bed, making a total of £160 per bed, capital expenditure. The cost of the farm stock is another reason for the cost of the men; we might keep them for much less were it not for the fact that we are training these men at considerable cost and loss.

5069. Have many of the men got situations with good wages, owing to their having been taught in your colony?—We have always averaged one-third of our men getting independent positions, and the last three years we have had 44 per cent.

5070. How long as a rule do you keep a man before he is able to get a situation?—Of these men who have proved the possibility of making a livelihood and being self-supporting, there have been scarcely any that have not taken from fifteen to eighteen months.

5071. After from fifteen to eighteen months on the average, you are able to send a man out as a more or less expert gardener or farm labourer?—Over 40 per cent., and considering the material we have had we think this is very remarkable.

5072. What has been the result when they have gone out to situations?—In so far as you can trace them the results have been good, but as correspondents they are not very willing. One has difficulty in having correspondence with one's own family, and correspondence with these men you can neither force nor coax; but we have good records of quite a good number of those that we can follow. And I ought to say here that the largest number of our men go to Canada, and in going to Canada we have rather a crucial test. The High Commissioner would not take a pauper into Canada unless we undertook to bring him back if he became chargeable to the rates. We have never brought one back.

5073. Do you receive letters from them?—Sometimes. Not half of them correspond; such as do correspond are doing fairly well in Canada. (Dr. Paton.) I should like to emphasise this point, if I might, because I think there may be some misunderstanding. This problem is different from the vagrant problem as you are dealing with it to-day. These men are almost all debilitated, worn-out lads, broken down slum children, who have been permanent residents in the workhouse. I mean the great proportion of them; and it is to build them up physically and mentally, and morally, that we have given ourselves to this work.

5074. These are men who probably would become vagrants?—Well, they might; though probably they would not have the physical vigour for a vagrant life; they would be the inmates of your workhouses, many of them in the infirmary, or in the imbecile ward; they deteriorate rapidly, both physically and mentally.

5075. What is the average amount of the earnings of these men which can be set off against the cost of their keep?—(Mr. Brooks.) Nil; we say there is nothing.

5076. What number of hours do they work per day as a rule?—Nine to nine and a half.

5077. From what you say these men do not appear to be ordinary strong labourers; what is the ordinary rate of wages for labourers in the district?—2s. 6d. per day.

5078. Well, what would you say that these men are worth?—You see it would take any six of them to do a man's work, and that six want a man to superintend them, so that it is nil all the while; and then, with us you have this to take into consideration, that as soon as a man does become handy he is sent away and the novice comes; we are always dealing with novices. If we could keep our trained men we could make them work.

5079. The men who are digging, for instance, how long do they work?—They dig nine and a half hours a day.

5080. A man who could use his spade at all could do a good deal in nine hours' digging?—What he digs you would use a horse for, and you would not dig at all if you had not that man. You see you could plough or use machinery for so much less cost than he is. You would not dig as a rule, and if you had many fruit trees the only digging would be where the plough could not get, and when the man digs there he does more harm than good.

5081. You probably put the more skilled man to dig round fruit trees?—You are obliged to have some trained men amongst fruit trees, but you cannot get superintendents enough to put awkward squads everywhere.

5082. What are your average annual receipts for fruit?—Our fruit was all planted when we went there, and it is only just coming into bearing. Last year was one of our best years for apples, but unhappily apples could hardly be sold last year, they were very cheap.

5083. As a matter of fact, you deal very little with vagrants?—Very little.

5084. Do men come to you and ask to be taken in?—Yes, they do, but we do not take such cases; every man must come from some authority—either from the workhouse or from his family and must have a subsidy.

5085. Do you have the same dietary for all; do you encourage the good labourer by giving him a better diet, if he does better work?—We have an awkward squad for that and for disciplinary purposes, and the newcomer, and the man who is in need of some little discipline has a breakfast without meat, say; otherwise that is the only difference. Our encouragements are given by allowances for tobacco; we allow the man I speak of to have an opportunity by his grant to get a little tobacco; if he has misbehaved he is limited to the farm; if he is going on in proper behaviour he can leave the farm sometimes and go to the village.

5086. What control have you?—We have only moral control.

5087. I mean, if the man was determined to leave the farm he could walk off?—Yes; and if he walked off we should bear with such a man and give him another opportunity most likely. If he persisted in doing this, he would have to go. This is one of the reasons why quite a number have to go. (Dr. Paton.) The reason why we did not make the distinction in regard to the dietary that would be quite proper in an ordinary labour colony is, that many of those young lads who come to us need physical invigoration; and we have to give them good food though they are utterly worthless as labourers. If we were to judge them and treat them according to their labour, we should put them on the poorest diet.

5088. Quite so; but if out of your sixty you have ten men who are really doing good work, would you not give them some little extra allowance of food?—They have that in the way of grants; we give special grants to them, and they are allowed from these grants to provide for themselves, if they like, some delicacies in the way of food. They have special grants given to them, those who do special work, and we endeavour to save that money for them, so that when they leave they have something in hand. (Mr. Brooks.) There are other ways too; we have one ward full of cubicles, and then we have individual beds; and a worthy man has one of these beds. He has a little grant too, and other privileges about the place. Those are the incentives we have for better work; but a principle which has always guided me in this matter is—I have said, “You have no business to give your best men even a dietary that is over and above that of a good farm labourer; if you do this you are undoing with one hand what you are trying to do with the other,” and the farm labourer says, “It is no use trying; these men fare better than I.”

5089. What I meant was that if you had a man who had done a good day's work with the spade, would you not give him a little extra allowance of meat or something of that sort to reward him for doing a good day's work?—His ordinary food would be quite enough.

5090. You have no power of detention whatever?—No, sir; that is very serious.

5091. What is the average time that a man will stay voluntarily with you?—I have not reckoned the average out; but in 1903 thirty-seven stayed for more than six months.

5092. And in 1904?—In 1904 fifty-four remained over six months.

5093. Have you had many men stay for more than a year?—Most of those going to Canada stay more than a year; it is not sufficient else. Now Laidon, the colony that Mr. Fels has bought for the Poplar guardians, is sending a large proportion of men to Canada, but they will not be trained farmers, so they will only get their position as navvies and so on in Canada. But we like to train our men so that they will be farmers in Canada; so that a few months is not enough. A man wants a few months among the horses, and a few months among the cows, before he goes to Canada. They all stay more than a year with us as a rule.

5094. Are you satisfied with the progress in health that the men make with you?—Yes, the improvement in physique is very remarkable; and I may say it is the very first start. There is no improvement in brains or labour until there is an improvement in physique; it is the first necessity.

5095. Then you would probably say that though there is no large monetary earning by these men, the State is gaining, because instead of these men having to be kept afterwards as men unable to do work, they are made into working men, who can keep themselves?—We think that is a very great gain to the State.

5096. That is a saving to the State as well as an advantage to the union?—I will give you an illustration of that very thing. Nine men came from the workhouse, physically deteriorated youths, who never had been men, and never would have been; they were with us an average of fifteen months, costing the union that sent them an average of £23 15s. per man. They all went to Canada; to the best of our knowledge they are in Canada yet; we have not brought them back. They never would have been anything but paupers in this country. We may safely say that they would have lived an average of twelve and a half years in the workhouse, and would have cost £270; and for £23 15s. they are independent people in Canada. It is a very remarkable and radical illustration of what is being done there year by year.

5097. And you can say that the men whom you have had under your own eye have improved materially in physique?—Oh, wonderfully sometimes; we weigh them and measure them, so that we do not go by mere look. The Duchess of Sutherland sent two boys, and came down personally to inspect them. When I brought one of them before her she refused to believe it was the same person.

5098. I suppose you have no absolute experience of labour colonies for vagrants?—No, sir.

5099. From your own experience in Lingfield, are you in favour of establishing labour colonies for vagrants?—Yes, without a doubt, not only from my experience in Lingfield, but from what I have seen abroad. I have studied the labour colonies in Germany, Belgium, and Holland; and I would strongly suggest labour colonies for vagrants where there was power of detention.

5100. Do you think, from the knowledge that you have of the vagrant, that he would be easily brought to be a good working man?—Not easily; certainly not.

5101. There would be some difficulty in getting work from a man who was determined not to work?—Of course, a percentage of them never work; but there are so many advantages in getting them segregated, that a considerable percentage would be brought into independent working men.

5102. Unless a man who was sent to a labour colony could be made to work, he would hardly be an acceptable inmate of that colony?—No.

5103. He would probably be a bad example to the others?—You want classification, of course.

5104. Now, what would you propose as being the best method of making a man work?—I should begin with his food. I should compel him to work, if I had detention, by piece-work and his food, and I should let his food be according to his work. Of course, when he was very feeble, it would have to be very wisely considered as to what he is to be given to do and he must be fed accordingly; but I think there is no possible incentive like food.

5105. And if a man clearly was physically fit for work, but refused to work because he was naturally an idle man, you would cut down his food, I suppose?—Cut down the qualities absolutely; give him only that which is absolutely necessary to sustain life. I should have very little mercy there. I am very strong on that.

5106. I suppose you are aware that without an alteration of the present law there is no other means of compulsion?—That is so. According to this morning's paper, a boy walked twenty miles back to Malling workhouse (in Kent) because the puddings were so good there. He would not have got puddings if he did not work, if I had my way.

5107. What work would you suggest would be the best work for a labour colony?—In such an institution as I suggest I would have the first part a labour colony pure and simple; in the labour colony everything should be exceedingly simple, food, tools, housing; I would make the men dig with fork and spade, and then graduate them into a better grade.

5108. Would you not also have, if you could, instruction in other work, such as simple carpentering?—It is so difficult to discover work that they can do to any profit, such as basket-making and mat-making; we have done a little of this, but it is always exceedingly difficult to get this work.

5109. As I understand you, the majority of your inmates are people of feeble health and feeble physique?—Yes.

5110. The vagrant is generally an extremely healthy man because he lives out-of-doors; would you not wish to teach that man some means of livelihood for himself other than agricultural work?—I would have it so that he could perhaps excel in that when he could not excel in agriculture and so on. Then I would have it for rainy days and so on; I would have other work, however simple.

5111. Then, generally speaking, in a labour colony you would have the possibility of teaching other trades as well as heavy agricultural labour?—But in my simple colony I would not have much of that; the man should graduate higher into my training school, as I call it.

5112. A man would be more valuable if he knew how to use an axe, than if he could simply use a spade?—Yes. (Dr. Paton.) I may say that our committee considered that it would be very desirable to secure that the colonies should be to a large extent independent; that other kinds of work should be done in the colony so that you should not compete with outdoor labour; get the wood-work and the iron-work that was necessary for your colony done in the colony; and it was even suggested that for that purpose the buildings of the colony should be chiefly erected by the colonists themselves.

5113. I think you told us that you have inspected some of the foreign colonies?—(Mr. Brooks.) Yes.

5114. Are you satisfied with them?—No, not by a good deal.

5115. What is their failing?—Chiefly, that there is absolutely nothing of a humane or inspiring nature. There is no recreation; there is a sort of police-like form of religion; no inspiration in it; men marched to church, where they stand to hear a homily and go through the prayers; then there is no organised play; there is no possibility of getting at the social instincts of men, and humanising and inspiring them with social conditions and educational purposes. Everything of that is absent, and I think this is the chief reason why it is as it is. This does not apply to the German colonies.

5116. It is dull routine instead of some system that would be calculated to amuse the men?—Yes.

5117. Do you find that your men lead happier lives at Lingfield from your system?—Yes.

5118. What do you do in the way of amusement for them?—It has become a sort of law with me that the boy or man who cannot or will not play will never make anything; so we organise their play, both outdoors and in; and we are better able to judge in the playfield than anywhere of what a man will be. So we have cricket in summer, football in winter, quoits and other things, and outdoor games. We make several opportunities for these; for instance we work a little longer for five days in the week in order that they may have a whole Saturday afternoon from 2 o'clock to play matches. All discipline in this way is easily managed by our superintendents and brothers, and it is their duty to enter as much into that play as into their work. Indoors, we have all sorts of indoor games, and also certain educational functions at work all the way along.

5119. Do you have music?—Yes, we have a piano in the room, and we have organised evenings where we have music and song largely; it is astonishing what talent there is in fifty men such as we have down there; it is very remarkable how the Saturday evening concerts are ordered. Then on Sunday we have a morning service, to which it is voluntary to come; and in the afternoon a Bible-class to which all the youths must come; and in the evening it is understood everybody must come, and I have no difficulty in a simple mission service. In the week day we have just what we call family prayer in the morning; and in the evening, a hymn; and other people come in from the outside sometimes, and bring their inspired helpfulness. Here I think is the chief difference between, say Lingfield and Merxplas. While they have advantages from their spartan-like discipline, those are outweighed by the utter lack of everything of the kind that I am speaking of, and unless you have a similar spirit in your labour colonies they would be out-door workhouses and nothing more.

5120. (Mr. Davy.) How far is your colony from London?—Twenty-six miles.

5121. And how far from the railway station?—Just over a mile.

5122. The land cost £12 10s. an acre, I think?—Yes.

5123. That would be cheap, would it not?—Very cheap, we think.

5124. You would not be likely to get land in that situation for less?—Not for less, certainly.

5125. Is it not heavy clay?—It is clay-loam.

5126. But not bad on the whole?—No.

5127. It is not land that would be likely to go derelict?—No.

5128. So that you have rather a bargain?—We think so.

5129. Your buildings are of very simple construction, are they not?—Very simple.

5130. What has it cost you for housing?—£66 a man for the building.

5131. That would include everything, the farm buildings and all?—It would include our new farm buildings, not the old ones.

5132. What would the dormitories cost?—Speaking from memory I think the contract for the dormitories alone was £1,000.

5133. How many beds would that provide for?—Fifty-six.

5134. Fifty-six beds for £1,000 in cubicles?—Three open dormitories, and one full of cubicles; that is four dormitories.

5135. And what did the dining-hall cost?—£250.

5136. For fifty-six men?—Yes; the dining-hall will have to be renewed. It is only in wood and corrugated iron. The dormitories are concrete and tiles. They are well built.

5137. How long have they been erected?—Seven or eight years.

5138. Do they cost you much in repairs?—No.

5139. Are they, in your opinion, satisfactory buildings?—Yes.

5140. Do you apprehend any risk of loss of life by fire?—No.

5141. You think the men might fairly be expected to get out even in case of fire?—Yes, the dormitories are arranged for that.

5142. Do you want any better buildings for that class of person?—I do not think so.

5143. Your dining-hall cost £250 and is built of wood and corrugated iron. How long has it been built?—Ten years.

5144. Has it cost you much in repairs?—No; 5 per cent. would keep it up.

5145. Do you think it will last you some time yet?—We would rather have it in harmony with the rest, but it will last six or seven years.

5146. (Mr. Simpson.) It was built for fifty-six men; would it be over-crowded if a larger number used it?—Well, as a matter of fact, there are sixty-four in it now,

Rev. J. L. Brooks and Rev. J. B. Paton, D.D.

Rev. J. L. Brooks and Rev. J. B. Paton, D.D. but we have a recreation room, and the men only dine there now; they do not have their recreation there.

5147. (Mr. Davy.) With regard to your staff, do you get any voluntary help?—No.

12 April 1905.

5148. Do you pay all your officers?—We do not pay them all, what you would call the full market value elsewhere; for instance, they have enough altruism in them to give their services to us for less money than they would get in their own spheres of labour; but possibly they are not worth more to us than what they come for, because they are also in training. I mean now the brothers. Mr. Hunt, for instance, is a man who would command more money than he has there; he is an expert in his line of business; so is our farm superintendent; so is our gardener. These two last are paid to the value that they would get elsewhere.

5149. But you get a certain amount of help from people whose heart is in the work and who are themselves in training?—For instance, Mr. Hunt could not be got for the money we give him; but the gardener, the farmer, the cow-keeper, and the labourer, all these men are paid the full. Our brothers, and also Mr. Hunt, are men who are giving much effort.

5150. Still, do you think that any institution would be able to get the staff work done at a cheaper rate than you do?—No.

5151. So that there is no economy possible in that direction?—No.

5152. Nor in the land or buildings?—No. (Dr. Paton.) May I suggest that we consider we are giving an equivalent to these brothers in the training they receive. We are giving them, in addition to what they receive monthly, distinct training, and we are making arrangements that the training shall be more effective and complete.

5153. I should like to ask a few questions about the accounts you have submitted to us (see Appendix XXVI.) Now who makes your farm valuation?—(Mr. Brooks.) A firm of valuers at Grinstead.

5154. The basis of cost you say is £160 a bed per man. That is the capital cost?—Yes.

5155. Well, at 5 per cent. that would be £8 a year on each man, would it not?—Yes.

5156. That is, the cost of the capital account per man is £8?—Yes.

5157. Then I see in the current account the loss is £173?—Yes.

5158. And in the farm account the loss is £813?—Yes; last year was an exceptional year.

5159. Making altogether the loss on farm account and on current account £986?—Yes. That would not be regarded as an average year, I think.

5160. No, but I am simply taking these accounts as they stand; they represent, for the fifty-five men, a loss of £18 for each man?—Yes; of course, one has to say that there would have been some loss with any farmer last year.

5161. So that the loss on capital and current account per man would be £18 plus £8; that is £26, roughly?—Yes.

5162. In addition to that the guardians pay 10s. a week?—For a time; that is only for three months; they do not pay 10s. a week all the time the men are there.

5163. What do they pay afterwards?—They come down to 7s. after three months.

5164. So the guardians pay £20 a year?—Yes.

5165. It is clear that the loss on the farm account and training colony account amounts to £26 per man; if I want to get at the cost per man per year I have to add to that what is received from the guardians; if you receive also £20 a year, the cost of each man would be £46?—Yes, that would be the cost of each man. But I should like to say with regard to the loss of £813 last year on farm account that it would be very serious and misleading if that were taken as the average yearly loss. Last year we lost more money than all the other years put together on account of the season. The actual ascertained cost over an average of three years is £33 10s. a man per year.

5166. What do you think of the question of finance in a farm colony?—I think the human asset is the thing that is worth working for.

5167. Do you not think that a considerable amount of harm may be done by people talking about possible profits from farm colonies?—Certainly.

5168. Do you not think that we ought to be quite honest in these matters?—Certainly.

5169. And that a farm training colony is an expensive thing?—Not as compared with other institutions.

5170. No, but it is not going to pay its way?—Not under any management in the world.

5171. Is there any recorded case where compulsory labour has paid its way anywhere?—No. (Dr. Paton.) I think that there is one colony that does pay its way—it is in Switzerland, on the Lake of Neuchatel.

5172. All reformatory work must be costly, must it not?—(Mr. Brooks.) Yes, sir.

5173. And you would say that you could not expect a profit on your men's labour any more than you could expect a profit from the work of a school boy in school?—Certainly, as a training colony.

5174. Is that putting it too strong?—I do not think so; it is school work.

5175. You say in your memorandum that your cows do not give you the same yield of milk under your colonists' hands as they would under skilled labour?—Yes

5176. That means that your cows are not milked out?—That is so. A cow is so sensitive that it will yield more to one than to another; consequently, it is doing her injury. We protect ourselves a little against that by putting these men on cows which are not our best.

5177. That is to say you must have a bad type of cow as an instrument for training colonists?—You must have a cow going off her milk, one it does not matter so much about.

5178. Is that a sort of cow that a thrifty farmer would keep?—Oh, no, a cow which has been giving milk for seven or eight months.

5179. Would you trust a valuable cow or a valuable horse to one of your ordinary colonists?—No.

5180. That does not make for economical management, does it?—No, but the training is worth it.

5181. You admit that farm labour is an extremely skilled occupation?—Not only admit, but I am preaching it up and down the country.

5182. It is a diversified occupation?—It takes more to make a farmer than a lawyer.

5183. Do you ever find that your colonists eat the fruit?—Yes, we have a good deal of trouble in that way.

5184. That does not make for economical management?—It would be a little difficult to prevent; the German colonies wire all round their fruit garden, and, of course, it is best to do that, but it is another capital charge. It is the same with poultry, they take your eggs and all that kind of thing.

5185. It all means extra supervision and extra cost?—Yes, and extra plant.

5186. Do I understand from you that if you were running a training colony on a large scale you would have some industrial work as well?—Yes.

5187. Workshops?—Yes.

5188. That would be useful as filling up men's time and as a means for training certain of them?—Yes, it would have both advantages—there is a good bit of time that the men cannot work on land, especially on heavy land, not only on rainy days, but when the land is drying. Workshops too, are valuable for training and finding out a man's bent. That would be of service in making a skilled workman of him, and getting him interested in the work.

5189. Some men would be fitted for industrial work and others for agricultural work?—Yes; my idea in all this is to make as many farmers as you can; you are not competing with so many people; farm labourers are scarce in this country.

5190. In agriculture you do not come across the trades unions?—Not to the same extent.

5191. And you have a means of getting rid of some of your men in Canada?—Trained farm hands are wanted in Canada.

5192. Still, industrial work on a large scale would be very desirable?—Yes, very desirable, if not necessary.

5193. Have you seen the industrial colonies in Germany?—No, I have not seen Magdeburg and the others, I am sorry to say; I have only seen what they do at Bielefeld.

5194. What do you do with your produce?—Our work at Lingfield we think is well planned in a certain direction; that is to say, we have a man working in a measure for the children, a sort of ideal arrangement with some encouragement for them too. Then the colony is arranged in order that we may use all secondary materials at home and send our best to market. We have a very good local market for a considerable amount of produce.

5195. What do you mean by "secondary materials"?—Well, in apples, we will say wind-falls and wasp-eaten ones, and all that kind of thing, and any vegetables and things that rain has slightly damaged, and such like, but absolutely wholesome and good stuff. These things we consume at home, sending our best to market. We send a good deal to Grinstead, which we find a very good market; there is quite a large residential population there.

5196. Do you sell from house to house?—No, we sell to the shops; only a little from house to house. Then, of course, having a population of 200 people, we take a good bit of food at home ourselves, you see; we want all our own milk at home, that is why we keep a large number of cows. In the epileptic home the children do not have tea or coffee, so we want a good deal of milk; milk, vegetables and fruit, we want a good deal of, so we are our best customers ourselves for these things. Then we send to London what we cannot sell locally; and, of course, do not find it a good market often.

5197. Have you ever had any objection on the part of the producers that you compete with them in your sales?—No; of course, we have done so little of house-to-house selling, only a few private customers who know the colony, and at the shops we never compete in price; we never undersell. Of course, there are people who say that having public money to equip our colony, that is an objection of itself; but taking the class of labour, it is balanced in that direction; but we never undersell at the shops.

5198. Have you had anything like—I do not say a riot or a mutiny—but open insubordination among your men?—No, not open insubordination; we have had isolated cases where discipline was needed, and then it is a good thing that we are big fellows perhaps.

5199. You can keep the men in check with your own staff?—We have never called in the police once, or had any serious difficulty.

5200. You are aware that that is a considerable trouble abroad?—Yes, I should think so. (Dr. Paton.) A friend of mine at Bradford asked the same question, but when he looked up at Mr. Brooks, he said, "No, I should not think you would have much trouble." (Mr. Brooks.) But, of course, the ordinary spirit of the place saves all that.

5201. You mean that there is a sort of tone about the place?—Yes, which saves all that; I think we have never had a serious difficulty at all; I have had an individual case of refusal, and a fight, and so on, but nothing that we could not easily settle ourselves.

5202. Have you observed any indication of a sort of mischief which might be expected in a colony of one sex?—Oh, yes, in two or three forms; there have been two or three individual cases that have come to one's notice where one could not help but suspect, but we have had nothing convincing. There is self-abuse, of course, and those kinds of things, and there has been admitted abuse of one another, but not to any serious extent, such as, I was led to believe, was practised sometimes in such conditions. The comparative absence of this, I think, is due to play and work and food. We try to keep our men in a hygienic condition, that is to say, we supply all necessary kinds of food that would help to keep in health, and then with the work and the play, and the spirit and the constant supervision, we have had no serious cases.

5203. It is just a danger to be watched?—Yes, and should be watched, otherwise it would be a very serious thing.

5204. As to training colonies for vagrants, would you say that compulsory detention was necessary for this class?—Yes.

5205. Have you formed any idea as to how long that detention should be?—I think certainly no good would come out of less than a year, but I would give a considerable sentence and then leave great discretion with the director.

5206. Even though that director were a voluntary officer?—Yes, I would not have him unless he could do his work well; I would rather pay him than have an inefficient volunteer.

5207. A man should only be sent to compulsory detention by a court of law?—Yes, but I would suggest that he might be liberated without a court of law.

5208. Who would have the opportunity of releasing him?—The visiting justices, in association with the director, I should say.

5209. And what sentence would you propose?—I think for most of the vagrants, three years.

5210. Do you think that a purely charitable institution like yours would undertake compulsory detention?—I should not like it at Lingfield; but I should like to have some place where I could send some of my cases.

5211. You would prefer some one else to conduct it?—Yes, I mean you could not do it with such a class as mine; I think you would spoil some of the good work that is done; but we must have a compulsory place somewhere.

5212. For the lower class of colonists?—So that from the free colonies men could be sent to it. I do not say that I would not like to have anything to do with guiding such a colony; I do not say it for that sake, but I think it would injure the free colony.

5213. But supposing that you had to work a compulsory detention colony, what means do you think would be requisite for enforcing the detention; would you have walls?—Not necessarily, I think. There ought to be some care at night to keep them in; I do not think necessarily walls, or soldiers to follow them, as in some cases we have seen.

5214. As they have abroad?—Yes; I think with the vigilance of police in bringing them back, it would be enough.

5215. Do you think a distinctive dress would be necessary?—No, I would not have it, if I could avoid it; at any rate, I would try without.

5216. Compulsory detention would naturally increase the cost?—Do you think so; I question whether it need do that; it might increase the capital cost if we finally had to have walls. I certainly would try it without, because we are fairly well knit with our police, and if a man got away altogether he would get into another colony.

5217. He would get caught again?—He would get caught again; I would rather run those risks than have walls.

5218. Even in a populous country like this?—Yes.

5219. Do you get your men direct from institutions in most cases?—Two-thirds of them come from work-houses, the other third are from families chiefly, now and again drunkards; and a few cases where the magistrates have not wanted to send a youth to prison and have asked us to take him over. There have been three or four such cases, and they have been of very great value.

5220. Who pays for such cases?—The boys' friends.

5221. It is a friendly arrangement, perhaps suggested by the magistrate?—Yes, suggested by the magistrate.

5222. Do you think it is an advantage to you that a colonist should have come to you from an institution rather than from his own home?—No, it is not an advantage; he thinks he has certain rights in the institution and is entitled to get food and lodging and good puddings (like that fellow at Malling) without the kind of disciplinary exercise that he has to undergo with us; and it is a disadvantage in a measure that he comes from an institution to us. One would have wished very much that the colonists did not know there was any subsidy with them. (Dr. Paton.) I think I would just like to add one word there; the workhouse is the very opposite usually of a "workhouse." There is what you may call, not a sleeping sickness but a dawdling sickness, which prevails through the workhouse, and it takes practically some months to eliminate that dawdling sickness and train them to labour; and so far, I think, the workhouse is about the worst preparation for such a colony as ours that one could have, because in the workhouse there is not the discipline that enforces labour; it is the very opposite of a "workhouse."

5223. There are a great many workhouses in England—nearly 700, varying in population from, say, 30 to 3,000?—I know all the difficulties, for I have conferred with masters.

5224. What are your arrangements for medical attendance?—(Mr. Brooks.) We have now a lady doctor resident.

5225. Does she look after the colonists?—Unless there be a case of very special difficulty; then we send for a male doctor, but this is only this year; previous to that we had the doctors out of the village visiting us when they were requested, not as medical officers, but visiting as they would a family.

5226. (Mr. Simpson.) Supposing a labour colony was established for the compulsory detention of tramps, would you have any objection to take at your training colony any of the more promising of those tramps?—I do not think it would be well, because quite a number of our men resent being associated with men under sentence. We have been careful to avoid ex-criminals, as a rule, in Lingfield, and that would look in that direction. I should not have objection, but it would be difficult to rule where the men had objections. These men, poor creatures as they are, say: "Well, we have never been in gaol" or "We have never been before a magistrate," or something of that kind.

5227. Any graded colonies, such as you suggest, would all have to be quite distinct from the voluntary colonies, in your opinion?—Yes, I think so.

5228. (Sir William Chance.) The idea of the colony at Lingfield came from the German colony, did it not?—Yes, Miss Sutter wrote her book on the colony at Wilhelmsdorf, and that book really suggested it. (Dr. Paton.) I think also that Lord Meath's articles in the "Nineteenth Century" first suggested the whole matter to myself and one or two others who were interested in this question, but the movement as a whole certainly obtained great impetus from Miss Sutter's book.

5229. You conduct the colony on the same principle as in Germany?—(Mr. Brooks.) So far as religious inspiration and instruction are concerned and so far as the staff is concerned.

5230. You have a staff consisting of what you call Christian Brothers in the colony?—Yes.

5231. And that also was copied from Germany?—Yes, these men are being trained to do work of this kind; and if you have outdoor colonies for vagrants you will want a new kind of man to manage them. The workhouse official would bring the workhouse spirit, and the workhouse spirit would not do.

5232. Do you think a sufficient number of trained men could be obtained if colonies such as you propose should be established for vagrants?—I think we could get valuable men, but there are not enough trained men at present for the purpose.

5233. Would you propose to have a training college for these Christian Brothers; how would you get the supply that you want?—We are doing that at Lingfield on a small scale. It is a training institution for these Brothers.

5234. Do you think you could train these men there to render them fit for other colonies?—Yes, some of them would be fit.

5235. Not only for yourselves, but also for other colonies?—That is our idea. We attach great importance to the training of men for this larger field of service.

5236. If the colonies are to be regenerative in any sense?—Yes.

5237. About 44 per cent. of your colonists get independent positions?—Yes.

5238. But do you keep records of them?—As well as we can; it is comparatively few that we can get to write to us.

5239. What proportion of the 44 per cent. have you got actual information about as to how they are getting on?—Certainly it is not more than 10 per cent. of them that we have any direct connection with; we cannot keep it up anyhow.

5240. That means really that it is about 5 per cent. of the whole number of your colonists of whom you have any knowledge that they are practically self-supporting?—Whom we are in actual touch with, or have any correspondence with, not more than that; it is impossible to get it. (Dr. Paton.) We have in a sense a guarantee in that they are not returning to us from Canada, in addition to the fact that we are in actual correspondence with a few.

5241. Does that 44 per cent. include those who have gone to Canada?—It includes them, and with regard to them we have this guarantee that they have not been returned to us as they would be if they were on the rates in Canada.

5242. The 5 per cent. does not include those?—Oh, no.

5243. How many went to Canada last year?—(Mr. Brooks.) Twenty-one, I think, went to Canada from both colonies last year, and twenty-five are going this year.

5244. Is that emigration to Canada increasing, do you think?—I do not know that it is increasing generally. So far as we are concerned, it is not simply sending them to Canada and dumping them down there; the Self-help Emigration Society in London is much respected in Canada. I took a number of emigrants there some years ago and was told that the Self-help Emigration emigrants are valued there; we always send through them and we never leave go of our man till he is employed in Canada, so we know he gets work there to start with; we know he gets a position there.

5245. I understand that you would not approve of the establishment in England of institutions like that at Mexxplas?—Not as it is, certainly.

5246. It is practically a prison?—Yes.

5247. And a prison which will not bear very favourable comparison with some of our English prisons?—It does not bear comparison with them.

5248. You suggest that the casual ward should be abolished?—Yes.

5249. Do you understand well the casual ward system at present in force for dealing with vagrants in England?—I cannot say I understand it perfectly well, but I know of it, of course, and I would suggest a compulsory colony, and then that the casual ward should be abolished.

5250. Do you intend that the colonies you propose should replace the casual ward as at present existing?—As one of their services, yes.

5251. Then possibly you might wish to see the present casual wards reserved for other purposes?—I really have not studied how they could be utilised; their purpose would be gone, I think.

5252. We have had evidence before us that a certain number of vagrants visiting the casual wards are people bona fide in search of work, not the professional vagrant class that you would want to send to a colony?—Yes; the labour colonies should also be labour bureaux; then you would deal with that class that you have mentioned, too.

5253. How are these people to get to the colonies; are there to be colonies established in every county?—If your bona fide seeker of work were offered employment in the colony and would not take it, I would then treat him as a vagrant; I would offer him work first.

5254. Before you can offer him work he must get to the colony, and it is probable that the colonies would be a considerable distance apart. There might be a difficulty in his getting to the colony. Then there is the man who is travelling, whom you would want to help on his road?—The colonies might have rest houses for them in places to pass them on.

5255. Have you considered the question of relief stations as they have in Germany?—In a sense it would be a good thing to have a relief station in association with the colony.

5256. Then as I understand it you think a relief station is necessary to carry out the colony system?—It would be a desirable twin purpose.

5257. Would it be possible to utilise the casual wards as relief stations?—It might be.

5258. If you abolish the casual ward, should there not be some substitute for it?—As a casual ward it serves a very poor purpose now, I think. (Dr. Paton.) I think a free colony is almost a necessary part of that general system for the working man who is seeking work and who should be allowed to go from one relief station to another. If he cannot find work at the different relief stations to which he goes, then I think that the free colony is always necessary in order that he may go and get work there if he cannot possibly get it elsewhere; I do not see any other outlet.

5259. But, as I understand it, you do not want a free colony for these people, you want a labour colony to which they can be absolutely committed?—That is one of the difficulties.

5260. We are dealing with the vagrants now. You are rather thinking of the ordinary unemployed in your free labour colony; as I understand it, you distinguish between the free labour colony for the ordinary unemployed and the labour colony for the vagrant?—(Mr. Brooks.) That is a distinction that is essential.

5261. Under whose management would those labour colonies be?—I have suggested three or four forms; for instance, where charitable people start the work with subsidies from county councils or boards of guardians, or as in workhouses or prisons, where the State, directly or through the guardians, county council, or municipality, provides everything, and, therefore, manages the colony. There are three forms in which colonies can be started, but these tramp colonies would have to be managed by the State, I think.

5262. Managed directly by the State?—I think so.

5263. By officials?—(Dr. Paton.) I think this may be necessary. At the same time I do not see why charitable people might not be allowed to try the experiment with the assistance of the county councils or the boards of guardians or any other authorities that are appointed. That method is, I may say, adopted in Newcastle; there are two institutions there that are receiving assistance in capital expenditure from the educational authorities; and in Lancashire an institution for "defectives" is being assisted by education authorities in Cheshire and Lancashire. I think that system might certainly be extended; it would be an advantage, I think, to try the two methods—one by State management, and the other in which the management would be by persons who are taking up this work from a philanthropic or religious point of view, but who are being assisted by local authorities in regard to capital expenditure as well as in regard to maintenance. Of course, the authorities that gave assistance of this kind should be represented on the committee of management, but the committee of management would receive a good deal of its inspiration from the same feeling which has given rise to Lingfield, Starnthwaite and Hadleigh; and I think it would be of the greatest possible service to have examples of both kinds in the beginning of this great work, so that we may see which really works out the most advantageously.

5264. Then you think that these labour colonies for vagrants must be conducted by officials under the State, but also that it is desirable that voluntary effort should make the experiment?—I think an example of both would be of the greatest value, and I should not like to go very greatly or deeply into this matter until we had proof of what either method would accomplish.

5265. Have you ascertained the number of vagrants on the roads?—(Mr. Brooks.) I have not ascertained that.

5266. What I mean is, they are a very considerable number, and it would mean several labour colonies being established, if you are not to make them too large?—Yes, that is so.

5267. How are the women and children to be dealt with; what would you do with them?—In so far as Lingfield is concerned, it is remarkable how free from that difficulty we have been. The woman can get a better living apparently without the man sometimes; for two reasons: first of all he is a shiftless fellow, and she can get on better without him; and secondly, the conditions of labour are such that a woman is cheaper in business and the man is ousted, and the woman gets a position; she can get a position charring while he cannot get work, and so on. We have really never had the difficulty of the women to face once, all the while at Lingfield; it is rather a remarkable thing to me. They certainly would have to be dealt with in a very different way in the labour colonies.

5268. Then you think that question would settle itself if you got hold of the men; that very likely the women and children would be able to look after themselves, and perhaps be much better off through not having the men with them?—That certainly seems to be the experience at Lingfield. (Dr. Paton.) I think we have also the feeling that it might be quite necessary that the woman and her children should be taken probably to the workhouse.

5269. (Captain Showers.) I think I understood you to say, Mr. Brooks, that if a man does not behave himself you cut down his food?—(Mr. Brooks.) Yes.

5270. I see you have a very generous menu daily at your colony (see Appendix XXVI.); what part would you knock off?—I should knock off quality; I should knock off sweets, and so on and give him simply porridge and bread. I should knock off tea too; I should only give such a man water if he would not work.

5271. For how long a time would you do that?—Until he behaved better.

5272. Do you not think the man would become weaker in consequence, and perhaps not be able to do his work, the 9½ hours digging?—He would be able to keep on, though he would not be able to do so much perhaps. Bread and water is a very succouring diet after all, and he would be able to keep on; but I would give him no tasty foods.

5273. If the man had been with you some time, and had been fortified by the substantial diet, which you give as a rule, it would take perhaps a long time before he broke down?—It would take some time, of course, but he is not going to hurt himself like that; the amount of work that these men do is not going to hurt a man; he would not hurt himself however you fed him.

5274. In prisons, when men are put on bread and water they do no work at all?—I did not know that.

5275. It is so. I suppose on the principle that a man is not in a fit state to do work when he is on a bread and water diet?—I was rather basing my views on the experience of a Dutch colony where the man has simply black bread and water for a time, and he has to work on that.

5276. Well, they could not keep on very long on that diet, I think?—No, most likely not.

5277. Referring to the return you have furnished (see Appendix XXVI.) I see that in 1903 two colonists were dismissed for misbehaviour and incapacity, while in 1904 there were thirteen of such cases?—One reason is that there were fifteen more men in the colony in 1904 than in 1903; and the other is that men vary; we have a better type of man sometimes than others.

5278. It is rather a large percentage on the fifteen extra men to have the difference between two and thirteen, is it not?—Yes; it is possible that there was some reason—four or five being dismissed at once; I did not look into the particulars. In 1903 twelve absconded as against five in 1904.

5279. What do you mean by "incapacity" as a reason for dismissing a man?—Intellectual incapacity; sometimes people send imbeciles. Guardians have not been quite wise, and at times have sent us men that were really imbeciles.

5280. Are those who are dismissed on account of incapacity sent back to the workhouse?—Yes.

5281. They are not left to their own resources?—Perhaps, if the man happens to be an inebriate; sometimes an inebriate comes in in such a sodden condition, quite utterly deteriorated, that we cannot do anything with

Rev. J. L. Brooks and him; then he would not be sent to the workhouse, he would be sent back to his friends.

Rev. J. B. Paton, D.D. 5282. It is clear from what you say that the gardening work on the colony is not a paying business?—Well, it is very difficult to make it pay by skilled labour now, and by these men it could not possibly be made to pay.

12 April 1905.

5283. A plough and a couple of horses would do more work in one day than probably all your colonists could do in one week?—Yes, very likely.

Dr. Paton Examined.

5284. (Chairman.) Dr. Paton, you are, I believe, the chairman of the executive council of the Christian Social Service Union?—(Dr. Paton.) Yes, sir.

5285. Are you resident at Lingfield?—No, I reside in Nottingham; I was very much concerned in the founding of the Lingfield colony.

5286. Do you frequently visit Lingfield?—Yes, I do; not so much of late, since it has got into order, but at first I visited it frequently.

5287. You have heard the evidence given by Mr. Brooks; do you agree in the main with that evidence?—I do entirely; though I venture to make one or two criticisms or exceptions, and if you like I will state them now.

5288. If you please, I think that will be best?—Mr. Brooks has indicated that in any colony that is founded for vagrants there must be classification, because you will find that among the vagrants there are people of very distinct types who cannot and ought not to be associated together in the colony. Probably you will find that you will need to classify in a vagrant colony at least into two classes so far as regards character; you will find those who are somewhat insubordinate or of the type of the rogue and the vagabond, and you will find others who are vagrants because of some mental or moral defect but who are not quite criminal, or even, I may say, approaching to the criminal class; and I think it would be a great misfortune that those two classes should be associated together; they may be in one colony, but they ought certainly to be separated in that colony.

5289. In what way would you separate them?—I think as in Germany, one principle must be paramount, namely, that character counts in every respect, not only in regard to the classification, but with regard even to the discipline; and so I think you will find there are two classes that will have to be separated either into distinct colonies or into distinct apartments at the one colony; one class will be those that are criminal, those that have been perhaps in a prison and who are ex-convicts, or who are known to be somewhat vicious in habit and character; and the other class will be those who are mentally and physically defective, and who therefore have to be treated in a somewhat remedial manner. I know that it is not a very easy matter, and yet those who have experience in this say it is not so difficult. In Germany evidently they regard it as a very crucial matter, and they do not seem to find much difficulty in distinguishing between these two classes. Then Mr. Brooks has indicated—and I think this is most important—that with regard to each of these classes there ought to be a further classification. That is to say, that by good behaviour one can rise from a lower grade to a higher. Now, there I venture to make a suggestion somewhat different from my friend Mr. Brooks, whose opinion I value very much in these matters, because he has had practical experience, such as I have not had; but still there is one principle which I should like to commend very much—it is the principle which is adopted in Elmira and in other reformatory prisons in the United States of America, and also in Toronto. Mr. Brooks would let all enter on the lowest plane, what he calls the labour colony, and then let them rise to two other grades—he has two promotions. I would venture to suggest that instead of this it would be better to let them enter on an intermediate stage, so that they will not feel when they enter the colony, that it is so horrid a place and so like a prison. I presume that the great idea which will inspire this movement is that of reformation. We are not simply wanting to punish, we are not simply wanting to segregate, we are wanting to reform. I must say that my whole interest in this movement arises from that; and I believe that in the most sordid and the most degraded there is a something that will respond to wise treatment, and I hope in all that we do we may seek to act upon that principle. That being so, there are two elements with which we have to work: the one is the element of fear and the other is the element of hope. If the man, on entering, goes into the intermediate stage, I would suggest that he might be put into a lower stage if he is insubordinate, if he breaks the rules, or if he is neglectful of order. There are many reasons which might be given for which he should be degraded, but there should always be the possibility of re-emerging into the intermediate grade again as soon as he shows that he has mended his ways. Then I think that from the intermediate stage there ought also to be promotion into a higher on good conduct; so that I would bring into exercise both those influences, the influence of fear and the influence of hope. I think that in that way you can bring reforming influences more vividly and powerfully to work.

5290. Do I understand that you would prefer to have separate institutions for what you call the lower grade of men and the higher grade, or would you have them in the same institution, but with different treatment?—Well, I think that that might be a matter of convenience or expediency. I do not think that I need lay down a definite rule in that matter. I think in one institution it would be quite possible to have the three grades of which I am speaking; and indeed, it might be to some extent an advantage, because an inmate would have in proximity to himself people who were enjoying better advantages than he; but that is a question upon which experts differ, and I really have not the knowledge that would allow me to give anything like a worthy judgment.

5291. Is anything of that sort practised in the foreign institutions—in the Belgian colony?—They all have a system of promotion.

5292. I mean, if they receive an ex-convict, do they put him into a special class, and does he associate only with men of the same class?—I understand the lowest grade at Merxplas consists very largely of ex-convicts.

5295. Have they different quarters for that class?—They are quite separated. The lowest class are kept absolutely separate with regard to bed and board and work. They are not allowed to come into any association with the others. I think it is almost one of their ruling principles, that those in that lowest grade shall be kept wholly apart, in order that their bad influence may not spread over the whole colony; and I think that is a principle which ought not to be ignored. All that I have ventured to say is that I think it would be well, in the discipline of your institution, to allow that the men should be degraded for certain reasons from the position at which they entered into it, and that they should be able to rise from the intermediate into a higher. Of course, if they are degraded into a lower, they should be encouraged and helped in every way to rise as soon as possible into the intermediate grade from which they have been lowered.

5296. Who should be the judge of the time when the promotion should occur?—The director, and I think there ought to be definite rules, as in Elmira, indicating the reasons for the degradation and the promotion. In Elmira they have very distinct rules indicating what will lead you to go down or to go up. Then another point I would suggest is that in connection with a vagrant colony the parole system which now prevails in America should be adopted. Mr. Brooks speaks of permission being given for men to leave the higher grade of colony which he calls the training colony. It seems to me that in any colony in which compulsory detention is in force, so long as a man is a colonist you cannot allow him to leave that colony. It seems to me that the whole principle is violated if you allow him to leave that colony as though he were a free man; so long as he is in that colony, I think he must be compulsorily detained in it. I think that the principle of parole is one which would appeal to a great number of colonists, awakening them to the desire for a better life; and the parole system which is now very largely used in America, would, I think, be specially suited to a vagrant colony. That is to say, that a man would be allowed under certain conditions, because of his good conduct to leave on parole, and that there should be a parole officer who would keep in close touch with him during the whole of the time of his parole, and that he should be, of course, at once returned to the colony, and perhaps even punished, if he breaks his parole.

5297. As I understand, you would not depend upon the man's good faith in the parole; you would have somebody to look after him?—Yes, the parole officer.

5298. You would have a parole officer; you would not depend upon the man's honour?—Not altogether; but the parole officer would act as a guardian to remind him of his pledge, and to assist him.

5299. The idea of parole is that you depend upon the man's honour that he will keep it?—I think it is necessary that he should not be under the police as though he were a ticket-of-leave man. I think it should be a special officer who would encourage and help him.

5300. Can you tell me if these institutions in America that you spoke of, Elmira and so on, take in men of the same class as what we call here vagrants?—They take in a worse class; they take in criminals.

5301. But they do not necessarily take in vagrants?—No.

5302. Those institutions are more like a reformatory than a labour colony for men who have arrived at their condition of destitution possibly by accident and not by their own fault?—Quite so.

5303. That is a very different class of men to the convicts you are referring to in the Elmira institution?—I venture to say that still more, therefore, the principle of parole might apply to the vagrants. If it is possible to apply that principle to criminals such as are received into these reformatory prisons in America, it ought to be still more possible to apply it to vagrants in whom we might hope to introduce some improvement within two or three months. I think the parole principle is one that would be of the very greatest value in connection with vagrant colonies.

5304. I think you have already said that you would be in favour of giving the men an opportunity of rising into a higher grade when they have shown themselves to be worthy of that promotion?—Yes.

5305. I believe you have some acquaintance with the practice in the Frederiksoord colony in Holland?—I feel that the principle adopted in Frederiksoord is one of the greatest importance to us in England at the present time. I think the condition of England is one that you have to consider in dealing with this problem of vagrancy. Our population is wage-earning and industrial to a very large extent. When people are settled in agriculture they are to a large extent stationary, but under the new conditions of our industrial life a great number of our population are necessarily migratory; the words "fluid" and "mobile" have been used in connection with industrial labour; it is a necessity under the modern conditions of our industrial life. I think therefore it is of the greatest importance that we should increase as far as possible the number of those who are stationary. The value of Frederiksoord is that it allows men who have been in the vagrant colony, and others, who not being vagrants, but because they were out of work, have been to the free colony, after they have been trained to agriculture, to be settled upon the land under conditions that, without the taint of pauperism, enables them to become freeholders or at least holders under permanent tenure.

5306. Is there land at Frederiksoord upon which these men can be settled?—Yes, thousands of acres.

5307. What is the acreage?—Some 3,000 acres, I believe.

5308. And how many men have been settled upon that land?—There have been over 160 men and their families.

5309. Has that system been found successful?—Yes; so much so that in Germany they are now beginning, in regard to two or three of their free labour colonies, to develop the same principle; that is to say they are now establishing Heimath-Kolonien or homestead colonies; so that those who have passed through the labour colony and received training there may settle on the land.

5310. I suppose those men would be of the better class; men who have not been convicted?—Yes generally, but not necessarily. I think it is a weak point in the Frederiksoord system that they have used it simply as a method of relieving destitution. Now I think that is wrong in principle. I think that such a colony is not for the relief of destitution; it ought only to be for families of men who have proved themselves to be thrifty and industrious, and who are likely to be successful peasant farmers or workers.

5311. Now I think you are prepared to give evidence with regard to the prevention of the increase of vagrancy and to make some suggestions?—If you will allow me I will be very glad to lay some points before you, which have been very much before my own mind whilst I have been making enquiry in regard to this question. A great number of vagrants have begun their vagrant life as working men seeking employment. I received this morning some rather striking figures from Gateshead, showing that out of 108 men in the workhouse last week, 43 were skilled or semi-skilled workmen. Two days ago I went to see the master of our workhouse; both confirm what I have learned otherwise—that many of our almost hopeless vagrants were men who had been out of work and who went at first into the casual ward because they were on the tramp seeking work. After a week or two they got to think that it was more pleasant to tramp without work than they thought it was. The master of a workhouse tells me "the first night they think it is very bad in the tramp ward, but after having been a few nights there they do not seem to think it is so very bad."

5312. In what way would you prevent the increase of vagrancy among this class?—Well, there are three methods I would suggest. The first is a national and organised scheme of labour bureaux that are in communication with one another, the abolition of tramp wards, and the provision for bona fide working men who are travelling to seek work, of suitable accommodation in workhouses for which they would pay by work done at times that would not hinder their going out to seek work. The second is to find opportunities for men who are past their prime and for the less efficient workmen to continue their work in their workshops on reasonable terms. These men are now dismissed from their employment because they cannot earn the full wages earned by their more active and capable fellow workmen. This evil has arisen from the fact that trades unions will not allow an employer to give less than the ordinary trades union wage. Now, I think an arrangement to obviate this evil could be made with the trades union leaders. I have conferred with one or two of them on the point. They are quite right in insisting that the average wage of the trade in a district shall be the wage that represents the work of a capable effective man; but I think the difficulty could be met by allowing piece-work to the older and the less efficient man, so that he is not to be paid by the day, but by piece-work; or the trades union might allow him to work for fewer hours and receive a less wage in proportion. I believe that some of the best trades union leaders would be quite prepared to reconsider that question. The third method that I recommend is to endeavour to develop in this country a system which is in force on the Continent among factory workers in Belgium and France at the present time. It is this, that the workman should be encouraged, even when he is in full work, to have his large garden or his small holding, so that when he begins to fail in work, and cannot do the work of the factory, he should still have his plot of land upon which he could earn at least something that would suffice with what he receives from his trade union.

5313. That, of course, would depend very much upon the circumstances of the locality?—I may say that in localities that seem to be the most difficult and even impossible, these allotments can be found. For example, if you look at the reports of the Vacant Lots Associations in Philadelphia and Detroit, it is wonderful to see what has been done even there; and I have known three men working at Doulton's factory in Lambeth who went out on their bicycles 4½ miles to cultivate their garden allotments; but I quite allow that it will depend to some extent on the locality, and that is one reason why one delights to think that in France and in Belgium at the present time industries are being set up much more frequently than formerly in villages, so that the workers are able to work upon the land more conveniently than they could in a large town.

5314. If there was a large factory or workshop in the middle of a large town it would be almost impossible for the men to get gardens or allotments?—I live in Nottingham, and the city is surrounded by garden allotments. I believe if these were developed it would contribute, at any rate, to a great abatement of this source of vagrancy.

5315. I think we are almost getting beyond the lines of our Inquiry. But, on this point, would not the better plan be to encourage the working man to lay by, week by week, when he gets good wages, and in that way provide for himself when he reaches a certain age?—Yes, I think that the methods of insurance against unemployment, which are in force in many places on the Continent, especially in France and Germany, might be very greatly developed in this country.

5316. I think you have something to say with regard to the manner in which vagrancy has been dealt with in Westphalia?—I should like to refer to a pamphlet which has just been published by Pastor von Bodelschwingh, entitled Wer hilft mit, showing how the system of relief stations in Westphalia has tended to reduce vagrancy there. I think that arrangements should be made in this country as are made in Germany, for the working man who is out of work and is seeking work. If we provide something in the way of relief stations and do not let him go to the tramp ward, then a great deal will have been done to remove one of the chief causes of vagrancy in our country; and I think in any system of relief stations it will be necessary to have a free labour colony, so that if the man cannot possibly find work at any of these stations to which he goes and where he will be helped in every way by labour bureaux, he can then go to the labour colony.

5317. Of course, it would be a considerable item of expenditure if you had to provide fresh institutions to serve as relief stations?—I think that every workhouse in the country might be used for that purpose. I mean that a department of the workhouse might be made available for such a man, where the conditions would be better than in the present tramp ward. The man might be received there on bringing his identification card and some proof as to what he was seeking and where he was going, and he should be received and helped as in the relief stations in Germany; I think it could be done without any expense whatever.

5318. Then I understand from what you say that you would be in favour of something in the nature of a way-ticket?—I think it is absolutely necessary; you cannot have the relief stations without it, and I think that that would at once stop one of the greatest sources of vagrancy in our country.

5319. Are you in favour of having a way-ticket, Mr. Brooks?—(Mr. Brooks.) Certainly.

5320. Have you anything further to add?—(Dr. Paton.) There are three other points which I should like to name very briefly as causes of vagrancy in our country, and which I think should be considered. One is the men who are discharged from the Army. You take men into the Army now, at eighteen or nineteen years of age, just as they are beginning really to learn their trade, if they have got one, and you take them for seven years. By that time they have lost pretty well the trade they were beginning to have in their hands. Others of them are taken perhaps from agriculture; in the Army they forget a good deal of their farming knowledge, and perhaps get a new taste, so that they do not care to return to agriculture. It has seemed to me that it would be quite possible to have workshops and a small farm in connection with the barracks, in which the men, whilst they are in the service, could spend one hour a day or so in labour that would continue the sort of knowledge they had of their trade when they entered the Army, and would continue their interest and exercise their skill in agriculture after they entered the Army. I think it might be possible to do all that is required by having technical schools, or agricultural schools with small gardens or farms attached, which would be sufficient to keep alive in the soldier the knowledge that he had before he entered the Army, and would thus enable him, when he left the Army, to get employment. At the present time men leave the Army and have difficulty in finding employment. I have evidence here from several masters of workhouses that they constitute not a small element of the vagrant class; it seems to me that when the country has used these men for seven years in the most important period of their lives, something ought to be done to ensure for them a better life than a vagrant life when they leave the Army. And I am also quite sure that something could be done that would not only be of advantage to him when he has left the Army, but would be of great advantage to him during the time that he is serving. The second point I wish to bring forward is this—and I think it is a very serious matter—that a prisoner, when he leaves prison, is practically excluded from work, because he has lost his character, and people do not like to employ him; I cannot but think that it would be possible to give an opportunity to an ex-convict to enter a vagrant colony at once, so that by his work in that vagrant colony he would be able to expurgate himself from the reproach that he was a convict. He ought to be able to leave the colony with credentials that would ensure him employment. Thirdly, I should like also to say that the boys that we have at Lingfield would probably have become vagrants if they did not prefer to be inmates of the workhouse. In a pamphlet on the Unemployed I have shown that there are many youths of that class and of a yet better class that are growing up in our cities, without any definite employment whatever, who might be apprenticed in training schools or training colonies by which they would be enabled to earn an honest livelihood in life, which at present is almost impossible for them.

5321. (Sir William Chance.) What are your ideas as to the treatment of the children of vagrants?—I think that the children of vagrants, with the mothers, might be received into the workhouse if they are not able to do better without the man than with him; but, as Mr. Brooks said, they would probably be able to maintain themselves independently when the husband and father is in the vagrant colony. In Germany I find that in some colonies when the men begin to earn money part of that money is sent to the wife and to the children; and I think it would be a perfectly right thing, if it were found that the work of the vagrant in the colony was of more value than his keep, that then his money should be sent to the wife and the children. And in Germany the idea of the Heimath-Kolonien is being developed, that is to say the vagrant is being trained to establish a home for himself on the land in which the wife and children could join him. I must say that I think the essence of this whole problem lies here, to get more people somehow or other settled on the land, not only for the sake of the vagrant himself, but for the sake of our nation, so that our people will have more of the physical vigour and sturdy character that you can only develop in country life. For to have the great industrial mass of our people—nearly 80 per cent.—congested in urban life is a sort of monstrosity which is bound to breed the evil of vagrancy.

5322. You do not think anything can be done under the present system without some radical change such as you propose?—I am quite certain of it. It is not a matter of mere surmise, for I have looked into this question for many years.

5323. (Dr. Downes.) At what stage of the vagrant's career would you send him to the labour colony?—I would follow Sir John Gorst's Bill of last year. Our present system of sending vagrants to prison is the most costly system that you can devise, and it is the most stupid that you can think of. If the man may be sent to prison, surely, prima facie, that is sufficient reason for sending him to a vagrant colony, where he will be trained to a better kind of life; and I think therefore that the same indictment should be made with a view to sending him to a colony as to prison. The precautions given by Sir John Gorst in his Bill I would like to emphasise here, because I think that perhaps that was not made quite so clear by Mr. Brooks. I should have no idea of sending him to a vagrant colony by mere summary jurisdiction. I think Sir John Gorst's Bill has put that matter as clearly and concisely as it could be put. I would venture also to say that I think three years is rather too long a term of detention. Mr. Brooks has spoken of three years, but it seemed to me that was rather a long sentence, and if we were to adopt the reformatory methods and the influences that we ought to adopt I think two years might suffice; but I should like to give a power of parole at a much earlier period, so that a man should not feel that he was being given a cruel sentence.

FIFTEENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 10th May, 1905.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. J. L. WHARTON, M.P. (in the Chair).

Sir WILLIAM CHANCE, Bart.
Mr. J. S. DAVY, C.B.
Mr. A. H. DOWNES, M.D.

Captain SHOWERS.
Mr. H. B. SIMPSON.

Mr. F. L. TURNER (Secretary).

Mr. W. CROOKS, M.P., called; and Examined.

5324. (Chairman.) I think you are aware that our Inquiry is into the present condition of vagrancy, with a view to finding out whether it is desirable that there should be any amendment in the law. You are, I believe, chairman of the Poplar board of guardians?—Yes.

5325. Have you held that position long?—I have just been re-elected for the eighth time, I think.

5326. Your union is a large and a very poor one, is it not?—That is so.

5327. Can you say what is the average daily number of casuals you have in your casual wards?—We are full every night. I really forget what our accommodation is, but we have to turn applicants away; I will tell you what I think is the reason for that directly.

5328. I find we have the numbers which your wards accommodate: there appear to be separate cells for forty-nine men, seven women, and three women with children?—Yes; I have no doubt that is so. There are very few children; we never get more than one or two in a week.

5329. Now, when a man comes in how long does he stay in the casual ward?—He is there twelve hours; we turn him out at six o'clock in the morning.

5330. The next morning?—Yes; unless he is a man whom we are compelled to detain under the law—that is to say, a man who has visited us previously within the month; then we keep him, but whenever we can discharge a man at six in the morning we do so.

5331. And the same with women?—Well, we are not so particular about the women unless they appear to us to be of bad character. We do not get many women.

5332. If you discharge the men at six, they do not do anything in the way of a task?—No.

5333. But those whom you detain longer than one night, what task do they perform?—Well, we put them at scrubbing floors, or polishing brasses, or work of that character.

5334. You do not put them to stone breaking or wood cutting, or anything of that kind?—No; and I think that accounts for the large number of casuals that we get. On the other hand, the feeling of my board is that if these men are bona fide workmen, the best way to help them is to turn them out at a time in the morning when they can get work.

5335. Quite so?—Still, I do not think that has been an absolute triumph. I have had a deputation wait upon me—not of casuals, of course, but of persons who had seen the men turned out at six in the morning—or earlier—and they have said they did not think it quite the right treatment to turn these men out in the wet. Whatever you do, it seems you are always liable to have some criticism of your action.

5336. Before you turn them out, do you give them anything in the way of breakfast?—Oh, yes.

5337. What do they get?—They get gruel and bread.

5338. A man always leaves with a full stomach?—He always leaves with a meal. The regulation of the place is that we have three officers doing eight hours each, so that we are able to prepare during the night the breakfast for the morning.

5339. Only those who are detained longer than one night have any task?—Yes, those whom we are obliged to detain under the Order.

5340. Now, when the men come in, are they searched?—Yes, always.

5341. And bathed?—Yes; they are bathed almost immediately.

5342. Is that an invariable rule?—It all depends on what time a man comes in; if he gets in fairly early, he has his bath and then his meal; if he gets in late and there is room for him, he gets his meal and then his bath.

5343. As a rule, is any money found on these men when they are searched?—Very little indeed; it only amounts to pence and halfpence.

5344. What is the class of man who ordinarily comes to you: can he be called a working man?—I certainly should not put them down as an ordinary class of workmen at all. I sometimes go into the ward and talk to the men, and I am bound to say that what you would call men in search of work are rather rare, except that they all declare that they are in search of work; the man whom you really could believe was trying to find work is very rare.

5345. That agrees with what we have heard from other witnesses, that the very large proportion of the men in the casual wards are not really in search of work?—I do not think it would be much more than 1 per cent. for men who are really employable and who are really trying to find work.

5346. We have been told that to say 3 per cent. in London would be putting it rather high?—Yes, it would be higher than I should say.

5347. With your knowledge of working men, do you think the present system of casual wards is a satisfactory way of dealing with vagrants?—I do not think it is by any means satisfactory.

5348. If you had to legislate with regard to these men, what line would you take?—If I were legislating for this class of men, I should endeavour to satisfy myself, or get someone to satisfy himself, that these men had been for a time on the road, and to find out as far as possible—it is a little difficult I admit—the antecedents of the men and what they had really been doing. Then I should begin to classify. I should take the able-bodied vagrant who goes to the casual ward, and whom you may expect in the ordinary way to be put to a task of stone breaking or wood chopping, or oakum picking, which is no deterrent to him—he does not care; such cases might be called one class. Another class would be the men who go to the free shelter or the Church Army, and it seems to me that a very large percentage of those men are not employable for a moment.

5349. Owing to physical inability?—I mean owing to a general break-up in consequence of not having proper regular food and proper shelter. As regards the first class, I should try to organise a farm colony. The name “farm colony” is getting now rather hackneyed; it has taken the public taste for the moment, and it rather stands the chance of being spoilt if we are not very careful what we are doing.

Mr. W. Crooks, M.P.
 0 May 1905.
 5350. I quite agree with you?—And why I want a farm colony is this. If a vagrant comes to us for relief we can say, "Very well, you pass through this ward; but we have got a record of you; we intend to know where you are going and what you are going to do; if you become a burden more than three times anywhere, unless for satisfactory reasons, we shall send you to the farm colony." This would, to my mind, put down begging, and people would be able to say to a man on the road, "Do you want work? Very well, here is the place where you are to go."

5351. I daresay you know of the Gloucestershire way-ticket system. What is your view with regard to it?—I read of it some years ago; but I realised when I knocked about Gloucestershire a good deal, that their system does not get a grip of the whole thing, because although they give a ticket to go on to a police station, and from a police station to some other place for food, it does not prevent these men begging, and it does not prevent people on the road helping them, and it never will while human nature is what it is.

5352. Naturally; but we are told by the Gloucestershire people that it has some effect. As you know, they distribute leaflets to all the householders?—I know; I have seen them.

5353. Their ticket entitles a man to a meal of bread in the middle of the day, and does away with the necessity for begging?—Notwithstanding that fact, their casual wards get full.

5354. Of course, if a man is going on his way he has, more than ever, a right to go into the casual ward as long as his ticket is a good one?—Yes. You recollect the epidemic of smallpox a little while ago; well, they kept away from the wards for a bit, but when it died down the casual wards were very full again and everybody attempted to come late because they then got their pence to go and get a lodging somewhere in the town.

5355. Would not the one great advantage of the way-ticket system be that you would be able to identify the habitual vagrant better than you can at present?—Yes. I think an extension of that system for identification purposes would be excellent.

5356. It has been suggested to us that the way-ticket should be made general; it is of very little use to have it in force in two or three counties only. Do you agree that if it were made general it would assist materially in the identification of the habitual vagrant?—Yes, I agree.

5357. Then as regards London, how do you think that system would answer. We have heard that there are a large number of men in the metropolitan area wandering from place to place. Some days they will pick up a few shillings which will keep them in a common lodging-house for a day or two, so that they need not go every night to the casual ward?—I think the system would ultimately be successful; we should be cheated for a good while, but eventually it would be successful.

5358. If it were strictly enforced?—Yes, if you had a perfect system.

5359. If it were strictly enforced, you think eventually it would defeat the men who are determined never to work?—Yes. That leads me on to this: if you have got a system of identification, and you are making the vagrant's life as unhappy as you possibly can in consequence of it, it rather increases the sympathy of the poor people, who after all are his Mecca; they are the people to whom he goes to get help.

5360. But do you think that the mere fact of his being the bearer of a way-ticket would increase their sympathy?—He would be a marked man; I will put it that way; you will see the way out in a minute.

5361. He would call himself a marked man?—Of course he would; he would say "Here I am; I cannot go anywhere." People would think there was a great deal to be said in favour of it. We should all find a difficulty if we met a starving man in preaching to him; we should help him anyway; you cannot help it, that is human nature.

5362. But the way-ticket would provide against his being a starving man, by entitling him to a mid-day meal?—Yes, but you see he would always find an excuse for not going to the particular place named in the ticket because he would say he expects a job somewhere else. I mean you have to deal with human nature as it is at the present moment.

5363. It is a system which would have to come home to people by degrees?—The system of identification is all right, but I want to go one further than that; I want to find out what you are to do with this man, having identified him. You cannot keep him going on from place to place indefinitely.

5364. Well, supposing a man does not keep to the route marked on his ticket, that would be registered against him. If that is registered against him some three or four times it would show that he was an habitual vagrant, and it would then be a question what special treatment should be given him?—I want to keep away as far as possible from anything like convicting or taking him before a justice of the peace. I will tell you why. If we were dealing with people in London, that would probably be all right. But a man may be convicted as a rogue and vagabond for a variety of things in the country that he would not be looked at for in London; there is too much power in people's hands as regards punishment for trespassing and that sort of thing; a lazy vagabond might have torn his ticket up as an excuse for not wishing to go in a particular direction. It would not be fair to treat him like a man having a rabbit which did not belong to him. I want to preserve the liberty of the subject if you possibly can, and to get control of a man who is a vagrant without making him a criminal.

5365. Do you think the short sentence of, say, three to seven days has any deterrent effect upon a man in the case of offences like begging?—No, I do not think it has the slightest effect.

5366. It costs the country a good deal of money and the man finds himself very comfortable in prison?—It is a delightful change for him.

5367. Well, if instead of sending the man to prison for a few days his conviction is registered, then after three or four convictions might he not be given some sentence that he does not like?—I do not see that that is the way out. My trouble is I do not want this man to be convicted for four, five, six or seven days, or anything of that kind. I want to get him to understand that he is identified by this system of ticket. You could say, "Now, my friend, there is an end to this; there is the farm colony; you will go there and you will work there, and we will endeavour to make a decent man of you." I am of opinion that he will go when he finds that the net is drawing in on him, and that the vagrant's life on the road is not worth having; I think then he will be inclined to go.

5368. Would you give him the alternative; if he will not go to the farm colony and work, there is the cell?—I would say: "You have come from so and so, and so and so; if we catch you doing this again we will probably put you in gaol; go to the farm colony, they will take you on and you will become a useful man, and worth employing." I would make that voluntary, and I would add, "We have no power to detain you, but if you leave and make no attempt to improve your life, we shall get power to detain you compulsorily as a person who is neglecting to maintain himself." I hate the words "rogue and vagabond" for this sort of thing; I should charge him with neglecting to maintain himself in a proper manner. I think you would do more that way.

5369. Well, having sent him to the farm colony, if you find that he absolutely refuses to do anything when he gets there, what means will you take to compel him to work?—If he neglects to work and will not perform the task provided for him under the Vagrancy Act, whatever it is for the moment—because I am looking forward to the day when there will be no necessity for it—I should charge him exactly as you do under the Poor Law now. What do you do? The law says he must be set to some useful employment, whatever it is. Sometimes it is scrubbing a floor, sometimes it is cleaning brasses or cleaning windows. He says, "I will not do it"; you take him before the magistrate; the magistrate looks at him and says, "Has the doctor seen you? You are capable of doing the work, and you decline to do it; very well, I commit you for fourteen days' hard labour, or seven days' hard labour, and when you come back I should advise you strongly to go back to the colony and behave yourself, but I want to give you this chance, first."

5370. Now, if a man in a farm colony finds that those who really are working are getting better food and a more comfortable existence than those who will not work, do you not think that would be an inducement to work?—Yes, I do.

5371. At Merxplas, I think, and in some other places, if a man works well he gets some little allowance, you would hardly call it wages; do you not think that would be an inducement?—Yes I do, but I have a different opinion to the majority of my board about what the reward should be. I would make one diet for everybody, and then as a kind of reward I would add to that diet slowly. For instance, I should not hesitate to give a man in the middle of the day a cup of cocoa, or I would give him currant pudding for dinner, which somebody else did not get, and if they all worked up to currant pudding, very well I would alter the diet, and give it to them; but, you know, I am quite opposed to a money payment. I am now dealing of course with the special class, the vagrant, and you would have him claim the sympathy of mankind on the strength that he is on a farm colony working and toiling for 3d. or 6d. a week. We have had even the Judges of the High Court deciding that a man at Hadleigh farm ought not to be asked to work for 6d. a week; it is a very serious thing for us who have to administer the Poor Law. If the man was in the workhouse, no matter how he was working there, he would not get twopence or a penny a week. As a matter of fact, he is a pauper, and he would not be expected to get wages. I would deal with vagrants on the farm colony by means of food rather than in the other way. If it was thought a real hardship for the men to do without their tobacco, I would work it in that direction; personally I do not care for tobacco.

5372. Anyhow, you would give him some pleasant inducement to work?—Yes, but I would give it him in kind.

5373. You prefer that to making what I call an allowance; I do not use the word "wages"?—Oh, but that is your very trouble; the moment you start giving money, if it is only a penny, it is called wages; that is what has happened down at Hadleigh farm.

5374. You think it would not succeed?—It may succeed if you have a real trier, but the men we sent to Hadleigh were not trying, and they excused themselves on the ground that they only got 6d. a week; that is the point.

5375. Your union has got a labour colony at Laindon, I think?—But that is another thing; I will talk about that in a second, if I may.

5376. You are in favour, then, of a labour colony?—Certainly. If you had a colony to which tramps and vagrants could go, I think you could much more easily put down vagrancy. Every one of us agrees that the present system breeds tramps. I have got into trouble on the road by telling a man whom I have seen tramping little children about, that if I had my way I would thrash him. Crossing Cooper's Hill, between Gloucester and Stroud, I have seen a perambulator with two children in it, one each side, iron pots slung underneath, a woman pushing it, and the man slouching along smoking a pipe. Out goes the pipe; all look at me in a most abject manner. "Won't you help a poor fellow on the road?" "I should like to flog you," I reply. He gives me a swearing, and if I feel like it I swear back. I say, "My friend, I don't care a ld. for you; I would like to flog you and make a man of you; but what I care for is these poor dear little children being dragged about like this." I was in Gloucester one night last year and I went into the casual ward to see the inmates. I saw a man and a woman and three children. In the morning I was standing in Eastgate Street, and I saw the whole of them separate, and the children went off begging on their own. I was going to Westgate Street when one of them, a little girl, came up to me and, not recognising me again, asked me whether I would not give her something for a bit of bread. I said, "Where is your mother?" Of course I saw the woman a little way behind. "No, my child," I said, "I will give you nothing; you are not hungry." "Yes, I am." "You have only just come out of the casual ward; you cannot be hungry"; and she cheeked me. There was a girl being absolutely ruined owing to her having been allowed to wander about with her parents. We are all agreed that whatever can be done with these people ought to be done, even though it is only for the sake of the children.

5377. In a case of that sort would you be prepared to separate these children from the parents?—Absolutely. I would not hesitate for a moment. I have had a good deal to do with the industrial schools, and I feel that is the way out. Never mind about the liberty of the subject; they have no right to ruin the children.

5378. I quite agree with you; but probably there would be something said about it?—Let them; I am quite prepared to defend that action. If you go round to the Home Office, they will give you a record of this class of children; there are not so many as I would like to have. I confess: these are children found wandering and begging, for which you sometimes find a parent and sometimes do not, but the parent will invariably turn up when the youngster is sixteen years old, when you have made it useful and capable of earning a shilling or two, and made it a real good boy or a real good girl. Parents who have not taken the trouble to come and see the child, pretending they did not know where it was, turn up on the eve of discharge and take it away. In those cases I steel my heart. "No, you will not get him." We send him out of the country or we send him to Wales. I think we are justified in doing it. If you want confirmation, let me give you another case. The man Milsom, who was executed for the Muswell Hill murder, was seen by our chaplain. He was an old industrial school boy from Feltham. "Well, now, Milsom, apart from every other consideration, to what do you attribute your position?" "Well," he says, "I attribute it to the fact that you let me go back to the old environment. If you had sent me away to Wales, I should not have found myself here." There is a justification; you get the youngsters away, we are going to keep them.

5379. Have you any system of sending the children away to Canada?—Well, we rather gave up Canada, and we now send children who are taken up for begging and wandering to Welsh farmers. We have a very good agency in Wales for distributing them amongst small farmers. We find it very much better than on English farms, which are much larger. In Wales the little farmer takes the boy or the girl into his own home, and I could tell you many romantic stories about these youngsters who have developed into good men and women.

5380. (Mr. Simpson.) You are speaking of children from Feltham?—Yes, of boys that we have sent from Feltham and Mayford.

5381. (Chairman.) You find they do well with these farmers in Wales?—I could tell you many stories about the boys. Here is a case that may encourage everybody. When Captain Brookes was superintendent of Feltham school, he opened the Welsh agency first, and when we were down two years ago someone said, "If you are going through Llangattock, just outside they are building a new post office; you might stop there and ask if there are any old boys." Well, we stopped, and a man very respectably dressed came down off a ladder. "Are you gentlemen from Feltham?" "Yes." "Well, I am one of the first boys ever sent to Wales." "What are you doing?" "I am foreman of this job." "But what are you?" He said, "I am a mason." "But you did not learn masonry at Feltham." "No," he said, "but we got a general outline. I was sent down here to a man just outside; I picked up the business." "How old are you?" "Going just on twenty-eight." "Well, generally, what has happened to you?" "I worked on till my time was out, and then I got other masters, and I have got charge of this job now." And then, of course, naturally, one of our members said to him, "But have you any associations here; what is your position?" "Oh," he says, "I am deacon of the chapel here." "Can you sing like the rest of the Welshmen?" "Oh, yes." "Then generally you have got on very well?" "Aye," he says, "I have, and I've good reason to thank God that Captain Brookes sent me down here." Well, another lad has gone down in my time. He was a lad then about eighteen. His licence was up, and also his extension. I asked him what he was going to do; was he going back to London? "No," he said, "I am not going back to London." "Well, what are you proposing to do?" "I am going to work in the coal mines." I said, "It is rather a hard job, isn't it?" "Yes," he said, "but you can't get your living without working hard." "Well," I said, "did it never occur to you to go back to the smoke again?" "No," he said, "I think the only lucky day I had in my life was the day I got locked up"; and then he told me of the gang that he was associated with round King's Cross, neglected by mother and father and everybody else. Here again was a useful man quite out of the town. We go to a farm; the farmer says, "Have you seen Thomas?" "No, we want to see him." Thomas comes out, a fine strapping man. "Well, Thomas, could you lend us £50 right offhand?" "Oh," he said, "I think I could; I think I could lend you £70." "Oh, well, that is a good job. Are you proposing to go to London again?" "Never." "What, never going to London again?" "No," he said, "not me;" and then he smiled, and the farmer whispered in my ear; "I could not help it," he said, "but he is going to marry my daughter, and he will not go back." Then there is a man who is a gardener to a baronet, perhaps I had better not mention his name; and I said to him, "You come from a place I know very well?" He said, "Yes." "Are you ever inclined to go there?" He said, "No." "Have you no inclination to know how the people are getting on?" He said, "Sometimes." He added, "I would not like to chance going back." I said, "Do you not feel strong enough?" "Well," he says, "I think sometimes I might be inclined to stop, but I don't want to go." "What are you getting?" "I am getting 24s. a week." "It is not much, is it?" "No," he said, "but 24s. a week here in this village is as good as 35s. a week in London. I have a little cottage here, and a wife and two children, and I am not inclined to go." Now when you see a record like that of the very children of tramps and loafers, and ne'er-do-weels, surely you ought to be encouraged to say, too, "We are going to take the children, and we defy you to do anything at all; we will not allow you to interfere."

5382. Then you would undoubtedly be in favour, wherever you found these vagrant children being dragged about by their parents, of taking them away from their parents?—Yes, I am perfectly sure that is the best thing; I think our record is something like 92 per cent. of boys and girls doing well, if we get them young; ours is a magnificent record.

5383. (Mr. Davy.) That is from Feltham?—Yes, and we inquire, too, what is done by other people.

5384. (Chairman.) Now will you tell us in what way your farm colony at Laindon was started?—Well, Laindon was the final result of an agitation that we have been running since 1893. In 1893 we got overburdened with able-bodied men in the workhouse; there was no useful employment there for them to do, and we did perhaps things that were a little mean, looked at from the men's standpoint. Fellows could break stones easily as a task; give them, say, 10 cwt., and they would laugh at it and do it in half a day, certainly half an hour after the mid-day meal; the rest of the time they were loafing round the stone yard; then we changed it and gave them oakum, which took them a little longer to do, and then we went round and found out what men were inclined to do; if we found a fellow was an adept at stone breaking, we gave him oakum, and if he was clever at oakum we gave him stone breaking; if we found he got clever at stone breaking, we put him back again. We got to understand human nature as guardians do after they have had a few years of it, but all the time it was intensely unsatisfactory. Then there was the refractory man who was difficult to manage: the man who would not do his task, and had to be taken before the magistrate on a question of stone breaking and oakum picking; but they are getting more rare now, I rejoice to say. But it was so heart-breaking altogether, so we said, "If we could get a farm we could probably put these men on it, and harden up their muscles and create a good appetite in them for eating—something like an enjoyable one which the mere animal feeling begets, and whatever we could produce on the farm we could use up ourselves in the workhouse or the schools or the sick asylum, and that anyhow if it was not self-supporting in keeping them altogether, it certainly would be something towards their maintenance. With stone breaking and oakum picking it is a dead loss; you have to go out and beg, borrow, or pay for oakum or rope to be sent in for you to pick. I made a calculation that every ton of oakum that was picked cost about £10; then after it was picked you gave it away. I calculated that supposing a man picked four pounds of oakum a day, a light task, the cost of the man's maintenance by the time he had picked a ton of oakum was over £10, so that it was time someone looked about to see what else could be done. Then we applied to the Local Government Board and they told us that we could not take a farm, but I rejoice to say they sometimes change their mind; and finally Mr. Fels came to one of our members who was very keen on the original scheme, and offered to us for nothing, if we liked, some 100 acres of land he had bought at Dunton. I think we are paying him 3 or 4 per cent. on his original outlay, but at any rate we are giving him a percentage on his outlay for the use of the farm. Then we picked out such men in the workhouse as had been there a considerable time, whom the doctor thought the outdoor life would not hurt; that is to say, every man passed a medical examination. Well, we have had less absconding from there than we had from Hadleigh; we made it clearly understood in the workhouse that the farm at Laindon was an adjunct to the workhouse and would be run under the same conditions, and that the men if sent there would have to look upon it as an order for admission to the workhouse and they would be expected to work. There have been very few who have run away, but we had to alter our mode of procedure in cases like that; when the men came back to Poplar, having sold their clothes, for whatever reason it may have been, for food or drink, we did not succeed very well at the London police courts in getting convictions, so we have charged one or two of them at Chelmsford, which has been very successful indeed. That had a wonderful effect upon the whole colony, and speaking for the able-bodied men from the workhouse, they have done excellently. The superintendent of the farm says you have got to remember that these men are different altogether to the ordinary unemployed man who is out of work and who is glad to get a job on the land, and who invariably works well; their muscles have got quite soft for want of use in the workhouse, and they cannot and do not adapt themselves as quickly as an ordinary man who has just fallen out of work and who is glad to get work on a colony.

5385. How many men are there now at Laindon?—

Well, we proposed to put 100 on it, and we have generally had about 100 there; but we made arrangements during the depression for thirty more men to be sent there of a different class. To prove the success of this experiment, it is only necessary to see the men at work; you realise how much good it has done. After these men had been there a little while, they went to work; they could not have worked better if they had been paid 1s. an hour for doing it, and when, on the 11th April, we sent away from St. Pancras station twenty-four of them to Canada, the transformation in them was simply marvellous.

5386. Do you mean that they were looking much more healthy?—They had improved out of all knowledge; where they were loafing and lurching in appearance, quite indifferent, with their eyes like the eyes of a dead fish, after they had been down there eight months they had brightened up to an astonishing degree; their hands were hard, their muscles were hard, and they stood up to you when you spoke to them, instead of slouching away from you or looking down on the ground. One or two of them especially I had looked upon as absolutely hopeless, for they had been in and out of our workhouse for years. They were men who were there nine or ten years ago when we broke the law by refusing them re-admission on the same day as they came out—that is to say, they would leave the workhouse in the morning, go straight to the relieving officer as destitute persons, and get an order for re-admission into the workhouse; we absolutely refused to admit them; they stood and swore at us and told us we were breaking the law. We said, "Go and get a mandamus to compel us to re-admit you, we are not going to admit you the same day as you go out." That was the class of men we sent down to Laindon. We went to see them off to Canada at St. Pancras; it was astonishing the way they went up that platform; they spat on their hands and said, "Look here, Mr. Crooks, we will never trouble you any more; we are going to make a do of it." "When you get a big farm of your own, we are coming out to see you," I said. There was work in the men's faces; I always contend that if you could get these men to do something useful, something they could see, they would get discontented; their muscles would be hard; they would refuse to work for you for nothing and they would look out for a job; they would be worth something. When we sent them there, there were not any of them that one would have given a penny an hour for 5387. Have you got a farm superintendent at Laindon?—Yes, and a very good man he is; we have been exceedingly fortunate about it; he was originally our labour master at the workhouse.

5388. Do the guardians receive reports from him?—We have got a farm committee.
